

Bound by

RAFIZ ABDULGHAFUR & BROS.

BOOK BINDERS

Cash & Letter Books, Poen & Day Books
Ledgers etc, All sorts of Account
Books, Manufacturers

Sudder Bazar, Meerut and Aligarh.

RARE BOOK

یہ کتاب اُس تاریخ کو جو سب سے آخر میں ڈالی گئی ہے
واپس کرنی ہے، ورنہ پانچ پیسے روزانہ کے حساب سے
' ہرجانہ ادا کرنا ہوگا '

--	--	--

The Comrade.

RARE BOOK

A Weekly Journal

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
With thou hast, that all may share.
Proclaim it everywhere
For only live who dare!

-- Morris.

Delhi: Saturday, January 10, 1914.

Annual Subscription

Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS

Page	Page
SHORT STORY
Fred Rahman	11
THE ALL-INDIA MUSLIM LEAGUE
Resolutions	13
Resolutions	20
ALL-INDIA MOHAMEDAN EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE	23
INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS
President's Address	25
Resolutions	28
SELECTIONS
The Tangle	32
Civil Britannicus - New Style	32
The Hapsburg Monarchy	33
British Indians	34
ADVERTISEMENTS	37-40

The Week.

London, Dec. 21.

Indian Peril.

The second article appears in the Times on the "Indian Peril." It deals with the cause and effect of the present situation in India, which is mainly the result of the stream of badcast, with which the press and the law are powerless to cope. The consequences are an increase in serious crimes, and a growing insecurity of life and property. Only under a Government of a United India can there be the faintest hope of the nation's future. The failure of the British Government to realise the peculiar relations of the British Government to the vast masses of India explains much that is horrible. If the rapid undermining of all authority continues the will arrive when the teeming millions of the uneducated will have aught such hatred of the handful of Britishers, and such disregard of authority, that the vast mass of the population is totally unfit to part in self-government, but if disaffected it could make all government impossible. The present great change is due to the increasing disaffection of the masses by a small but influential minority who are devoting their slender means to spreading big propaganda by the inaccuracies or misstatements of writers and speakers in England concludes the article.

London, Dec. 23.

A third article in the Times on the "Indian Peril" deals with Nationalism emphasising the part played by Western education in the creation of Nationalism. The article admits that among 1,670,000 English literates in India are men of whom any country might be proud, who deplore the tendencies which they plainly see, but their numbers do not increase and their influence is diminishing in India and is not felt in England where determined efforts are being made to capture opinion for Nationalist purposes. The article declares that it is difficult to find a trace of the real democratic spirit among the "literate," who are not representative of India which remains an essentially aristocratic country in a sense of which Britishers at home and in the Dominions have long lost knowledge. Some of our mistakes in India, the article declares, have been due to this lack of knowledge. Were we to abdicate in favour of the Nationalists, there would not be materials to administer a democracy. The success of the present political movement would entail, an attempt to govern by the narrowest of oligarchies which, external aggression apart, would instantly crumble to pieces and violate every principle cherished by politicians at home who support disaffection. The article mentions Tripoli and the Balkan wars which it says assisted the national movement, raising Moslem Extremists to power in the councils of the community. South African grievances, it continues, are an even greater source of danger. The fact that Britishers in South Africa support the reasonable demands of the Indians, that Englishmen freely subscribe to funds for the sufferers, and that the three pounds tax is doomed cannot be made clear, and irreparable harm has already been done. Moreover party strife at home, the Ulster situation, violent strikes and the Suffragette movement can be exploited for propagandist purposes.

London, Dec. 23.

The Times, in the fourth and last article on the "Indian Peril" discusses the duty and policy of the Government in the present situation. It describes the check to the progress of social reforms owing to the diversion of energy and funds from the cause of the real people of India, and the resulting general lawlessness. The journal remarks:—"How many rising storms have been quieted by the tact and soothing influence of British officials is not guessed in England." Referring to the recent bank failures the Times expresses the fear that some ignorant victims may throw the blame on the Government and exhorts the conscientious democrat at Home to reflect upon the tumultuous forces latent in 295 millions wholly uneducated and inheriting, partly, strong fighting instincts. The welfare of 298 millions not the momentary gratification of a handful of literates must be the first duty of the Government. If they succeeded in the alienation of the masses India would become ungovernable, and it is certain that any visible weakening of the British Government of India would involve wholesale alienation. Our Government must concern itself less with politics and more with economics, must unite conflicting elements and reversing the Latin adage "unite to govern" must unflinchingly enforce law and order, realising that misplaced leniency may be cruel in the long run. There are now Native States showing a higher standard of security than some British districts. The higher branches of education must be improved, technical education must be built up, and the preposterous misuse of English literature must be eliminated. The judicial system urgently needs overhauling. The article emphasises the loyalty engrained in the peoples of India and advises the Government frankly to explain its objects and firmly to administer the Press laws. It also advises politicians and publicists at Home to the reasonable care to ascertain the truth. The great question is, says the Times, can a democracy govern a vast Eastern Empire? The ruin or progress of India depends on the answer, which must be forthcoming in a few years.

Turkey.

Constantinople, Dec. 21.

General Limat von Sanders has assumed the command of the First Turkish Army Corps. With reference to the attitude of the Triple Entente, it is generally felt that the question has lost its acuteness and that it is improbable that Russia will insist on further satisfaction. It is thought that the arrangement with General Sanders may be modified in a manner which will completely close the incident.

Constantinople, Dec. 26.

The Russian and German Ambassadors jointly called upon the Grand Vizier yesterday to enquire regarding the progress of reforms in Asia Minor. Turkish official circles are optimistic, and hope that the matter will reach a satisfactory settlement in a few days. It is believed that the difficulty will be surmounted by the Porte appointing two European Inspectors General for the six Eastern vilayets, thus obviating the possibility of conflicts which might result from the appointment of a single European adviser with Ottoman inspectors. — Reuter.

Paris, Dec. 26.

In a statement before the Foreign Committee of the Chambers yesterday, M. Doumergue dwelt on the importance of continuity in foreign policy. He affirmed the Government's resolve to pursue the line of action of its predecessors in co-operating with Britain and Russia. He gave details of the agreement which has just been concluded between France and Turkey assuring the security of French interests in the East, and recounted the measures taken to develop French culture in Syria. He mentioned that French contractors had obtained a promise for the building of important railways in Anatolia, Armenia and Syria, over 2,400 kilometres long; also for the construction and exploration of ports at Jaffa, Caffa, and Tripoli in Syria, and Heraclea, and Ineboli on the Black Sea. He pointed out that the French capital invested in Turkey amounted to 3,000 million francs; hence the French Government could not remain indifferent to the detachment of several important provinces from the Empire. — Reuter.

London, Dec. 18.

Aegean Islands.

The Triple Alliance has not replied yet to the British proposals regarding the Aegean Islands and Albania, but they have apparently been received favourably. Greece, however, is very resentful as she contends that both South Albania and the islands occupied by Italy are purely Greek and have become New Crete's centres of incessant agitation.

Constantinople, Dec. 23.

In view of the discussion proceeding between the Powers on the subject of the proposal regarding the division of the Aegean Islands, the Porte has circumscribed the Powers, reiterating the Porte's standpoint, and emphasising that a solution which does not restore the Islands facing the Asiatic Coast, will be absolutely unacceptable to Turkey.

Rome, Dec. 19.

Albania.

It is semi-officially announced that the International Commission for the Delimitation of the Southern Frontier of Albania has concluded its labours, and has unanimously agreed to a line proposed by Great Britain in conformity with the views of Italy and Austria-Hungary.

London, Dec. 23.

Reuter learns that Greece is still officially unaware of British proposals regarding Albania and the Aegean. It is pointed out in Greek quarters that the proposed southern boundary gives Albania 140,000 Greeks out of a total of 220,000.

Allahabad, Dec. 21.

Bagdad Railway.

The Pioneer's London correspondent cables: "The Daily Telegraph's Berlin correspondent says that according to the semi-official Le Matin, after the three entered negotiations between France, Germany and Turkey with regard to the Bagdad Railway, which are being interrupted by the Christmas holidays, have unfortunately not progressed as far as might have seemed desirable. In particular it is stated that there are important differences of opinion as to the construction of a harbour at Soudia and the discussion on this matter will not be resumed before the new year."

Egypt.

The first elections to the New Legislative Assembly have resulted in a sweeping victory of the Government. Less than twenty Opposition candidates were successful out of a total of 66 elected, plus members nominated by the Government.

Teheran, Dec. 26.

Persia.

It is understood that Russia intends shortly to withdraw a considerable number of troops from North Persia. Persia has agreed to increase the Persian Cossack Brigade at Tabriz from six hundred to twelve hundred with four Russian officers and eight Russian non-commissioned officers.

Allahabad, Dec. 27.

Imperial Delhi Committee.

The report by the Imperial Delhi Committee showing the progress made in connection with the affairs relating to the new capital has just been completed. The project estimated by the Engineer is also practically ready.

Turkey and Greece.

Reuter learns that Greek official circles are in no way perturbed over the purchase by Turkey of a dreadnought which was being built in Brazil, as it will not be ready for six months and Greece will have plenty of time to consider her course of action. Confidence is expressed, however, that the Greek Government will not shrink from any action necessary to ensure the country's safety. The possibility is hinted at of Greece declaring war on Turkey in order to prevent the vessel leaving England. According to diplomatic opinion, the incident may raise, in an acute form, the whole question of the disposal of other nations of the powerful warships ordered by the South American Republics.

Constantinople: The Dreadnought which Turkey has brought will be called "Sultan Osman."

Athens: M. Venizelos, Premier, speaking in Parliament to-day confirmed the purchase of the dreadnought by Turkey. He was unable to inform the House as to what steps Government were taking or had already taken to ensure Greek supremacy in the Aegean. He could only assure the Chamber that Greece was determined to maintain her supremacy and that the Greek naval authorities were absolutely calm.

France is anxious over the purchase of a dreadnought which Turkey has been enabled to acquire thanks to a loan raised in France. The "Temps" says that Turkey does not conceal her intention of declaring war on Greece in April and urges the closing of British and French money markets to Turkey.

Roi de Janiero: A semi-official communique states that Brazil was no party to the sale of the "Roi de Janiero" to Turkey, and that the builders are to supply another dreadnought to Brazil. Vice-Admiral Huethacellar has been accused for publishing a letter entailing Government's action in parting with the "Roi de Janiero."

Constantinople: Though the Turkish population is generally satisfied with the purchase of the dreadnought, financial anxiety has dropped a point and the appointment of Enver Bey as Minister of War is hardly soothing.

Constantinople: The Young Turk, Enver Bey, has been appointed Minister of War, and Colonel Djemal Bey, Minister of Works.

Constantinople: It is stated that the dreadnought "Roi de Janiero" and the battleship "Re Armstrong's" will be ready for delivery in six months.

The South African Crisis.

Victor (British Columbia), Dec. 18. Strong criticisms have been passed on the Dominion Government prohibiting the entry of artisans and laborers until March 31st.

It is acknowledged that the measure was designed to prevent a glut in the labour market and relieve the Hindu immigration problem. It prevents, however, the entry of workmen from Australia and New Zealand, while Chinese, arriving on the same steamer, enter paying a hundred pounds sterling poll-tax.

London, Dec. 19.

The release of Messrs. Gandhi, Polak and Kallenbach is confirmed.

Durban, Dec. 19.

Mr. Gandhi and the other Indian leaders arrived this afternoon. They were welcomed at the station by several hundred Indians, garlanded them and handed the carriers through the Indian queue to the offices of the Indian Association.

London, Dec. 19.

Mr. Gandhi, interviewed by Reuter's representative, said that appointments of Mr. Esselen and Colonel Wylie should be balanced by appointments from men of European nationality. He said the Government should possess no anti-Asiatic bias. Unless the Government accept the Commission to this proposal, it was impossible to accept the Commission.

give evidence, in which event the Indians would resume their activities in order to seek arrest and re-imprisonment.

Durban, Dec. 22.

At a meeting of five thousand Indians held here yesterday, addressed by Messrs. Gandhi, Polak and Kallenbach, a resolution was passed against Indians giving evidence before the Commission of Enquiry as it did not include a representative of the Indians. The resolution also urged the Government to appoint a European member acceptable to the Indians and undertook that, if this demand were granted and passive resisters discharged, passive resistance would be suspended pending the finding of the Commission, otherwise Indians would prosecute the struggle with renewed vigour.

Mr. Gandhi, wearing the dress of an indentured labourer as a sign of mourning, aroused great enthusiasm by suggesting that unless the Government granted their demands all should be ready on the first day of the new year to suffer battle and imprisonment. Mr. Gandhi announced that he would eat only one meal a day as a further sign of mourning.

Delhi, Dec. 22.

The following communiqué has been issued:—

The Government of India have been in communication with the Secretary of State since the Commission was appointed by the Government of South Africa, to investigate the disturbances in Natal and the causes which led up to them with a view to their representation before the Commission.

They have now selected Sir B. Robertson, Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, to appear before the Commission on their behalf. He starts at once for Durban to arrive in time for the next meeting of the Commission on January 12th.

It will be recollected that Sir B. Robertson held the post of Secretary, and officiated as member of Council in the Commerce and Industry Department from 1907 to 1911, and has, therefore, special knowledge of Indian grievances in South Africa.

Pietermaritzburg, Dec. 22.

Mr. Gandhi's wife and three other women passive resisters were released from gaol this morning. They were pulled through the town in carriages by enthusiastic Indians.

Mr. Gandhi, on arriving from Durban, was garlanded and congratulated. In his reply, he urged Indians to eschew luxuries as a sign of mourning. Addressing a larger meeting afterwards, he said that Durban Indians were more united than ever in their determination to insist upon the demands formulated at the meeting on Sunday. The meeting endorsed the resolutions passed at the Durban meeting, and decided to prosecute the passive resistance movement unless the Government yielded.

A telegram from Durban states that a cousin and son of Mr. Gandhi and eight other passive resisters, who were arrested for crossing the Transvaal border on September 16th, and initiating the present campaign, were released to-day.

The Cape Times says that the requests of Mr. Gandhi and others formulated at the meeting at Durban, though reasonable, constitute a courteous ultimatum, and the journal urges Mr. Gandhi and his colleagues to hesitate before committing themselves to a course which will alienate sympathy in South Africa and overseas, and appears to aim at embarrassing the Government.

Durban, Dec. 22.

The Indian leaders have written a letter to the Government recapitulating their demands. Firstly, they ask for the appointment of the two new members of the Commission preferably Sir James Rose Innes and Senator Schreiner, secondly, the immediate release of the imprisoned passive resisters, and thirdly, freedom for the leaders to visit the sugar estates and collieries for the purpose of collecting evidence. The letter points out that, while the finding of the Commission, if enlarged as suggested, will be accepted as finally settling the dispute as regards the allegations of ill-treatment of the strikers, the Commission's recommendations regarding the original grievances will not be accepted by the Indian community in derogation of its demands. The letter concludes by reiterating that failing compliance with their demands as leaders they will not countenance violence, even by way of retaliation, the passive resistance movement will be resumed and Indians will march across the Transvaal border towards Pretoria previously. It is expected, however, that the marchers will be much more numerous, the leaders asserting that from ten to twelve thousand will take part.

London, Dec. 23.

The Durban Mercury says that the Government would lose nothing in the general estimation by conceding the demand for the enlargement of the Commission as suggested by the Indians and for the liberation of the passive resisters. But should the Government refuse, the Indians would be wise to give their evidence before the Commission in view of the Government of India sending Sir Benjamin Robertson.

At a meeting of the Indians in London, presided over by Sir Mancherjee Bhownagree, a resolution was passed urging the Imperial Government to secure the appointment of representatives of India and of the Imperial Government on the Commission in South Africa.

A meeting of Indian women at Johannesburg passed a resolution requesting Government to accede to the Indian demands and urging the leaders to persevere to the bitter end. In an interview with Renter's representative regarding the article in the Cape Times Mr. Gandhi said nothing was further from his wish than to give the letter the form of an ultimatum. He had not the slightest wish to embarrass the Government.

Nagpur, Dec. 22.

Sir Benjamin Robertson, Chief Commissioner, came here unexpectedly from his tour in the Chanda district and proceeded at once to Delhi.

Sir Benjamin Robertson is now in Delhi, conferring with the Government of India regarding the South African question before he leaves for Durban. The question as to who will officiate as Chief Commissioner during his absence is now under consideration.

Durban, Dec. 22.

In an interview with Renter's representative Mr. Gandhi totally repudiated the allegation that the agitation in Natal was largely fictitious, and had been engineered by disloyalists in India, who wanted a pretext to embarrass the Government of India. His best helpers, he said, were Europeans, mostly British subjects, who knew the inwardness of the struggle as fully as himself. If the Commission of Enquiry found him guilty of complicity in such criminal folly as was alleged, he would undertake to retire not only from the movement, but also from South Africa.

Durban, Dec. 24.

It is reported from Volksrust that thirteen male and three female Indians have been sentenced to three months' hard labour for attempting to cross the Border.

On the 23rd December, His Excellency the Viceroy, replying to the joint address of the Associations representing the various Indian communities of Calcutta, said:—

As you know, there is at present one (troublesome problem) open which we all feel deeply, but for which I am still hopeful that an equitable solution may be found, and I feel that I ought to take opportunity of saying what great importance I attach to the recognition by the leaders of the Indians in South Africa of the Commission appointed by the Government of the Union. The fact that a public and judicial enquiry will be held by a Commission of whom the President is a Judge of Appeal and universally esteemed and respected to investigate the allegations that have been made, to enquire into their causes, and to make recommendations, presents an opportunity that the Indians have not had before to submit to the verdict of the world the justice of their grievances. I cannot urge too strongly upon the leaders the urgency of accepting the Commission and off setting to work at once to prepare their case for submission to it.

AN ANXIOUS PROBLEM.

The Government of India feel such deep interest in the result of this Commission that we have appointed a distinguished official, Sir Benjamin Robertson, whom I think many of you know, to be present before the Commission as the representative of the Government of India. This is one of those anxious problems to which I have just referred, but all these difficulties and problems mean a just and right adjudication between conflicting interests, in the decision of which, in the very nature of things, satisfaction cannot be given to all. But as in the past so in the future it will be my constant endeavour to bring to my task a spirit of fairness and just dealing with a true sense of duty and responsibility; and if, when I come to lay down the reins, I can feel that your sentiments continue to be such as those you have expressed to-day, I shall indeed be a happy man.

Durban, Dec. 24.

The Government has rejected Mr. Gandhi's demands for the addition of representatives of Indian interests of the Natal Commission and for the release of all the imprisoned passive resisters.

Pretoria, Dec. 24.

Replying to the letter of the Indian leaders to the Government recapitulating their demands, General Smuts said he was unable to accept the conditions under which Mr. Gandhi and his colleagues proposed to give evidence before the Commission and suspend passive resistance pending the Commission's finding, particularly the condition involving the appointment of additional members of the Commission in the interests of the Indian community.

The Commission was intended to have an impartial and judicial character, and in constituting it, the Government consulted neither the Indian community, the coal owners, nor the sugar planters in Natal, nor could the Government, for a moment, follow the course proposed which would give colour to unwarranted reflections upon two of the members of the Commission.

The course proposed by the letter, in the event of the Government's non-compliance, was deeply regretted, not the least in the interests of the Indian community which could not but be profoundly affected by the lawless character of the leaders' procedure, the gratuitous infliction of grave sufferings on innocent people, both Whites and Indians, and the consequent exasperation of public opinion throughout the Union.

Durban, Dec. 25.

Mr. Gandhi and others telegraphed yesterday to Lord Ampthill declaring that the people are so indignant that if an attempt is made to advise the acceptance of the present commission they will kill their leaders. "Unless there is very prompt agitation in England to support our demands," says the telegram, "the Government is not likely to accede to them."

In an interview with Reuter's representative regarding General Smuts's reply to the letter of the Indian leaders, Mr. Gandhi said he had privately communicated with the Government and thought that a way out of the deadlock was possible. The Government could without loss of prestige respond to the prayer of Indians for a representation of their interests on the Commission and he would leave no stone unturned to prevent renewal of passive resistance. He asserted his loyalty to the Imperial and Union Governments. He was deeply pained to learn that employers on the coast, for some of whom he entertained a high regard, had suffered losses.

It is understood that Mr. Gandhi has asked Mr. Smuts for an interview.

It is alleged that there are signs that the movement is weakening among the rank and file.

Durban: In a letter to the Press, Mr. Gandhi denies that the march to Pretoria has been postponed because the mass of local Indians cannot be relied on to join in; on the contrary, he says the difficulty is to delay it and he has been obliged to send special messengers to issue leaflets in order to advise Indians that the march is postponed.

Referring to resolutions at the Indian National Congress, Mr. Gandhi says while the Congress is justified in asking and is bound to ask for full citizen rights throughout the Empire, South African Indians have made it clear that they are bound to recognise local prejudice and his workers will not be a party to any agitation for the unrestricted immigration of British Indians into the Union or the attainment of political franchise in the near future.

In an editorial, the London "Times" says that the change in Gandhi's attitude is welcome. Indian leaders have been clearly impressed by Lord Hardinge's appeal in Calcutta. "We fear, however, that relaxation of the tension is temporary. The sole prospect of a stable settlement lies in a determined effort by the Imperial Government. The question involves the claim of the self-governing Dominion to manage its own affairs and affects. These issues are vital to the Empire and no Government, calling itself Imperial, can afford to adopt a merely negative attitude towards them."

Pretoria: The Labour Party conference to-day, unanimously passed a resolution protesting against the system of indentured labour and condemning the use of the police and military to compel Indians to work. The conference was convinced that the presence of the Indian population in South Africa would always lead to grave difficulties and urged Government to take immediate steps to induce repatriation with adequate compensation.

A telegram to the "Times" from Durban says that confidential negotiations between Gandhi and Government continue on the point of representation on the commission of strikers on sugar estate and passive resistors.

Mr. Gokhale has received the following cablegram from Mr. Gandhi, dated the 2nd January.

"The Rev. Messrs. Andrews and Pearson have arrived, and were accorded a most cordial reception by the Indian community. They had a very rough passage. We are now trying to secure the addition to the Commission of at least one European member in whose impartiality we have confidence, the planters, if necessary, being allowed to nominate one on their side. I sincerely hope India will support us in this. Pray ask all not to be over-anxious on our account. We discovered on our release that large numbers of our community had shown unexpected powers of endurance of suffering, and we were astonished at the unlooked-for ability shown by indentured Indians, without effective leadership, to act with determination and in perfect co-operation and discipline. We require cheerful in our calamity preparing for and awaiting events."

Mr. Gokhale has also received the following cablegram from Messrs. Polak and Kalenbach:—"We move among Europeans, including responsible Pressmen, who privately or publicly recognise the justice of the Indian demands in regard to the Commission"

Our London Letter.

London, 19th December, 1913.

You have, no doubt, heard already by cable of the Right Hon'ble Syed Ameer Ali's withdrawal of his resignation of the London Moslem League Presidentship. The members of his London Committee were duly informed of this step taken by their late President in an official letter, signed by Mr. Ameer Ali himself and the "sympathetic strikers," Messrs. C. A. Latif and A. S. M. Anik; but the outside world came to know about it through the Times of last Friday? The great national organ has again treated this rather farcical episode in its usual solemn funeral-like tone. The Right Hon'ble gentleman and his faithful colleagues have taken this step, we are told, "in response to the telegraphic appeals and resolutions of the United Provinces League, the Punjab League, the Moradabad League and other organisations in India and in view of the delicate questions that confront the Mussalman Community." The average mind fails to understand the nature of the "delicate questions that confront the Mussalman Community," which were evidently not in existence a month ago, when these gentlemen, in a body, severed their connection with the London League. It is now generally felt that the somewhat undignified manner in which the Right Hon'ble gentleman tendered his resignation and the equally unbecoming way in which he has withdrawn it have, on the whole, produced a scene in this Comic opera, which will certainly not enhance the prestige of the London League in any degree. The eyes of all thinking men are now naturally turned towards the approaching All-India Moslem League Council meeting at Agra and it is earnestly hoped, in the interest of the Indian Mussalman Community, that a definite and decisive line of future action will be then laid down.

THE ISLAMIC SOCIETY.

The Society owes no little debt of gratitude to Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, who has made himself financially responsible for the weekly prayers on Fridays, until the Society's funds permit their securing permanent rooms in London. The attendance is increasing every week and Indian Moslems, Turks, Egyptians, Persians and Englishmen are flocking every Friday to Lindsey Hall in Kensington, where the Juma-Namaz is held. The Khwaja Kamal-ud-din's sermons are thoroughly appreciated and listened to most attentively by all those present. Lord Headley generally recites the subsequent Dna in English and his genuine and enthusiastic advocacy of Islam exercise a most invigorating influence on the members of the congregation. His Lordship's four little sons were present with him at this morning's Namaz and, in spite of their tender age, followed the proceedings with real interest.

The Khwaja Kamal-ud-din has issued invitations to the members of the Islamic Society for the Majlis-un-Nikah, at the Mosque in Woking, on the 21st instant, when Princess Saliah of Egypt will be married to Ata-ur-Rahman Shaikh Jalal-ud-din Mohamed Jerunkvite, a Russian nobleman, who has recently embraced Islam.

The three vacancies on the Committee of the Islamic Society have been filled by Mr. Syed Abul Hasan Razavi, B.A., M.R.A.C. (Giren), of Hyderabad, Deccan, Mr. Murtasala, B.A. (Cantab) of Cairo and Hussein Manzalauvi Bey of Constantinople.

Indian Moslems.

RECONSTITUTION OF THE LONDON LEAGUE.

The London All-India Moslem League has been reconstituted. The resignations of the President, Mr. Ameer Ali, of Mr. C. A. Latif, the Vice-President, and of Mr. A. S. M. Anik, the honorary treasurer, have been withdrawn. At a meeting of the committee held last evening the Aga Khan was elected to the honorary presidency, in pursuance of a telegraphic intimation from India of his willingness to accept that office. The meeting passed a cordial vote of thanks to the officers for withdrawing their resignations, and also to the Aga Khan.

These satisfactory developments are a result of eager and anxious discussion among Indian Mohamedans since we announced on October 31st that the London All-India Moslem League had been split by the attempts of the advanced section of "Young Moslems" to impose their will upon the League. The hope we then expressed as being entertained by the Aga Khan—that the London League might be reconstructed on lines maintaining its position of co-ordination and co-operation with the League in India—has now been fulfilled.

This happy outcome of the differences, which were brought to a head by the demands made by Mr. Mohamed Ali and Mr. Wazir Hasan for the acceptance of an advanced policy, is mainly attributable to the support given to the hitherto recognized leaders by the best and most responsible Mussalman opinion in India. Among many other messages requesting Mr. Ameer Ali to continue to guide the League here were emphatic resolutions from two of the most active and important provincial leagues in Northern India, those of the United Provinces and the Punjab. Before yesterday's meeting Mr. Ameer Ali, Mr. Latif, and Mr. Anik issued a joint letter to the members of the committee announcing their readiness to continue to give the League their services in the work of Mussalman development.

The rally of moderate Moslem opinion to the more experienced leaders has no doubt been contributed to by the refusal of Lord, Crewe, and afterwards of Mr. Asquith, to grant interviews to the two "delegates," Mr. Mahomed Ali and Mr. Wazir Hasan, when they were in this country—a fact well known in India, though it has not been made public hitherto in this country.—Times.

TETE À TETE

It is seldom that the Honours List excites interest in the breast of anybody except the Jo-Hookams or the Government which decorates itself lavishly every half-year on the analogy of the pious boy who recited fatiha over his daily allowance of Honour where Honour is due.

sweets and unequally ate them up himself. But the only two K.C.S.I.'s of the New Year's Day List are highly significant. There are some things that one would very much like to say and yet does not say because it is inexpedient to do so. If, however, someone else happens to say the same thing, one feels all the pleasure of speech without any of its awkwardness. The Mussalmans of India and particularly those involved in one way or another in the recent happenings at Cawnpore and London must have felt grateful to the Pioneer for a good many things it has blurted out every now and then in moments of irresponsible chagrin. It has certainly justified its name and has by its pioneer work in this connection spared others the indiscretion of exultation. The latest occasion is the comment of our contemporary on the recognition of the services of Mr. Syed Ali Imam to the Government of Lord Hardinge. His Excellency the Viceroy has never recommended any one more deserving of such honour, nor has His Majesty the King-Emperor conferred a title in India which has been better received by the people of this country. There is no honour to which Sir Ali Imam cannot add lustre, nor is there an office of responsibility to which he cannot add dignity. His position as the Indian member of the Government of India is one of great delicacy; but no greater compliment can be paid to him than this, that no one can count on the least favouritism in his discharge of duty, while all feel confident of securing fair-play. Neither the bond of religion nor other personal ties give his co-religionists and a vast number of personal friends of all classes, sections and creeds the least security that these matters count with him even a feather's weight when he is dealing with the affairs of State. He is, as he publicly said soon after his appointment, first and foremost a Minister of the Crown. But his being an Indian gives him that inestimable advantage of knowing the country intimately which none of his colleagues can share with him in anything like equal measure. His presence on the Executive Council must have assisted His Excellency the Viceroy materially when dealing with grave problems of Indian administration, and the Cawnpore settlement alike justified the new departure of Lord Morley, the choice of Lord Minto, and the confidence of Lord Hardinge. It seems most probable that at Cawnpore Sir D. C. Bailie gave Sir Ali Imam—for in deference to the one and only "Sir Syed" he does not like to be called Sir Syed Ali Imam—that ready assistance which greatly facilitates such settlements even though his absence may not make them impossible, and the then officiating Lieutenant-Governor has amply earned the goodwill of Mussalmans and in fact of all Indians. We hope an officer of Sir D. C. Bailie's ripe experience will be available for selection when the United Provinces get an Executive Council. We wish him and the new Indian and Moslem Knight, who possesses true knightly courage and knightly courtesy, still higher honours. The Privy Councillorship of Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson has caused universal gratification in Indian circles, for no recognition of the many merits of that lover of India could fail to be received with hearty rejoicings in this country. An added zest is given to this joy by the pain that it must have caused in some quarters not well disposed towards Indians. We expected some tearing of hair and gnashing of teeth in a newspaper office not a day's distance from Delhi; but the New Year resolutions were evidently strong enough to dictate unusual self-restraint. We also congratulate our fellow-citizen Haji Buksh Ellahie Sahab on his C.I.E. well earned by his philanthropy. But gold is gold even without the guinea stamp, and if unalloyed gold comes to the fund of public charities, the public too can impress it with its guinea stamp. The omissions, however, are as notable as some of the honours conferred on New Year's Day. When the editor of our gay and bright contemporary, Punch, whose witty verse runs easily like a copious stream, and has run for a number of years without leaving the source dry, deservedly becomes a Knight one wonders why the Government of India is so chary of honouring Literature and Art, as to have neglected the Punch, and to be oblivious of the very existence of a Hali and an Iqbal. It is true that Art and Literature do not hanker after titles. But should titles always go to those that hanker after them, and do not Art and Literature decorate the decorations themselves? Even if Governments are unfamiliar with the names of men like Hali, a large portion of the world is all the better for their existence and this is their best reward.

We are sure Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali would be amply gratified by the following judgment passed on their work by Sir Henry Cotton who is in a better position to judge the expression made by it on the British public than those people who import their own prejudices into their retrospects and prognostications. He writes to Mr. Mohamed Ali:—"On looking back over your visit to England you must realise that your failure to obtain an interview with the Secretary of State was a matter of comparatively small importance. Of course, it would have been better to have had an interview, but it would have led to no result, and the real value of your visit lies in the general clearing of the air in regard to the attitude of Indian Moslems, and in the close relations you were able to establish with the press organisation in this country. In a very short space of time you accomplished an unusual amount of important work and have every reason to be satisfied with the general effect it produced. It remains to prosecute the campaign in India, and no doubt in subsequent years you will be able to renew it here." We hope it will be possible for these gentlemen to go to England before long to renew their work. What England and India both need is a hundred such missions in the next few years.

MEMORIES like the tails of animals, are short or long, and sometimes the length depends entirely on convenience. But we daresay people have not forgotten that not so very long ago we had to discuss in more than one issue of the Comrade the doctrine of some gentlemen that Aligarh affairs should remain State secrets, and the College itself should be an Isis hid by the veil. Recently, however, everybody seems to have accepted our own view of the matter that the wellbeing and progress of a public institution are hindered more by secrecy than by publicity, and that a public institution thrives best in open air. But we must say even we did not expect such rapid conversion of those who seemed to hold different views, nor can we admire the zeal of the new convert with which Aligarh affairs are being discussed to-day in the Indian Gazette and other vernacular papers. An important meeting of the Trustees took place on January 1st, at Aligarh, and judging from the conclusion of that meeting we decided that it would be more expedient to publish only the resolutions passed by the Board of Trustees and give no further details of the discussion. But the Pioneer of the 4th instant publishes under the general heading of "Indian Telegrams [From our own Correspondents]" two short but very misleading accounts of what took place at the meeting, and it is our plain duty to correct the impression likely to be created thereby on the public mind. With the exception of the resignation of H. H. the Nawab Sahab of Rampur from the Visitorship of the College, which was indeed a very great misfortune and, therefore, had to be dealt with immediately, there was nothing that necessitated a special meeting of the Trustees, particularly as only a month hence the Annual Meeting was to be held. Considering the result of the Special Meeting, we believe the Honorary Secretary himself must be regretting the haste with which he called the last meeting and tacked on affairs of little or no importance to the resignation of His Highness the Nawab Sahab. As regards the latter, it was unanimously decided that a deputation should wait on His Highness praying that he should withdraw his resignation, and a dozen or so members were selected. After that the Trustees began to consider with as much seriousness as they could command a number of threadbare axioms. The first was that the Honorary Secretary should maintain good relations with Government and its officials, and it was unanimously accepted with the addition of the significant explanation that in this matter the old practice of Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk, and Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk was to be continued. The second axiom that came up for discussion was that discipline should be maintained in the College and the Honorary Secretary's responsibility in the matter should remain intact. Once more the significant explanation that the tradition of three former Secretaries was to be followed was unanimously added, and it was further explained that the Honorary Secretary's concern with discipline was that of the executive officer of the entire Board of Trustees. The third axiom discussed was that the dignity of the office of the Honorary Secretary should be maintained, and it will be difficult for the outside world to decide whether it was more tragic or comic that a majority decided that the dignity of the office of Trustee and Governor of the College should not be maintained. We leave it to the Pioneer to lead the way in commenting on this self-abasement and humility of the Board of Trustees. One thing must, however, be made clear before we proceed further. The Trustees were more anxious for peace than for justice, and unanimously refused to enter into any facts adduced for or against the conduct of the Honorary Secretary, the Trustees or the students. Therefore none of the resolutions of the Special Meeting can have the least practical significance, and it was explained quite early in the meeting that they were not votes of confidence in the Honorary Secretary nor would their rejection be considered a vote of censure on that officer. Many Trustees thought that such resolutions were absolutely unnecessary, but all agreed that their rejection would probably be misunderstood, and now that the Honorary Secretary had submitted them for discussion, and they formed part of the Agenda of the meeting, it was desirable that they should be passed.

Aligarh Affairs.

ANOTHER resolution referred to the connection of students with Undergraduates and Politics. The Trustees were careful enough to say that what they wished students to refrain from was taking part in practical politics. An undergraduate's education would be incomplete if such a large subject as Political Science, or Political Philosophy, as it is variously called, was rigorously excluded from his studies, or if current politics did not supply occasionally a subject for academical discussions in the College Union. A careful study of the subject along with History is the best corrective of what we are inclined to call "indolent patriotism" which is impatient of the demand of sustained work which real patriotism must always make, and is therefore eager to discover short-cuts. Nation-building is a wearisome task, but youngmen cannot realise it unless they study the growth of nations and of the principles of nationalism with all the patience and humility of the true student. Besides, too carefully wrapping up the undergraduate in cotton wool lest his loyalty catch cold is in reality preparing him for becoming a ready victim to the first wind of political passion to which he may get exposed on leaving the College quadrangle. This, like the other resolutions we have mentioned, was no more than the declaration of the policy which has hitherto been pursued, and if these declarations serve the purpose of clearing the air, we have every reason to feel satisfied with the action of the Trustees. But we fail to see any justification in all this for the remark of the Pioneer that the discussion of these resolutions was a great "trial of strength between the forces of what may be described as new and old Mohamedanism" and, that their passage without a dissentient voice was a triumph for the Pioneer's protégés. Mohamedanism is, at the least computation, more than thirteen hundred years old, and the nomenclature of the Pioneer would not commend itself to anybody. But the suggestion that, because the presence of Messrs. Mohamed Ali and Wazir Hasan was anticipated, they would intervene in the debate in order to oppose well-worn axioms betrays a peculiarly warped judgment characteristic of the Pioneer's self-satisfied ignorance.

In connection with disciplinary measures deemed necessary for keeping Aligarh undergraduates aloof from practical politics, the officiating Principal of the College—who would do well to confine himself to things of which he has some knowledge and which fall within the scope of his official duties—had raised the question whether the Society of the Servants of the Ka'aba was merely religious or political also. When the matter came before the Trustees at their last meeting it was asked whether the College authorities had any right to sit in judgment on societies outside the College. The Honorary Secretary pointed out that he had no desire to pass any judgment on the character of the Servants of the Ka'aba Society, and he was only concerned with the studies of the undergraduates on which their attention should be concentrated during their College days. Two members of the Society explained that it made no demands on the time of students or any other class of its members, and as the "Votaries of the Ka'aba" had to place their services as whole-time men at the disposal of the Society, in return, if necessary, for maintenance of themselves and their families, obviously nobody could take the pledge of the "Votaries" without first ceasing to be a student. No effort was made to enlist students in any part of India even as Servants. All the same, it was agreed on all hands that for the future Aligarh students should be prohibited from becoming members of any society not controlled or organised by the College. On this there was no difference of opinion and Aligarh was saved a stupid but mischievous quarrel with the Ulama and the Moslem public to which Dr. Ziauddin was, let us assume, thoughtlessly leading it.

INSTEAD of framing in the prescribed manner a motion on the subject, the Honorary Secretary of the Aligarh Trustees submitted for their pronouncement in the last meeting the question of the Honorary Secretary's rights and duties as regards politics and other "external" activities. We believe we are fully justified in saying that the submission of such questions in the place of regular motions consisting of definite proposals is subversive of the rights of such members as do not attend a meeting but are entitled under the rules to submit written opinions which are counted as votes. We believe that the attendance of some 45 out of a total of 102 Trustees in the last meeting constitutes a record, and, for reasons which we would rather not give, we are not likely to get anything like such good attendance at the two customary meetings of the year. If better attendance is desired—and surely no one can doubt that it is exceedingly desirable—the way to bring it about is to abolish the life-tenure of Trusteeship and the system of co-option. Short of these necessary changes better attendance can be secured only by the abolition of the system of voting by proxy. But the decision arrived at at the last meeting on the question submitted by the Honorary Secretary was the decision of a majority of only those who attended the meeting and of those whose proxy votes they had taken good care to secure, for the motion of Mr. Justice Shah Din was never circulated, and therefore never voted upon except by a little more than a fourth of the entire body of Trustees who attended in the afternoon. The decision was this. The Honorary Secretary is not to take any part in politics—and this without any qualification such as practical politics proscribed for students—and he is to refrain from such "external" activities as may be harmful to the College. There was considerable difference of opinion among the Trustees, and some of the young representatives of "Old Mohamedanism" of the Pioneer's creation voted with the minority consisting of what that "Grey-beard," the Hon. Captain Malik Umar Hayat Khan Tiwana, following the lead of equally "sane and sober" Anglo-Indian journals, would call "hot-headed youngsters."

The very first result of this decision would be that the Honorary Secretary would no longer be allowed to please his beneficent and benign friends by organising abortive hole-and-corner political meetings at Delhi or elsewhere. The next result would be hardly less disastrous. He would be unable to offer himself as a candidate for the Legislative Council of the Province as he did a year ago without success. We wonder whether even the luxury of a sermon on loyalty would now be permitted to him. As for "external" activities "harmful" to the College, what greater guidance can this resolution of the Trustees offer to him than the resolution about discipline? Nobody in his senses would approve of a disregard of discipline or suggest that the relations of the Honorary Secretary with Government and its officials should be any but pleasant. Similarly, nobody would like the Honorary Secretary to mix himself up with any activities, whether "internal" or "external", which are "harmful" to the College. But the question is, is anybody in the least wiser after the adoption of all these excellent resolutions? No motion suggestive of a vote of confidence in the Honorary Secretary was placed on the agenda of the meeting, and no such resolution was ever passed, all correspondents and editors and sub-editors of all the papers in the world notwithstanding. Nothing that he had done in the past was extolled, condoned or censured. But nothing was decisively suggested for his future guidance either, except the categorical prohibition of the Secretary's taking any part whatever in politics. If he thinks that this excused him for any inaction, real or imagined, in the Cawnpore affair, is he not then bound to regard the resolution as a censure on him for organising the abortive meeting at Delhi? But in fact it did neither, for the Trustees set their faces from the very beginning against touching the unsavoury mass served for their consumption through the Institute Gazette and other Urdu papers. What the resolution has done is to entail most seriously the freedom of the Honorary Secretary and to make the office considerably less attractive for the ablest men in the community. We question the binding force of the decision, because it amounts to a restriction of the rights of the Honorary Secretary which involves a change in the rules for which a two-thirds majority in the Annual Meeting of the Trustees is necessary. But even as a "pious wish" the resolution is not likely to last beyond a couple of years, and in this sense constitutes a censure on the present Honorary Secretary which the Trustees had no right to pass. Whatever Nawab Ishak Khan Sahib did or left undone in the way of politics was his own affair and the affair of the public, for he never pretended to act politically as the Honorary Secretary of the College. If his politics is approved by the public he would receive all the rewards of public approval. If it is disapproved, he must be equally prepared for public censure. Whether he is the Secretary of the College or not is besides the point. The curious feature of the whole thing is that, perhaps he is inclined to regard this restriction of his rights as a personal triumph. In calmer moments we fear he will be disillusioned and will regret that he ever submitted the question for the decision of his colleagues.

In February, 1907, Mr. Ghulam Husain, a senior undergraduate of Aligarh, was accused by a Police constable of handling him roughly when on duty at the local Exhibition. Without any inquiry the then Principal, Mr. Archbold, who quarrelled with the Trustees themselves two years later and resigned, expelled Mr. Ghulam Husain from the College. When it was discovered that this had roused the temper of his comrades, Mr. Archbold converted the sentence into a fine of Rs. 20. Some time after peace had thus been patched up, Mr. Archbold ordered Mr. Ghulam Husain to give up residence in the College Hostels on the ground of the alleged offence of going beyond the bounds fixed for him as a punishment along with the fine, although Mr. Ghulam Husain was seen walking not far from the College in company with the Assistant Tutor himself. On this the undergraduates held a demonstration, and in consequence of this seven of them were expelled from the College, whereupon all the undergraduates went on a strike and the College was closed for some time. Sir Joubert Hewett paid his first visit to the College as its official Patron under these abnormal conditions, and insisted on the appointment of a Commission of inquiry which the Trustees did not appoint in a regular meeting and the personnel of which did not find favour with the Moslem public. Nor did the report of the Commission commend itself to the community. This was only natural if we remember that Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk, who on the death of Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk was elected to the office of the Honorary Secretary the same year, wrote a strong minute of dissent. The strikers were in the meantime accused of mixing themselves up with political agitation, and with considerable wisdom denied the charge and offered to return to the College. Mr. Archbold was prevailed upon to withdraw his order of expulsion of the prominent strikers, and the College was re-opened. This is all ancient history now, but almost the only member of the then College Staff, Mr. Towle, seems to have a long though somewhat misleading memory, for he revived the regrettable incidents of 1907 last winter when, on his way to a friend's place to recuperate his health, Mr. Ghulam Husain broke his journey at Aligarh for a couple of days and out of a feeling of respect called on his old tutor, Mr. Towle. We can imagine the shock of surprise with which he heard Mr. Towle's order that he should not stay in the College as an Old Boy even for a day. Mr. Ghulam Husain pleaded that six years had passed since the petty incident of his alleged quarrel with a policeman and Mr. Archbold's anger on his going beyond the bounds. He had since entered life and had earnestly worked for the good of his Alma Mater. He asked how long his alleged sins would continue to be visited upon him. Mr. Towle promised to consider the question and let him have a definite answer. Subsequently to this Mr. Ghulam Husain reminded Mr. Towle more than once but was only informed that the matter was under consideration. After this he attended the Annual Reunion of the Old Boys at Easter and left Aligarh after a few hours' stay in a building set apart by the College authorities for lodging the Old Boys on the occasion. It now appears that even to this Mr. Towle took objection, and the Honorary Secretary of the College commenced a correspondence with the Honorary Secretary of the Old Boys' Association on the subject of the rules of the Association regarding Old Boys who had been expelled from the College. The upshot of it was that the Honorary Secretary now asked the Trustees to resolve that no student expelled from the College should be enlisted as a member of the Old Boys' Association without the sanction of himself and the Principal. Evidently it does not matter to him in the least that the Old Boys' Association is an independent body with a membership of some thirteen hundred Old Boys, and an annual income of about eighteen thousand rupees and that no constitutional means exist for enforcing the decisions of the Trustees on this Association. The rules of the Association, passed immediately after the strike of the undergraduates in 1907, provided for the admission of expelled students as members of the Association on a simple majority of votes. Neither Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk nor Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk objected to them, nor was any objection raised by Mr. Archbold or Mr. Towle. A Sub-Committee of Old Boys, including the Proctor of the College, drafted new rules, and very wisely made the rule relating to the admission of expelled students more rigorous by making it dependent on a majority of two-thirds instead of a simple majority of votes. And yet, paradoxical as it may seem, both the new Honorary Secretary and the Principal now find the new rule objectionable. The Pioneer refers to the last Session of the League as being "packed with many of the fervent friends and admirers" of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohammed Ali, as if the League's membership is not open to all literate adults; and yet the Pioneer finds consolation in the alleged triumph of a party opposed to these gentlemen in the Board of Trustees as if the Board of Trustees is not "packed with many of the fervent friends and admirers" of the Pioneer and its pets and protégés. In spite of the obvious considerations which were placed before the Trustees, and the almost unanimous opposition of Old Boys who are Trustees of the College, a majority of the Trustees mainly composed of the Pioneer's clientèle accepted the resolution as submitted by the Honorary Secretary. Let us hope that he does not accept this decision as a personal triumph, for he can ill afford to pick a needless quarrel with the Old Boys' Association at a time when he needs peace and rest.

In spite of the decision of the majority, the Trustees appeared unanimous in condemning what Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami described as "the policy of revenge" sometimes pursued by College tutors in order to ruin the future careers of students whom they disliked in their College days. He referred to the great ovation given by the entire University on occasions to undergraduates who had been "sent down" for some youthful peccadilloe but had subsequently brought honour to their Alma Mater as well as to themselves. He contended that the doctrine of "eternal punishment" in such cases was absurd. Well, the case which led the Honorary Secretary to raise this question does not appear to us to be far removed from the state of affairs referred to by Major Bilgrami. Going beyond College bounds is not an offence involving such moral turpitude that a young man may not wipe it off in six years of such literary work as Mr. Ghulam Husain has done. He is second to none as a journalist, and wields a pen that is the envy of his friends and comrades and the despair of his foes. Our readers have often offered praise where praise was certainly not due, forgetting that the Comrade had on its staff a writer as brilliant as Mr. Ghulam Husain. His stirring appeals for funds in the columns of the Comrade have helped in a large measure to fill the coffers of the ill-fated Moslem University. Yet after all this lapse of time, Mr. Towle is anxious to revive an all but forgotten incident from which the then Staff of the College did not come out unscathed. Although our readers are sure to judge the matter on the lines indicated by Major Bilgrami, we may add for Mr. Towle's information that Mr. Ghulam Husain was never expelled from the College. The College sent up his name as a candidate for the B. A. examination after the final sentence was passed, and he appeared in the examination several months after as a candidate sent up by the College, and subsequently took the B. A. degree of the Allahabad University as a successful candidate in every way approved by the College. If we understand aright, the expulsion of a student means the end of his College and University career on the score of his being one of the "undesirables." We hope this will satisfy everybody and the matter will be dropped. If not, the Honorary Secretary and his advisers will be responsible for the consequences of a struggle between the Trustees and the Old Boys which should not be entered upon with a light heart.

If we had any desire to humiliate the Secretary we could quote the words of those of his friends and partisans who induced him to respect the rules and procedure of the Trustees and to abide by the result of his own errors. But under the present circumstance we heartily desire that Nawab Ishak Khan Sahab should be given another opportunity to win the confidence not only of all his colleagues, but of the entire community by devoted, fearless and unselfish discharge of his onerous duties as Honorary Secretary of the College and successor of Syed Ahmad Khan and Viqar-ul-Mulk. We trust he would be able to work smoothly with the Syndics in future, that they would make this easier for him by forgetting the past, by refraining from any undue criticism of details and by assisting him in the solution of the main problems of Aligarh which require unity of will, purpose and action, and that he too would forget the past, let bygones be bygones, and refrain from mistrusting his colleagues and from pressing for the revival of a dictatorship which to-day even a Syed Ahmad Khan would find both difficult and undesirable. Some designing and some well-meaning Trustees desired to patch up quarrels between the Honorary Secretary and such Syndics as had complained that they had been repeatedly insulted by him, and ordered that they should embrace one another. This is not the first occasion on which this panacea for all ills was discovered at Aligarh. We have some faint recollection of an occasion on which an irreverent and far from modest youth who was almost the same age as H. H. the Aga Khan and the Hon. the Raja of Mahmudabad had touched the feet of the Honorary Secretary in a public meeting in the most approved oriental fashion. Like plague inoculation which is a preventive for six months only, the effect of this remedy applied in April did not last beyond September. Let us hope that the more scientific western remedy of shaking hands would have more lasting effect. If the disagreement is due to differences of principles, then these make-believes are futile and more worthy of children than of the buzurgan-i-quam. But if the disagreement is due to malice implanted in the heart of any of those who have gaily enough shaken hands to-day, the settlement is not characteristic of Islam, as one grave and reverend signor proudly declared, but of infidelity in the truest sense of the word. Possibly the correspondent of the Pioneer shares our fears, for although he says that "all points of difference are amicably settled," he adds with transparent scepticism the significant qualification: "at least for the present."

We are anxious to believe that the settlement would last at least two years, but the information that we possess on an important aspect of these wretched squabbles is so ominous that we are a prey to greater doubts and anxieties than before. Could not Lord Hardinge earn some more Moslem gratitude by interesting himself personally in the affairs of Aligarh and giving such relief to Aligarh and its friends as he brought to the Mussalmans of Cawnpore and those that befriended them? The root-evil is in both cases the same, and His Excellency will not find it any more difficult to discover the real friends of Aligarh than he found to discover the real friends of Cawnpore Mussalmans.

It is somewhat surprising, and no less significant, that the Pioneer's Aligarh correspondent or correspondents, while mentioning that "almost all the important resolutions put forward by the Honorary Secretary were passed by large majorities," and adding that at times the meeting was "stormy" and the Honorary Secretary's resignation was imminent, do not say anything about the resolutions that were not passed and thus damped the triumph of the Honorary Secretary with an "almost," nor mention who was the author of the "storm." We have no desire to humiliate the Honorary Secretary, nor do we like to rob him of any satisfaction that he may have found in the meeting on New Year's Day. But it is necessary that there should be no mistake about facts.

A "Stormy" Meeting.

The Honorary Secretary proposed that he should be ex-officio member of the Syndicate in charge of the Boarding House, and sought to set aside the recent decision of the Syndicate in appointing to the vacancy Mr. Abdul Majid Khwaja B.A. (Cantab.) Bar-at-Law, late Law Professor of the College. Mr. Mohamed Ali asked for the ruling of the chair in favour of his contention that, as the motion involved a change in the rule which empowered the Syndicate to elect any Syndic to the office of Member in charge of the Boarding House, and authorised the Secretary to discharge the duties of the office only if no other member had been elected, the motion could not be discussed in any but an Annual Meeting of the Trustees. Many efforts were made by stalwart partisans to misinterpret the words of the Honorary Secretary's resolution but to no purpose. Another resolution was still more important and still more reactionary as it sought to revive the dictatorship of the Honorary Secretary which Nawab Viqar-ul-Mulk himself had nobly worked to control by means of a Syndicate. Unlike him, the present Honorary Secretary has not been able to carry his colleagues of the Syndicate with him, and each recurring Syndicate meeting has proved a "Crisis." A few narrow-minded partisans who wish to revive the old Cabal of the days of Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk whom they always wished to "run," have been misguiding the present Honorary Secretary, and one of them openly desired that the Syndicate should be a sort of Cabinet selected by the Honorary Secretary from among his most zealous partisans, forgetting that the Secretary ought not to be the leader of a party but the possessor of the confidence of all his colleagues. The advice of these partisans led the Secretary to threaten the Syndicate with his resignation shortly after he had taken over charge of his office, if Mr. Mohamed Ali was elected to the office of the Syndic in charge of Secular Instruction. Mr. Mohamed Ali was, however, elected, but resigned immediately afterwards, partly in recognition of the superior merits of Major Syed Hassan Bilgrami, who had returned to India after his own name had come up before the Syndicate, and partly in deference to the wishes of the Honorary Secretary. But instead of showing similar consideration for the feelings of his colleagues, the latter opposed the election of every one who did not come within the party orbit when vacancies were being filled last October. His opposition, however, proved unavailing, and the Syndics now elected against his wishes did not feel inclined to resign immediately afterwards in deference to his wishes, as that "irreverent" and "hot-headed youngster", Mr. Mohamed Ali, had done before. This led the Honorary Secretary to move in the last meeting of the Trustees that if the Honorary Secretary desired to appeal to the Trustees from the decision of the Syndicate, the Syndicate's decision should remain inoperative in the interval, but that the Honorary Secretary should be free to take whatever action he pleased in that matter. In other words, the Syndicate should merely record the will of the Honorary Secretary, and nothing should intervene between the omnipotence of the Secretary in what he chose to call an "emergency," and its subsequent ratification by the Trustees on pain of the Secretary's threatened resignation. Now the main function of the Syndicate was to intervene on such occasions, for the hundred odd Trustees could seldom meet, and no Honorary Secretary after Sir Syed Ahmed Khan could safely be trusted with absolute autocracy. The proposal of the Honorary Secretary was objected to on the ground that it involved a change in the constitution of the College which could only be considered in the Annual Meeting. This objection of Mr. Mohamed Ali was also upheld by the Chairman, who fortunately happened on both occasions to be the Judge of a High Court. On these two decisions the Honorary Secretary threatened to resign, and whatever "storm" there was, was the creation of the "Old Mohamedanism" which has evidently much to learn in the way of respect for law and the orderly conduct of meetings according to well-established procedure. The virtue of taking a "beating" in a "sporting" manner is perhaps too new-fangled and too much to expect from old world autocracy.

A Constantinople letter received by the last mail has the following about the activities of the Hilal-i-Ahmar:—

Turkish Activities "In the Kadrigah Hospital a course of instruction for ladies who intend to act as nurses in case of war is being given. In the very near future a school for male nurses will also be started by the Hilal-i-Ahmar. A Hospital is also going to be established either in Fatih or Jirrah Pasha for practical instruction. On the first day of the last Kurban Bairam small artificial flowers were distributed in the whole city. This is the Hilal-i-Ahmar Day. Owing to its being the first effort, and also because of the financial crisis due to the war only £4.560 were collected. This is no doubt a small sum, but if we remember that this amount was collected from the Hammals and the poorer classes of the capital in one day, it gives great satisfaction and inspires the workers with many hopes for the future. This will be done every year and in all parts of the Empire. If the same thing is done in India, a very great and useful service will be done." Other items of important news contained in the letter are the following:—(1) Enver Bey is in good health. He will be leaving next week for Berlin to undergo a third operation for appendicitis. (2) The "Reshadieh" and three other naval units of importance will be added to the fleet by the end of February. The Admiralty has made a contract with Messrs. Armstrong and Vickers to establish a ship-building yard, a floating dock and an arsenal in the gulf of Ismid and to repair and put in proper order the existing one in the Golden Horn. (3) The Porte has not agreed to appoint Europeans to control the reforms in Anatolia and the present policy is to oppose any such proposal. (4) The state of the Balkans is unsettled and it will be no wonder if there is a volcanic eruption there next spring. It may cause a general conflagration in the West as a punishment for its wilful injustice towards the East and Islam. (5) Europe is boycotting Turkey financially; but Russia's threats are empty. International relations are very critical. (6) Kemal Omer Bey will be leaving for India before the end of the month. He is late owing to unavoidable reasons. They had to ask for the permission of Sir Edward Grey about it and you know how long and troublesome the negotiations are especially in such delicate matters. So Kemal Bey has already started or will be starting very soon.

We have received the following letter from Khwaja Kamal-ud-din Sahab from England, which we feel sure would be read with great interest in India:—"The following ladies and gentlemen have declared to me their embrace of Islam after the noble example of the Rt. Hon'ble Lord Headley. Their Moslem names I give against their original names. (1) Rt. Hon'ble Lord Headley—Saifur-Rahman Shaikh Rahmatullah Farook. (2) Viscount Gug De Poitier (a French nobleman) Mawahibur-Rahman Shaikh Salah-ud-din Ahmed Poitier. (3) Captain Stanley Musgrave—Shaikh Abdurrahman. (4) Mr. Jereukewitz (a Russian nobleman) Ata-ur-Rahman Shaikh Jalal-ud-din Mohamed. (5) A lady from the Upper Ten (in London) (Name not to be disclosed)—Zainab. (6) Mrs. Clifford—Aysha. (7) Mrs. Violet Ebrahim—Fatima Ebraheem. (8) Mrs. Mee—Amaturrahman Qamrunnissa. (9) Miss Lilly Ransom—Aminatullah Haleema. There is another lady, Mrs. Gifford, but she has not seen me yet and no name has been given to her. There are also some twelve children of the above-mentioned persons." We can speak from first hand information now about the work of the Khwaja Sahab, and the highest compliment that we can pay him is that he reminds us of what we have read of the early missionaries of Islam who left hearth and home, and family and country, and wealth and comfort at the call of duty, and had one absorbing passion only, namely, the desire to carry the message of Unity and Submission to every living soul. His massive figure and rugged and unkempt appearance inspire you with the singleness of purpose of one for whom the world exists only for one divine purpose. He is no orator, but he impresses you with his absolute sincerity as no orator can do. Islamic missionaries never possessed an organisation worth speaking of, but their individual zeal succeeded where mere organisations failed altogether. Now that we have secured this individual zeal in the Khwaja Sahab, let us provide the organisation as well. He must be provided with ample funds so that he may not have to worry himself with financial difficulties. This can be done in two ways. Direct monetary contributions such as some kind friends have already sent from Bombay, and as a noble Moslem Ruler of a State has ordered as a permanent monthly grant; and enlisting as subscribers of Muslim Review, the organ of the Khwaja Sahab's Mission which is enlightening Europe and Christendom on the subject of Islam as it is believed in by Mussalmans and not supposed to be by Christians and atheists. In a later issue we shall discuss the subject at greater length, but we trust this appeal will induce all Mussalmans to contribute their mite to further the work which the Khwaja Sahab is so selflessly and vigorously doing.

The Comrade.

The Moslem League Ideal.

THE weather prophets of "Anglo-India" had been publishing forecasts of the Agra Session of the All-India Moslem League indicating thunder and lightning and a deluge of rain, and as usual the wish was father to the thought. Can we repress a feeling of sympathy for the prophets now that the events have proved them to have been more than usually foolish? Disappointments of so terrible a character should by rights provide us with more than one obituary notice from Bombay, Calcutta, Lahore and Allahabad for our agony columns. In situations such as this, the traditional denouement is "death due to heart-failure" or "suicide while temporarily insane." If, however, we are cheated of our "copy," we may be constrained to argue absolute heartlessness and permanent insanity in the prophets that have survived so clear a proof of their folly and falsehood. We are not permitted to say whether there was or was not some pale sheet lightning or "occasional local showers" in the Subject Committee. But in the League meetings themselves there was hardly even a "breeze."

However, it is an interesting question which of the two the weather prophets have to answer for more, their folly or their falsehood. Had not "Anglo-India" been an island almost entirely cut off from the mainland of India, we would have had no doubt whatever on the subject, for India knows only too well that the magnates who used to speak for and in the name of the Mussalmans until so recently as a couple of years ago, and were the shining stars of the Moslem firmament, are to-day pulled up sharply if they begin to talk in representative accents, and shine with no greater brilliancy than the handles of fired off rockets. But "Anglo-India" still holds aloft the charred and blackened stumps as if they were torches that could light up the path of progress.

Our esteemed contemporary, the Pioneer, publishes in its issue of the 2nd instant a letter written by "a Mohamedan gentleman of high social position," whose features we leave our equally irrepressible correspondent "Bambooke" to identify. Having written the letter, as it is stated, "on the eve of the holding of the All-India Moslem League Session at Agra," this Mohamedan gentleman of high social position indulged in some interesting anticipations. "Signs are not wanting to show," wrote the aristocrat, "that the sane and sober class . . . are going to assert themselves and wrest from the usurpers the power and strength they have appropriated to themselves."

So it seemed that Mr. Snodgrass was at last "going to begin"! But alas, so shaken is the confidence of this puissant "sane and sober class" in their own puissance that our "Mohamedan gentleman of high social position" provided himself à la "Daily Mail" with more than one loophole of generous dimensions if, in the event of the conflict ending in what is on such occasions euphemistically called a "reverse," the order of the day was survive qui peut. "It may be," wrote the doubting prophet, "that at the coming League Session the voice of steady guidance and sober wisdom may be drowned in the noise of irresponsible and hot-blooded youth, or perhaps that voice may keep its counsel and better not speak in the pandemonium that will be created." However, as things finally turned out, the "sane and sober class" did not succeed in wresting from "the usurpers the power and strength they have appropriated to themselves," nor did their voice "keep its counsel" and deny itself the pleasure of speech. There was no "pandemonium" except such as "the sane and sober class" themselves created, for they know as well as any other the sweet uses of "stirring up the masses."

It was feared at one time that efforts would be made to go back on the decision arrived at barely nine months ago as regards the ideal of a self-government suited to India, and that the big drum of the Right Hon. Syed Ameer Ali would be beaten with a vengeance. A day or two ago the United Provinces League, after a tough fight between technicalities and a sense of discipline, had decided that technicalities had won the day, and the ideal of self-government must wait for another year like an under-trial criminal when the U.P. League would decide whether it is to be the ideal of the U.P. League also, or is to be hanged by the neck till it is dead, and a much-needed lesson in discipline taught to what Mr. Ameer Ali and the Times call "the Lucknow Committee." But when the Subject Committee met to frame the resolutions for the Session, Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Qazilbash was the only one who desired an alteration in the ideal of the League. We have no desire to refer to the discussions in the Subject Committee for such discussions are never meant to be published. But some one—and evidently a re-actionary—has betrayed the confidence and supplied to the Press correspondents an incorrect and wholly misleading account of these discussions, and we shall be failing in our duty if we did not correct such wilful error. We believe that this was perhaps the first occasion on which Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Saheb attended a meeting of the All-India Moslem League, and we admire his courage in facing an audience such as the one assembled at Agra with a proposal which if accepted would have made the Moslem community extremely ridiculous. We admire still more the obvious honesty of Shaikh Ghulam Sadiq Saheb, and can genuinely sympathise with his conservatism though we cannot agree with it. But we must say we were not impressed with the zeal of the new convert with which one or two other gentlemen ran down the views of Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Saheb. Their attitude was too reminiscent of the Muallafat-il-Qulub who swelled the ranks of the True Believers after the taking of Mecca. A politician must of necessity be an opportunist; but opportunism is by no means the same thing as absence of convictions. Here we must make what amends we can to the Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi who took an early opportunity to re-iterate the faith he had expressed on his Presidential Address of the last Session in the ideal of self-government suited to India. Those who feared that he would swallow the words of nine months ago and confess his defection from last Session's political creed had obviously misjudged him. Far from making any attempt at backsliding Mr. Shafi emphasised his firm adherence to the League's creed, and although there were some members who might have opposed its adoption had they taken the trouble to attend the Lucknow Session last Easter, there was not one except Nawab Fateh Ali Khan Saheb who showed the least desire to move that the League's creed should be reconsidered. We, however, reserve for another issue our observations on Mr. Shafi's curious misreading, of the Presidents' views on the subject, which robs his tajdid-i-ahd (renewal of faith) of much of its grace, if not sincerity.

Another noticeable feature of the discussion was the silence of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali, who must have felt the needlessness of asserting what Lord Crewe had doubted, namely, the fact that they represented the political attitude and temper of Indian Mussalmans even more clearly than the Liberal Cabinet represented the political attitude and temper of Great Britain.

On the creed of the League the seal was set by the President, Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah, Kt., than whom a better choice could not have been made for this occasion. Sir Ibrahim has the inestimable advantage of the accumulated experience of twenty years of public life in perhaps the most business-like Province of India. His sturdy common-sense and clear insight give him an almost uncanny shrewdness, and all classes of people in that mosaic of communities, Bombay, recognise him as an indispensable figure alike in the Corporation, and the Legislative Council. Nor does Government place less reliance than the people of his Province in the judgment of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah, whom the Government of Bombay are as anxious to make their own nominee as the people to make him their elected representative. His Presidential Address is in many respects unique, and takes us back to the famous Amritsar Session of 1908 when the Hon. Sir Ali Imam leapt at one bound into lasting fame. We shall not subject this address to the mutilation and dismemberment of extracts and quotations, and must request our readers to read it in its entirety. We refer them particularly to the Presidents' own political faith, which we share in full, and which has the sanction of no less a person than His Majesty the King-Emperor. With a faith such as his, Sir Ibrahim would have been the last to quarrel with the League's ideal, and although self-government suited to India appears to him vague and indefinite, as compared with self-government on colonial lines which the Congress had adopted in the Allahabad Convention, he frankly acknowledges that the League must have had good reasons for adopting it in the form in which it is embodied in the League's Constitution.

The reasons to which Sir Ibrahim alludes will be apparent if we seek the assistance of contemporary history. When the Congress adopted the ideal of self-government, it had already been split up into two rival camps of Moderates and Extremists at Surat, and the latter were insisting on the Congress' declaring itself for an immediate programme of absolute Swaraj without the agis of the British Crown. The creed of the Congress was therefore the creed of the Moderates, and was in reality only a negation of the Extremists' creed. The League's creed is, on the contrary, the creed of its so-called Extremists—who are, however, far more numerous than the self-styled moderates—and it is a positive assertion of something to which the community could well aspire at a time when it had fully found its self-consciousness but was still unconscious of the object of its aspirations. In the Congress a group of men were taking a road that was dangerous, and the leaders of another and a much larger group directed it to a safer path. In the League, on the other hand, all were anxious to go somewhere, but no one knew whither to go. The well-known verse of Hafiz expressed the situation best—

خبرم نیست که منزل که مقصود کجاست

این قدر هست که بانگ جرمی ی آید

(I know naught of the destined goal. All that I know is that the sound of the caravan bell is heard.)

Thanks to H. H. the Aga Khan and Mr. Wazir Hasan, the direction in which the caravan must march is now known. The Congress ideal negatives one form of self-government even more clearly than it asserts another. The League's ideal only negatives the opposition to all forms of self-government which autocracy and bureaucracy imply, and this it negatives equally clearly. But when it comes to positive assertion, it can only assert the hypothesis of a self government suited to the peculiar requirements and changing conditions of India. The future cannot be cast in a rigid mould, and so incommensurable a thing as Life cannot be measured by a foot-rule. The League's is a voyage be of discovery. It knows that it cannot rest where it is, and it must seek and discover uncharted lands in the same direction in which the most progressive part of humanity has sought and discovered them. But the very hypothesis of uncharted lands suggests numerous perils of the sea, and if success is to be attained caution must be combined with courage.

Of such as still doubt the wisdom of striving towards the only goal consistent with self-respect and national dignity we shall only ask: Are you content with the life of Lotos-eaters, and satisfied with the ideal—if ideal it can be called—contained in these drowsy verses:

"Let us swear an oath, and keep it with an equal mind,

"In the hollow Lotos-land to live and lie reclined

"On the hills like Gods together, careless of mankind.

Or would you rather drink life, like Ulysses, to the lees, and with the restlessness that leads to progress, "roam with a hungry heart?" Is experience to be another name for retrogression, or is it to be—"An arch wherethro'

"Gleams that untravell'd world, whose margin fades

"For ever and for ever when you move"?

Will you say:

"Surely, surely, slumber is more sweet than toil, the shore,

"Than labour in the deep mid ocean, wind and wave and oar:

"Oh rest ye, brother mariners, we will not wander more"?

Will you not rather say:

"Come my friends,

"Tis not too late to seek a newer world,

"Push off, and sitting well in order smite,

"The sounding furrows; for my purpose holds

"To sail beyond the sunset, and the baths

"Of all the western stars, until I die,

"Tho' much is taken, much abides, and tho'

"We are not now the strength which in old days

"Moved earth and heaven; that which we are, we are;

"One equal temper of heroic hearts,

"Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will

"To strive, to seek, to find and not to yield"?

This was the question, and Moslem India has on two separate occasions answered it in the spirit of determined men and not of sleepy Lotos-eaters. But now that all semi-external attempts to alter the League's creed have so ignominiously failed, it is necessary to emphasise caution even more than courage, and we heartily support Sir Ibrahim's advice in this connection.

The League and its London Branch.

ALTHOUGH it is undoubted that "Anglo-India" was extremely anxious that the All-India Moslem League should go back upon the decision at which it had arrived last Easter as regards its ideals, and a bastard "split" conceived by the To Hockams of Moslem India was expected to see the light of the day in the "second Surat" after nine moons' gestation, no one can deny that genuine differences of opinion could also exist on the subject and assume formidable proportions. But we do not know how any one can convince us that equally genuine differences of opinion could exist on the subject of the Right Honourable Mr. Ameer Ali's demands, and how they could culminate in a "split" in the League. No one can deny Mr. Ameer Ali's great ability and the services he has rendered to Islam as the author of several valuable works on Moslem faith and history. In fact it would be an impertinence for most of us even to bear testimony to these undoubted services. Nor is it likely that any one will question the zeal and energy with which Mr. Ameer Ali worked in England for securing for Mussalmans separate electorates in Indian legislatures, though here honours were divided, and some of the proposals of Mr. Ameer Ali in this connection did not commend themselves to many of his co-religionists. These matters, however are not in question and those who intrude them in the present discussion prove either their incapacity for clearly judging political issues or their desire to cloud those raised by Mr. Ameer Ali in order to bring discredit on those with whom the right honourable gentleman chose to quarrel.

II

Now Mr. Ameer Ali demanded for the present an annual subvention of Rs. 1,800 for the London Branch from the All-India Moslem League, and while requiring "adequate guarantee that the support would be regularly and punctually forthcoming," desired it to be absolutely unconditional. Before Mr. Wazir Hasan became the Honorary Secretary of the All-India League the annual subvention was only Rs. 750; but soon after his appointment he increased it to Rs. 1,000, and was contemplating a further increase of Rs. 800, as Mr. Ameer Ali desired, when the latter sent his pre-emptory demand. His letter of the 22nd October which we have already published is, we are sorry to have to say, characteristic of the temper of its author. Needless self-laudation, unjust depreciation of the merits of other workers, assumptions as regards the absence of "factional methods of advertisement" in his own work which only served to betray him; false complaints of want of appreciation of his labours by his community; vain threats and unimpressive warnings—all these accompany this pre-emptory demand. Mr. Wazir Hasan could well have deferred replying to this letter; but Mr. Ameer Ali wanted that before he left England in three weeks' time the Honorary Secretary of the All-India Moslem League "will be good enough to inform us of the views of his Council." And because he did so in the most unexceptionable manner, the President of the London Branch deemed it fit to resign his high office.

The London Branch has never been self-supporting. In addition to the All-India League's subvention, H. H. the Aga Khan has been liberally assisting it, and we think Mr. Ameer Ali has been in receipt of funds from other leading Indian Mussalmans also. We believe the annual subscription of the London Branch is five shillings, and although there are several hundred Mussalmans in Great Britain, the total realised from members' subscriptions does not exceed £8 or a modest sum of Rs. 10 a month. This is because most of the Mussalmans in Great Britain resent the manner in which the Right Honourable Syed Ameer Ali acts as the dictator of the London League and brings out, after the least difference of opinion, his threadbare resignation. With reference to this, Dr. Abdul Majid, I.L.D., Lecturer at the Colonial Institute, Dr. Ansari who left England only in 1911, and Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami could unfold a tale which would be far from edifying. A recent instance of such differences of opinion was the London League's action over the Cawnpore affair. While Moslem India was seething with indignation the London League took no action whatever. But when Lord Hardinge announced a settlement of the question, the right honourable gentleman was among the first to come out with a resolution of thanks. Having no share in the grievance he must needs take the lion's share in expressing gratitude! But that was not all. He pressed on the London League a resolution of thanks to—Sir James Meston! Even the worm turns, and the Committee stoutly opposed the resolution. The right honourable gentleman was outvoted and in this extremity he turned for support to—Mr. Wazir Hasan! He asked the Committee whether it would pass the resolution if the Honorary Secretary of the parent League approved of it. We honour the Committee for their reply. They said that they were prepared to hear anything that Mr. Wazir Hasan had to say on the subject, but they must have an opportunity of criticising his suggestion if they felt disposed to do so, and would no more abide by an ex-parte judgment of the Indian League's Secretary than by the dictatorial pronouncement of their own President. For once the ever-ready resignation was not brought out, for it had the greatest possible chance of being accepted. When the Mussalmans resident in Great Britain assembled at the Waldorf Hotel, at the invitation of Mr. Sadiq Hasan, the universally honoured and admired son of Khan Bahadur Shaikh Ghulam Sadiq, and subsequently at Caxton Hall, at the invitation of the Committee formed at the previous meeting, they were all of one mind in condemning the manner in which Mr. Ameer Ali exercised his dictatorship, though they acknowledged submissively enough that the office-bearers would have to act in a semi-dictatorial manner in a League most of the members of which were only students. With a view not to offend Mr. Ameer Ali's susceptibilities they did not pass a resolution openly complaining of his manner of dictating to the members, but merely desired that under the auspices of the London League a meeting of all Moslem Indians resident in Great Britain should be convened, and steps should be considered for increasing the number of its members. Had Mr. Ameer Ali called such a meeting, he would have learnt things that it is necessary he should learn.

من نو سہی جہاں میں ہی تیرا فسانہ کیا

کہہ ہی میں تجھ کو خاق خدا غایبانہ کیا

But fearing a general condemnation Mr. Ameer Ali ignored this resolution of the meeting, and merely acknowledged the resolution asking him to withdraw his resignation, although here too he ignored the qualifications with which that request was carefully hedged.

III

While on the subject of the London League's financial position, it may not be out of place to mention that, considering the amount of work it does, its scale of expenditure is too high. A shorthand typist, who does ten times as much work for Mr. Ameer Ali privately and for the various concerns in which he is interested as for this moribund League, is employed permanently on the League's establishment. When Mr. Ameer Ali resigned last October—although he continued to work as before on the pretext that the accounts of the League were not wound up even after a month and a half—he had to look out for other resources wherefrom to pay his stenographer. The Red Crescent work was at a standstill. But there was still the proposal of a Mosque in London, which was so dear to him that he was even prepared for its sake to let the Working Mosque be leased out to Christian lodgers, rather than be handed over to Khwaja Kamal-ud-din for divine worship, for fear it may jeopardise his own project. He therefore tried to place the stenographer's salary on the London Mosque Fund; but thanks to the Committee the attempt failed and precautions were adopted to resist similar raids in future. Those who have been intimately connected with the London League also know that a considerable portion of the League's income is consumed by a subsidy secretly paid to a journalist who had at one time worked in India and is now one of the rising stars.

of hacks that run in and out of Fleet Street and Printing House Square. This amount does not in all probability appear on the books of the League, but a similar amount received from some Indian Moslem donor does not appear on the credit side either, so that the London League's Committee have no opportunity of objecting to a subsidy paid in return for puffs such as the Times, the Daily Telegraph, the Morning Post and the Daily Graphic have recently published.

IV

Now Mr. Wazir Hasan's reply to Mr. Ameer Ali's peremptory demand for a guaranteed permanent subvention was no more than this:

I do recognise that an efficient League can be maintained here only at considerably increased cost, and I have discussed this matter with H. H. the Aga Khan, who, I am glad to say, would be prepared to accept my considered suggestions in this behalf.

As regards the parent League itself, you cannot be unaware of the fact that if it has starved you here, it has had to starve itself also in India. But now that it is coming more and more into line with the wishes of the community, it is tapping new financial resources, and I hope on my return to succeed in a great measure in collecting together a large fund to serve as a Reserve Fund for our political work. Naturally the London Branch must be supported out of it, but our efforts to convince the members about your requirements here would succeed in proportion to the support which the London Branch gives to the work of the parent League and its projects.

We would venture to ask at this stage what there was in this reply to a distinctly offensive communication at which Mr. Ameer Ali could flare up—after three days' earnest search for supposed insults.

Now note Mr. Ameer Ali's reply:

You also indicate that the subvention from the Central League to the London League would be in proportion to the support the latter gives to the "work and projects" of the Central League. So far the London League has cordially supported all projects which, in its considered judgment, it deemed to be for the benefit of our people and has refrained, with the object of maintaining an appearance of solidarity, from giving expression to its disapproval of resolutions which it considered inexpedient in the best interests of the community. From this course it will not deviate under my presidency.

The condition which you now wish to impose on the discretion and judgment of the London League I regret I cannot accept. It is my settled conviction, repeatedly declared in public, that the Mussalmans of India, whilst claiming a full recognition of their legitimate interests and due consideration of their feelings and susceptibilities, should cultivate a sense of proportion and work in harmony and a true spirit of accord with each other and the Government.

So long as I am connected with this League I will submit to no outside dictation, nor allow it to adopt any programme without the fullest consideration of its consequences to our community.

V

This introduces the second and more important demand of Mr. Ameer Ali. As Mr. Mohamed Ali had pointed out at the meeting of the London League's Committee, no periodical subvention can ever be unconditional, unless it is to be a recurring gift. But in that case, he who asks for a free gift does not usually adopt the tone that Mr. Ameer Ali thought fit to adopt in his letters of the 22nd and 27th October. Even Mr. Ameer Ali could not have ventured to appeal to the world on the question of an unconditional subvention. But there was another demand artfully held back and this preposterous demand now showed to the world the entire hand of the right honourable gentleman. In 1908 when the London Branch was founded it was modest enough to call itself a branch, and the very first words of Mr. Ameer Ali's first annual report were "The London Branch", which also appeared on the cover of the report. More recently, however, Mr. Ameer Ali dropped this modest nomenclature and stood forth as "The All-India Moslem League, London." This, we presume, was one of those imperceptible silent "reconstitutions of the London League on a basis of co-ordination" of which Mr. Ameer Ali is so fond. He is a historian of considerable repute and we ask him whether it was not precisely this process of imperceptible silent "reconstitution" of Bengal, Deccan and Oudh "on a basis of co-ordination" which led to the disintegration and downfall of the once mighty Moghal Empire. There was this difference, however, between the two processes. The satraps of the Moghal Empire, although equally impatient of "outside dictation" or discipline—as the same thing may variously be called—took good care all the same to obtain from a weak Emperor a warrant for their own independence and insubordination. Rather than be such a weak Emperor, H. H. the Aga Khan has preferred to resign his own office, so that he leaves the All-India Moslem League and its London Branch to settle the matter without making him responsible for the consequences. But he has shown clearly enough that dictatorial and even semi-dictatorial methods are now out-of-date, and he, at any rate, is genuinely glad that it is so.

VI

On the 27th October—Mr. Ameer Ali unexpectedly felt, or declared that he felt—after full three days' cogitation in the course of which he showed his readiness to give a complimentary dinner to Mr. Wazir Hasan, and subsequently applied to the Lord Chancellor even for participation in a political dinner—that he had been insulted by Mr. Wazir Hasan in the letter of the 24th on the subject of the dinner. In that case, if he did not feel inclined to deal directly with Mr. Wazir Hasan, it was open to him to report the matter to the All-India League, which would no doubt have publicly censured Mr. Wazir Hasan if he had in fact insulted Mr. Ameer Ali. This he did not do, but in a wholly unexpected manner turned on his own League and threw his resignation in its face. Naturally the surprise of his League was unbounded. In the Committee meetings when his resignation was considered, not one word escaped any member in condemnation of Mr. Wazir Hasan. The sense of the meeting was that Mr. Wazir Hasan's explanation was both full and satisfactory. But even if Mr. Ameer Ali was not satisfied, why, asked the members, should he treat the London League as a Whipping Boy and visit on them the sins of Mr. Wazir Hasan? Mr. Wazir Hasan had already begged him to withdraw his resignation, and in the meeting even offered to withdraw the personal portion of his own letter in spite of his very full and adequate explanation. But Mr. Mohamed Ali at this stage thought it necessary to obtain both from His Highness the Aga Khan and Mr. Wazir Hasan the declaration that neither of the distinguished office-bearers could commit the All-India Moslem League to any new principle, particularly when it conflicted in the clearest manner with the existing rules of the Indian League. Thereupon everyone present begged Mr. Ameer Ali to refer the question of the unconditional subvention and the independent status of the London League to the All-India League for authoritative decision, and to withdraw his resignation pending the final settlement. But relying on the past success of such bluff and leaning, alas! on the now broken reed of the Moslem oligarchy, Mr. Ameer Ali spurned all such prayers. He had three well-known partisans at Lahore, Allahabad and Moradabad, and no wonder that they rushed to his aid without waiting for a moment for the publication of the full facts of the case, or as it happened, the correction of Renter's wholly misleading and incorrect cable. As for any regard for the central organisation, it is too much to expect a sense of discipline from those who preach it from the house-tops in these paradox-loving days. Of this we make no complaint. But the rest of India was silent in spite of the provocation supplied by Renter's serious error. Lord Roberts who had justified the Tripolitan massacres on the score of exigencies of war, when the whole civilized world, including all England, condemned it, was pressed into service as a friend of the Mussulmans, and presumably also their guide and philosopher.

VII

Now, if Mr. Ameer Ali was deliberately of opinion that it was inconsistent with his dignity and destructive of the usefulness of the London League to accept a conditional subvention from India and the status of a branch of the All-India League, he should not have waited on the flimsy pretext of winding up the League's accounts, but should have made his resignation immediately effective, and left it to the All-India Moslem League to accept or reject his terms. Or he could have withdrawn his resignation pending the Indian League's decision, and submitted the matter officially for its consideration and settlement in a few weeks. But the fact was that the silence of India disillusioned Mr. Ameer Ali very soon, and he only sought an opportunity of withdrawing his resignation after the departure of Mr. Wazir Hasan, but before the All-India League's Agra Session. This was so obvious that Mr. Mohamed Ali felt sure enough to cable to the Comrade from Marseilles to the same effect. Four days after this Messrs. Ameer Ali, Latif and Anik wrote to the London League Committee withdrawing their resignations, and three days later Renter cabled the Times version of the last scene in this opera-bouffe, which we publish elsewhere in full. Now here is a curious "re constitution." Mr. Ameer Ali resigned on the 29th October and Messrs. Latif and Anik, following the principles of Larkinsism, went on a "sympathetic strike." But the resignations could not take effect, for Mr. Anik was proving his abilities as an expert accountant by delaying over accounts of some hundred odd pounds for a month and a half. Everything, therefore, went on as usual as if Mr. Wazir Hasan and his so-called insults and dictation had never existed. No change whatever occurred in the rules or membership of the London League or the All-India League, but less than six weeks later, Messrs. Ameer Ali, Latif and Anik appear as usual on the scene one fine morning to announce the unusual fact that the entire universe had altered overnight. "The London All-India Moslem League has been reconstituted", clucks the Times as if over a new laid egg that had been hatched in the Printing House Square incubator. But on examination the egg appears to be the ancient product of 1908, re-labelled "Fresh" in 1911, and "New-laid" in 1913.

VIII

If this make-believe pleases Mr. Ameer Ali we have no reason to object. But legal fictions have the habit of occasionally over-riding the law and from being invented adjuvandi causa became innovations used corrigendi causa. To this we shall always strongly object, and it is with this object that we emphasize the facts of the case. With reference to this question, Mr. Wazir Hasan's opinion contained in his reply to Mr. Ameer Ali's last letter is well worth reproduction. He wrote:

You have, however, introduced in your letter a matter of principle which is of the most far-reaching importance, namely, the relationship of the All-India Moslem League—which I find you refer to on one occasion as the Lucknow League—and the London Moslem League. This is a subject which is happily wholly independent of our respective personalities, and I hope you will forgive me if I address you on the subject with some emphasis. I also hope you will not regard anything that I say as a reflection on yourself; nor I hope, will you consider anything that I may say about the work of the League in India as having any reference to myself, for I have no desire for self-laudation.

Now, I maintain that the policy of the Moslem League must be laid down in India and nowhere else, although naturally, and rightly, it must be laid down in consultation with the London branch whenever it is possible for it to send a representative to the League.

It is only in this manner that any work can possibly be done, and I cannot see how else a practicable programme and procedure of work can be arranged. This is very different from my dictating a policy to you and I need hardly assure you that such an idea never crossed my mind.

As regards the subvention from the All-India Moslem League to the London branch, I do not see what objection you have, or can have, to my pointing out the very obvious fact that it would be, as you say, "in proportion to the support the latter gives to the work and projects of the Central League." This is a matter of principle, and, as such, I believe, absolutely incontestable. What is more, it is a matter of fact and has to be accepted. Whether the London League has, as you say, "cordially supported all projects which, in its considered judgment it deemed to be for the benefit of our people," is a matter on which it would be idle for me to express an opinion. But it may be that the "considered judgment" of the London League may differ from the "considered judgment" of the All-India Moslem League, and I presume that in matters in which your League has not yet supported the All-India League its "considered judgment" did differ from that of the All-India League. Here is, therefore, an opportunity which you should welcome of a discussion between two responsible representatives of the All-India League and the London League, and I have every hope that such a discussion would result in mutual satisfaction, and that the interests of our community will thereby be promoted. However, as I have said before, everything is subject to the guiding principle that in the last resort the opinion of the All-India Moslem League must prevail, and its policy must be laid down in conformity with the wishes of the entire community, and in India, and not according to the wishes of any individual, not even of the most eminent among us, in this country.

Mr. Wazir Hasan's opinion was not the expression of his individual thoughts but stood on the firm basis of the League's Constitution. The London League forms part of "The Organisation of the All-India Moslem League", according to section 8 of its rules. "The London Branch of the All-India Moslem League" is declared in section 30 to be deemed to have been affiliated to the All-India Moslem League "within the meaning of these rules," and the All-India Moslem League may, therefore, disaffiliate it under section 31. It is rules of this character that the Honorary Secretary is called upon to enforce, and under section 36 he "shall exercise all powers and discharge all duties laid down by and incidental to the enforcing of these rules." And yet Mr. Ameer Ali demanded that Mr. Wazir Hasan should personally acknowledge publicly that the London League was not a branch but an association independent of the All-India Moslem League and of co-ordinate status! Even if the London League may tolerate such anocracy in its office bearers the All-India League cannot submit to it.

IX

Mr. Ameer Ali had been pressed to submit this matter for the decision of the All-India Moslem League; but instead of doing so, he commenced an intrigue with the Provincial Leagues, with the result that while the Madras League snubbed him in the most effective and dignified manner by declaring that a decision of this question lay outside its own province and only in the cognizance and jurisdiction of the parent League, the parent League was not approached even by the declared partisans of Mr. Ameer Ali. The rules of the League are therefore unchanged, and so long as they remain unchanged no other interpretation is possible than the obvious one which the Honorary Secretary has put upon them. One thing, however, has happened and the President of the Agra Session, who cannot be accused of any kind of partisanship, while considering the incident of Mr. Ameer Ali's resignation as closed, made the following emphatic declaration:—

There is, however, one point in connection with the recent discussion which requires to be emphatically laid down. The London League must be regarded as a branch of the Parent League, as its very name indicates, and must work on the line of policy laid down in India. Differences of opinion must be welcomed, but differences of principles cannot be allowed. Constitutional means are open to each Branch of the League to raise questions of principle, but in that case the required procedure must be implicitly followed.

X

It is interesting to note the Pioneer's comment on the final settlement of the question. "In other words", writes our contemporary, "the policy of the London League is to be shaped by the League in India. Mr. Ameer Ali must no longer be allowed to 'paddle his own canoe'; he must take his orders—from the Comrade and Lucknow. . . . Having resigned rather than submit to such dictation, is he now in humble and contrite spirit going to Canossa?" Now the Pioneer evidently considers itself cheated of its dues because in the first place, no shoes were harled about at Agra where a "second Surat" had been predicted, and not even a "split" occurred; and in the second place because, even before the Agra session commenced, Mr. Ameer Ali thought better of the matter and withdrew his pretensions at the same time that he withdrew his resignation. Now if anything is certain, it is this that resignations no longer constitute a virtue, and few are prepared to recognise them even as a necessity. He who tenders a resignation in the belief that with its acceptance the world would come to an end is very soon likely to be taught that the world is at least as presumptuous as he, and thinks nobody to be indispensable. But whatever the general practice, we feel sure that Mr. Ameer Ali will not take his tip from the Pioneer and say in the spirit of defiance, "Non Canossamus." The joke has been tried too often, and it has now ceased to be even amusing.

م د ہونڈی پیرن کہ جنازہ کدھر گیا
مرنی کی اسی روز اڑانا خبر غلط

(To send us wandering in search of the funeral procession by falsely announcing one's death every day!)

Mr. Ameer Ali has to take orders neither from the Comrade nor from Lucknow. He has to take orders from a power—and it is undoubtedly a greater power to-day than it was ever before—from whose dictation no public man can pretend to be free. It is the power of the public voice, a voice that may at times be husky with excitement, or unsteady according to the influences to which it is susceptible, but which is nonetheless, sufficiently clear to-day, and which with the growth of education and enlightenment is bound to grow clearer and clearer every day. The London Branch, from its very nature cannot be treated in the same manner as Provincial Leagues. Its unequal composition makes its position one of peculiar delicacy. Financially London cannot support the All-India Moslem League and is itself far from self-supporting. For the most part the London League members are young students from whom the direction of the League's policy cannot obviously be expected. A claim, therefore, of independence or co-ordination can only be the personal claim of Mr. Ameer Ali, and as such, it means either a claim to dictatorship or a confession of impatience of all control. Now, as Mr. Jinnah explained at Bombay, in the course of his speech as Chairman of the meeting convened under the auspices of the Zia-ul-Islam, to welcome Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali back to India, "the fact is that the Mohamedans have passed the stage of political infancy and have grown up to the stage of manhood, and therefore, can no longer be controlled by dictatorial policy from without or within; they will not obey even the semi-dictatorial policy of a few individual leaders as they did a few years ago." But the Mussalmans are to-day as anxious as at any time previous to this to co-operate with all leaders of public opinion, and they will listen to advice from genuine well-wishers as respectfully as people who have begun to think for themselves can ever do. There is room enough in the councils of the community for men of the undoubted ability and great experience of Mr. Ameer Ali. If he is willing to co-operate with them, they will work at all times as loyal comrades.

XI

But Mr. Ameer Ali's conception of co-operation must undergo some modification before any useful work can be done. Throughout the stay of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali they were not even once informed of any meeting of the London League, and were subjected to considerable amount of rudeness on the only occasions on which they attended such meetings. On the last of these occasions Mr. Mohamed Ali was asked to leave the meeting; but as Mr. Wazir Hasan's presence was tolerated and His Highness the Aga Khan was pressed to attend, although both of them were as much non-members of the London League as he, Mr. Mohamed Ali successfully insisted on taking part in the meeting. Surely Mr. Ameer Ali could not have forgotten that what he calls the Lucknow League more than once invited him to preside at its annual sessions, and Mr. Wazir Hasan even borrowed the sum of Rs. 6,000 which was remitted to him for the expenses of the journey. If the Secretary or a Councillor of the League took the trouble of going to London without requiring the London League to pay their expenses, could they expect to be turned out even from its meetings as non-members? Co-operation involves a bilateral consideration, and if Mr. Ameer Ali desires it the All-India League will certainly not close its doors on him. But it expects similar consideration for its own office-bearers and members, and those who desire that the two Leagues must loyally co-operate with each other should take steps to make Mr. Ameer Ali realise the full significance of co-operation.

Phantom Figures.

VIII.

THE OPIUM OFFICER.

THAT the two Departments that bring most money to the revenue, and which carry on their work with freedom from mistakes and washing of official linen in public; should be officered entirely by members of the Domiciled community and Indians, is a strong refutation of the stale argument about the need for importing candidates from Great Britain to fill up vacancies in every branch of the public service. The European who (very wisely) settles down in India finds himself worse treated in the matter of employment for his sons than either Mohamedan or Hindu parents. However, by declaring his children to be "Statutory Natives" he is graciously permitted to find occupation for them as Postal or Opium officers.

One cannot help thinking that the Supreme Government of that day relied on the sentimental dislike some Europeans might feel against classifying their offspring under the designation just mentioned, for the dislike and dread of most officials towards those of their countrymen, who elect to abide permanently in India, is one of the foolish political fads possessing the mind of your average Civilian. With the abolition of the Opium Department yet another opening will be closed for young Europeans and Eurasians anxious to earn a livelihood in the land of their adoption. Threatened men, however, live long, so one may describe the afyun-wallah Sahib in the hopes that his departmental demise may be postponed yet awhile. When the poppy ceases to be grown and the state finally abandons a source of profit under the mistaken notion of benefiting the virtuous Chinese, a sketch of the Opium officer, as he was in the flesh, may have a melancholy interest for students of "things which have been to begin with," the pay of the opium officer is hardly a living wage; supposing him to follow the customs and maintain the same style of comfort as do other Sahibs. Luckily the necessity for spending many months out in camp helps to keep his head just above the waves of impending debt, and he usually has acquired the useful knack of making his eight annas go as far—or further—than most other folks' rupee.

There are alleviations for the somewhat minor position occupied by the Opium Officer—whether he be a Sub-Deputy or merely an Assistant in the Department. More than any other official, (save perhaps the Canal Officer), he is brought in close touch with the varieties of rural India; the habits, means of livelihood, and characteristics, of that patient, hardworking individual known as the ryot. He gains opportunities for seeing the problem of administration from both points of view, that of the rulers and that of the ruled, and if blessed with ordinary intelligence and a dislike for the devious methods common among certain types of the Indian subordinate official, could render valuable help to Magistrates and Police officers, were he sure that such assistance would be thankfully received. Frequently its being preferred is either resented, or regarded as troublesome meddling by a person not directly concerned with executive functions. Being thus thrown for the major portion of his time among dwellers on the Indian countryside, a man in the Opium imbibes a taste for some pursuit or hobby connected with the past, or present, life of the Indian agricultural population. He may take up the study of folk-lore; or collecting antiquarian details; bunts after ancient coins; or researches into the natural history of animals found within his jurisdiction. We knew one Mohammedan Opium Officer who was skilled in tracing the origin of the rude ballads, sung at village gatherings by the Hindu peasantry of the Gorakhpur Division. Another—an Eurasian—who was an antiquarian of no mean pretensions and further a naturalist credited with several original discoveries of the life and peculiarities of beast and insects to be met with in the District where he was employed. A third individual had made himself into a capital amateur photographer and also a skilled mechanic. The freedom from the excessive burden of desk work which now deprives, (pace Lord Crewe), members of most Indian Departments of time and taste for indulging in useful and occupation outside their official duties has resulted in transforming the majority of Opium men into from mere performers of routine labour, and the work of their appointment into entertaining companions, whose conversation comes as a welcome change from the customary gossip of a small station. Even in the matter of departmental toil they differ from other "flies on the wheel" of Government. At certain seasons of the year, they have to undergo the trial of high pressure conditions, not having more than half an hour to themselves between the hours of dawn and dusk. I refer to annual weighments and the distributing of advances for next years' sowing of the poppy; a plant possessed of many beneficial features which are conveniently ignored by, faddists of the Anti Opium Party. As a splendid and sustaining stimulant during prolonged physical exertion; as a prophylactic in tracts infected by malaria; and as a help in some kinds of fever, besides acting a first rate anodyne in cases of severe bodily pain; the discredited poppy can claim to be pronounced a "boon and a blessing" to Indians—if not to all men. This, however, is not the place for arguments against the abolition of opium growing, but a sketch of those engaged in watching over its cultivation. "Weighments" commonly go on at the hottest time of the year, when a fiery loo is attaining full force and an April sun blazes with tantalising glare for the best portion of the day. Surrounded by a crowd of sweltering, and not over fragrant, rustics—not a curled and scented darling among them—the Opium Officer pursues the monotonous, if important, business of checking the amounts brought to the Go-down by hundreds of cultivators and seeing that each man's quota is duly recorded, and the account between him and the Department truly adjusted. After a fortnight or more—according to the area under opium in a District of such incessant work he surely earns the slack time which succeeds weighments, and is richly entitled to a holiday in the Hills: always, supposing his finances allow a luxury of that sort. Throughout the monsoon he might be described as resting on his official oars, not having much correspondence beyond a few routine papers and Reports to bother him. When the rains approach their end, he once more bursts forth into spasmodic vigour, and hurries from headquarters to a Tahsil bungalow in order to issue advances to intending cultivators, employing his powers of argument, and persuasion to keep the opium area up the expected standard. In one respect he is fortunate as compared with his fellows in the Police, Public Works, and other Branches of the Public Service, in that he is not called upon to please many masters. If he is a Sub-Deputy, his only "boss" is the Agent,—a Civilian, of course, of which class, but one now remains since the closing down of the Patna Agency. Consequently he is delivered from those visits of inspection, and the necessity for keeping a numbers of big-wigs of various degree informed as to his work, resembling a Free Lance rather than an official subordinate to a shoal of superiors. Still an Opium Agent has great powers for good and ill where the officers under his charge are concerned. Probably given that billet as a satisfactory way of disposing of his demands for something in his own line of work, the Agent—at all events during his first year of office—knows very little of the internal working of the Department or the peculiarities of poppy cultivation, and manufacture or the existing Regulations.

If he is a sensible man he contents himself with quietly going insight into the manner his officers are working, and in letting them find in him a sympathetic adviser and friend, not a tyrant seeking whose prospects he can mar or utterly ruin. To the credit of the Civil Service, an Agent of the latter type is rare, an exception to the general rule, so when the Department happens to suffer from an infliction of this kind, it becomes all the more noticeable. One province we know endured a trial inseparable from the chief authority being vested in a person manifestly unfitted to have gentlemen—either Europeans or Indians—under his control, and many are the stories related of his arbitrary acts; his refusal of leave (justly due), on any frivolous reasons, and—worst of all—a practice he had of listening to tales from Indian subordinates—gomashyas, mohawirs, et hoc genus omne—against the immediate superiors of his favoured spies. It would hardly be possible for an European in a responsible post to lower himself more in the estimation of those under than did the individual in question during his tenure of an Agency. When no more fields bloom with white poppy flowers and a policy of Pharisaical righteousness for suppressing an imaginary vice—so long as this does not affect the pockets the British tax-payer—has finally terminated a Department so valuable for Indian revenues, the last Opium Officer will be able in retirement on his humble pension to ponder over the infatuation of the Government, and mournfully recall his morning rides in the cold weather; his free chats with zamindars and their tenants; the Sturm und Drang of weighments, and the delight of finishing his advances with a knowledge that he too—in his way—was materially helping to postpone the evil day of new and increased taxation where India and its inhabitants are concerned.

LEMOINTUS.

Short Story.

Syed Rahman.

Bhundi was a quiet little station in Bengal. Its yearly excitement was a four days' meet at Christmas. This giddy period and the occasional change of its officials were the only things that kept the European inhabitants from falling into a state of coma. They prided themselves, without rancour, but with a quiet conscious feeling of merit, on the fact that never had an Indian been posted among them in any of the Government offices, and that their small club house showed an uninterrupted row of white faces. So it was with no little consternation and a hasty seeking of reasons that they heard their next Assistant Magistrate was a young Mohammedan just appointed. Syed Rahman was a boy, just a nice fresh boy, a very good specimen of English Public school and Varsity training. He played most games well, cricket and racquets enthusiastically, rode to hounds, danced well, bridged better, sang college choruses in a boyish baritone; and I don't believe had ever paused to consider whether there was any difference between himself and his many English chums. In fact there was none because none had ever been made.

His chums had deeply bemoaned the fact that Bengal was to be the scene of his official career. They solemnly advised him to work the powers that be and get out of it. He heard various reports of hideous unhealthy districts with but one or two wretched officials living in solitary state. So when he heard that Bhundi was healthy, had a Club, boasted a race-course and a four days' meet, he mentally shook hands with fate and took there two ponies and a complete social equipment.

He hastened to call and had no luck, finding everyone out. But in court the next day he came across the kind old Judge. Campbell was of a fast dying type of Civilian, a Sahib and as good a judge of men as of horses. He summed up the well-mannered lad and found him very similar in ideas and conversation to his own son in a British regiment. Thereupon he pitied him greatly and, with large-hearted hospitality, invited him to share his bachelor abode. Rahman accepted gladly and gratefully. "Are you sure I shan't be putting you out, Sir, I should like it. Tents are very jolly, but I really believe one can have too much of them." He arrived next day and Campbell surveyed his traps with approval. Neat, useful trunks, backed by gun cases, a cue case, bats, polo sticks, golf clubs. It pleased the old man to see that he looked after his ponies before even enquiring which room he was to occupy, and that at dinner he gently, respectfully, but firmly, lectured his host on the condition of his stables; just as his son had done. He spent his first three evenings in putting them right with his own hands. By this time Campbell realised that he had done himself a good turn; Rahman was young, enthusiastic and amusing, and added to these qualities a truly oriental tact which made him a delightful companion. When the strenuous settling-in was finally accomplished, he began to take an interest in social life. Enquired particulars as to the Club, etc., and wondered briefly whether there were any men of his own age in the place. It was at this juncture that Campbell took upon himself a father's duty. He began by taking Rahman to the Club hoping that the boy's youthful charm would soften the ladies and his sporting instincts interest the men. In some measure he was successful with the latter, but the former were stonily aloof. Rahman jumped to this at once and enquired the reason. Over the after-dinner cigar Campbell very very kindly told the boy of race prejudice, Anglo-Indian susceptibilities, and numerous other delicate matters. Told to this lad they seemed, even in the old man's ear, ridiculous, though in many a time the bumpiness of some "England returned" student had made the arguments seem sound, the prejudices right. The boy's proud eyes never wavered, they held Campbell's right through, surprised, hurt, then a little savage, till the old man, leaning forward, held out his hand with a final word. "To me" he said, "you are as my own son, in no way different." "You are very good, Sir," said the boy. "I realise now how good," and the brown eyes softened gently. "Are there no men of my own race sufficiently advanced to receive me and understand my ways," he added. "Of course, lad, many, fine fellows too some of them; but—not exactly here; still there are one or two delightful men, orthodox, who I'm sure would gladly see you in their houses." Here the matter dropped. Rahman did not give up the Club; that, he felt, was unsporting. But he avoided the society of the ladies entirely. He was rewarded, for the men liked him better and better, and very soon there was not one who remembered at any time when talking to Rahman that he was addressing an alien. The ladies, too, would gladly now have been friendly, but the lad's pride forbade any intercourse there. There was no sporting ground on which they were equal, and other terms he rejected. He lived on with Campbell perfectly happy, content to have spent his life thus. This, of course, could not be. Repeated invitations from his dead father's people made him journey off up to Lahore the first month's leave he got. When he returned, Campbell felt instinctively that all was not well. He seemed to have grown older and the Judge wondered what had done it. Not disillusionment, he knew, for Rahman told his friend the first evening of his return how agreeably surprised he had been. His people were orthodox, but advanced. The men were sportsmen and sahibs. They kept a boobyery pack of stamping hounds, they preserved their jungles, they made him look a baby at polo. They were jolly fellows too, full of anecdote and puns. The ladies also he found charming, though a good deal more orthodox than the men. He repeated this slowly twice, and the Judge wondered if here lay the rub. Every one had been most kind to him and he was very glad he had studied Urdu and Persian as extra languages. His father had wished it. But trouble lay at the back of his eyes and he rode too hard at all hours. It worried Campbell. He more than liked the boy—their year together had consolidated their friendship. One morning upon the pile of letters on the tray was one for Rahman addressed in Urdu character of a distinctly feminine type and still smelling of atar. The boy took it up first, looked surprised, opened and began to read it. To Campbell watching him closely his eyes were always an index. The surprise faded into delighted consternation, which gave place to perfect tenderness; but at the close of the letter the trouble came back doubtless and perplexity seemed to take a share. Without any remark Rahman went off to office; but during lunch hour he tried raw country birds in the hot sun, and he was riding instead of playing racquets in the evening. When Scutorth, one of the boy's special friends, came into the Club for bridge, he answered the Judge's enquiry with, "I left Chips still timing his ponies to do furlongs in impossibly quick times. I retired defeated and weary." Campbell brought the rubber to an abrupt close by declaring three in "no trumps," instead of doubling his opponents, and hurried off home.

In a long chair in the verandah sat Rahman, moody and stormy. He did not see Campbell till the latter was standing beside him. Then he jumped to his feet, and with his usual politeness offered the older man his chair, which was accepted.

They both puffed in silence for a bit, then as it grew dark Rahman suddenly burst forth, "I think the Mahamedan custom of purdah is ridiculous. It leads to all sorts of deception and intrigue. Besides it's barbaric." "Do you think so?" said Campbell, flicking the ash off his cigar with his little finger, "I personally find as much deceit among the women in Europe. Take a suburban or a country town in England. Until education fits them to take their place and hold it I think the purdah is as good a sphere as any. The mere breaking through purdah shows no real advancement and does not, so far as I can see, broaden their outlook. We have plenty of chances of judging specially in Bengal. It is when education and the right sort of upbringing is conjoined with the coming out, that we see a very fine example of womanhood." "But surely if they do not start by breaking down this ridiculous system there can be no advance." "What makes you think that? A woman brought up in purdah is not fitted to take her right place in the world, and why force her into a false position, and thus create a whole generation of beings such as I alluded to?" "But—ent" broke in the younger man. "Let me finish," said Campbell, "I consider the Mahamedan community in a very strong position. They can see the error of both the purdah system and the freedom of women with ill-regulated minds. This being the case the younger generation of daughters must surely score. They can from their youths be trained properly, given the wide education of men and some profession to occupy their minds when household duties are done. An intelligent woman, I speak of our class, has finished all her domestic duties in a couple of hours. Then, again, marriage is not a profession and never while it is so looked upon will it be a success. You must have heard in England of the great demand for divorce to be made easier; you must have noticed the disturbed state of very many married couples. Do you want your people to go through this, or to avoid it wisely? If your women are domestic dolls now, which assertion I rather doubt, is it better to let them remain such in character expecting more from them or to wait till they can take their rightful place as women; beings with a mind, a soul, an intellect as sound as any man's?" A long silence ensued during which Rahman paced up and down the verandah, and in the dusk it was not possible for Campbell to see what effect his words were having. Suddenly the boy stopped. "I believe," he said, "that I agree, still don't you think a girl of 15 or 16, if taken out of purdah and really well educated for four or five years, would not remain a doll in mind? I speak of a superior sort of girl, one whose mind, even at that age, might be filled with some sense of what a great sphere a woman's is?" He paused questioningly. "I spoke in generalities," said the Judge, "No doubt there are individual cases and of course a lot would depend on the sort of society that the girl had after her training was finished. If she is to be associated with a very ordinary circle of people, let us take this station for example, I should think it very probable that her five year's training would not be enough. Her only companions of her own sex would be women whose minds do not rise above the petty domestic details of their own and each other's affairs, social, moral and physical. Their reading is limited to sensational novels and fashion papers. The height of their ambition is to end as the wife of a Lieutenant-Governor. You understand, of course, that I speak in generalities and take my examples from the social life in India as I have found it. Then there is another point of view. Might not her example be followed by many who did not even have this special five years' training and might not the community be led to emerge half fledged? Is it right that one individual should for an uncertain experiment chance injuring many others? Say, this woman had a daughter, and from earliest youth brought her up to freedom. In this she would be justified, for the example set would be an excellent one."

The Judge's quiet convincing voice fell to silence. He rose to his feet, laid his hands on the shoulders of the boy, who stood silently before him, and then spoke again. "Marry her my son in the way her mother would wish; train her yourself and then together bring up your daughters as fearlessly, broadly and carefully as your sons." Rahman's puzzled eyes rested on Campbell and then he laughed. "I knew you'd guess, Sir, I'll think over every word you've said." The outcome of this conversation was a hurried visit to Lahore which obliterated all chance of another epistolary indiscretion. The old man guessed that, though he was only told that the boy's uncle, delighted, was arranging a marriage for him with the daughter of a neighbour whom of course Rahman had only seen in photos, but of whom he had heard much. Rahman's boyish laugh rang delightedly once more through the rooms and Campbell hid the tears in his eyes behind a law report. He knew he soon would loose another son. But that was nature, and the way of the loosing was Well.

10th January.

The Comrade.

13

All-India Moslem League.

Presidential Address.

Sir Ibrahim Raimtulla, Kt., in the course of his Presidential Address at the Agra Session of the Moslem League said:—

GENTLEMEN,—I wish to tender my grateful thanks to you for the high honour you have conferred upon me in inviting me to preside over your deliberations at this Annual Session of the Moslem League. I clearly recognise that it is the highest honour in the gift of the Community and my appreciation is all the greater because it was spontaneously conferred.

At a time like the present, when differences of opinion are strongly asserting themselves, and there is a general feeling that the Mussalmans of India have politically reached the "parting of the ways," you will, I am sure, recognise how difficult is the position of your President. Gentlemen, I accepted the difficult task which you have invited me to undertake as a call of duty, and I have done so in the firm conviction that you will all extend to me your earnest help and assistance in the discharge of my duties and will willingly share the responsibility which as Mussalmans attaches to each one of us. The large and representative gathering of Mussalmans from all parts of India who have assembled here to-day, at great personal inconvenience, proves to my mind beyond the shadow of a doubt the strong vitality for organized political and public life possessed by our Community. I am confident that I may safely rely upon your sincere co-operation in making an earnest effort to bridge over the difficulties which confront us in a spirit of considered compromise, so that instead of parting we shall all become solidly united again, and in this way adopt the only line of action which will ensure the steady progress of the cause we have all at heart. In all organizations, such as ours, differences of opinion must prevail. It is the application of different minds to common problems and the full and free discussion of the various aspects of given questions which lead to the formation of matured decisions and advance public interest. Holding these views I am always anxious to welcome reasoned discussion of all questions affecting our progress and well-being—with this reservation, that after a decision has been reached, we should loyally accept it and zealously work on the lines so laid down. This policy does not necessarily mean that a decision once taken should be irrevocable. No policy in this democratic age can be laid down which should be regarded in the light of the laws of the Medes and Persians—unalterable and fixed for all time. The decision so taken should be accepted as a basis to work upon, until such time as the general body of opinion may change in view of altered circumstances, greater experience, detection of flaws and drawbacks not foreseen, and similar causes. These decisions should then be reconsidered, and modified or altered as the then prevailing conditions may require. What appears to me of the utmost importance is that all discussions should be conducted on non-party and non-personal grounds, and people finding themselves in a minority should loyally accept the clearly ascertained decisions of the majority and sincerely co-operate in a spirit of military discipline in advancing the public cause on lines so laid down. Unless we are all prepared to work in furthering the cause of our community on these lines, I am afraid our progress will be retarded and very serious difficulties will continue to confront us. May I appeal to you Gentlemen, and through you to the whole of the Moslem community in India, to work for our common interests in a spirit of broad-minded toleration and sincere co-operation? If we do so free from all personal considerations, bearing in mind nothing but what is best for the common good, our progress will not only be sure and certain, but will be at a rate gratifying even to the impatient spirits amongst us.

THE CAWNPORE MOSQUE.

You are all aware that for several months the Cawnpore Mosque question greatly exercised the minds of the Moslem community in India, and it must have been with feeling of relief that you noticed that it was happily solved by the far-sighted statesmanship of H. E. Lord Hardinge, our cateemel and popular Viceroy. May I, at this juncture remind you of the noble sentiments to which His Excellency gave expression when, at Delhi on the occasion of his official entry into the new capital of India, he presided at the first meeting of the newly constituted Legislative Council, meeting for the first time in Delhi? In the memorable speech which he delivered on the occasion, His Excellency said:—

"Still, whatever I may feel on the subject of the crime itself, I only wish to assure you and the whole of India that this incident will in no sense influence my attitude. I will pursue without faltering the same policy in the future as during the past two years and I will not waver a hair's breadth from that course."

Who will venture to deny that Lord Hardinge has faithfully fulfilled the statesmanlike pledges he gave to the people of India on that occasion? The parental interest he has shewn towards our countrymen has rightly won for him the hearts of the people. This incident is valuable not merely as an episode in the history of this country; the lessons which such a policy illustrates is of unestimable value, both to Great Britain and to India. Lord Hardinge has shewn what cures sincere and fatherly sympathy, not in mere words of which we have had plenty in the past, but in actual practice, can easily accomplish. It has always been a marvel to me why the British officials in India do not make a studied attempt, by means of sympathy and consideration in practice, to win over the hearts of the people of this country. May I venture to tell them how ridiculously easy it is to succeed in this direction? One of the prominent characteristics of the Indian people is their highly developed sense of gratitude. In how many places, in times of stress and strain, have not the Indian people come to the rescue of Englishmen in the past, and in how many cases have they not gone to the length of sacrificing their own lives to protect the lives of Englishmen? If an attempt is seriously made by official India, as a religious duty, to try and see Indian problems from the Indian point of view, and if the official always keeps before his mind's eye that he is the servant of the people of India, he will capture the Indian imagination as nothing else will do. We shall not then hear the lamentations which are being constantly dinned into our ears, of the growing difficulties of the governance of this country. It is his policy, which Lord Hardinge has laid before him and which he is trying to carry out in practice, that has so endeared him to the Indian people. Will the lesson be taken to heart by the official world in India? If it is, they will not only smooth their own path but the path of those amongst the Indian public men who have been striving in the face of grave obstacles and impediments to make officials realize how potent the effects of sympathy and consideration are.

PLEA OF WEAKNESS.

But there is a class of cronkers who have said before and will say again, that it is all very well to talk about winning the hearts of the people; but what about British prestige? If Government are to surrender to every agitation started against official measures, the work of administration will become impossible and the British people under these circumstances may as well clear out of the country. It is this class of irresponsible people, though they may belong to the British race, which is largely responsible for any existing estrangement. It is people who imagine that the "mailed fist" is the best policy, who are really responsible for the increasing difficulties which confront the official world. Let us calmly and judiciously examine what this cry logically means. It can only mean that once an official has taken a decision, in most cases without consulting the views of responsible people amongst those who may be affected by such decision, and has got it ratified by Government on ex parte statements, it shall be irrevocable. If the decision proves distasteful to the people concerned, they have constitutionally two courses open to them—(1) to petition Government, bringing to their notice how hurtful such decisions are and to request a reconsideration of the question; (2) to continue the agitation by holding meetings, by getting interpellations put in the Legislative Councils, and by agitating in the press.

If the people affected confine themselves to the first remedy, the decision in most cases is adhered to on the ground that there was no real feeling against it amongst the people concerned.

If the agitation is carried on on the lines indicated in the second alternative, it is contended that the agitation was manufactured by a few discontented men, that they were unnecessarily exciting the people who are always supposed to be quite content to accept decisions emanating from Government sources. When this plea, however, is found untenable and the officials are obliged to recognise that the agitation is well-founded and calls for remedial measures, it is even then strongly urged that no change or alteration should be made, in view of the fact that such action would be regarded as weakness and that the prestige of the officials would receive a death blow. A strong effort is then made to adhere to the decision previously announced, the logical consequence of such a policy being that the decision once taken must be rigidly adhered to. May I enquire under these circumstances how should people act who desire reconsideration and amendment of the orders and decisions announced by the Authorities?

Fortunately there are high officials here do not follow this plea, but deal with difficult and delicate problems in a wise and statesmanlike manner and thus render most valuable service both to Great Britain and India. I am sure you will all agree with me in thinking that Lord Hardinge is the foremost amongst such officials at present in India, and his action far from being open to criticism in deserving of the highest commendation.

I wonder whether those critics who periodically trot out the bugbear or weakness realize what that means. To my mind it can mean only one thing, namely, that the position of the British Government in India is founded on such flimsy bases that an act of tardy justice done to the people of India by the higher authorities as the result of strenuous representation against an executive order or decision, so seriously shakes the stability of the structure that a few such shocks would make the building totter and fall. Can the truth be further removed from this obvious inference? The foundation of British rule in India is laid on the bedrock of strength and righteousness, on its inherent sense of justice, and on fair-play. An act of justice call it mercy if you like, under given circumstances, far from proving harmful to the foundations of British rule in India to my mind has the effect of adding further buttresses to it if that was necessary, and draws from the depths of the people's hearts that feeling of gratitude and loyalty which is an asset of incalculable value to Imperial England. Has not this view been proved beyond the shadow of a doubt? The resolutions passed by Moslem representative bodies and associations all over India on the Viceroy's announcement at Cawnpore has clearly shown how far-reaching in its effects His Excellency's policy has actually proved. No one demands that Government should forthwith yield to every agitation. All that we ask for is that our representations should be examined in a judicial spirit, and that when there is a good case for the amendment, alteration or withdrawal of specific orders of the authorities, the necessary action should not be refused out of deference to that bugbear, loss of prestige, any one venture to contend that our demand is in any way unreasonable.

"PRESTIGE."

I will not take up much of your time in dealing with the other bogey, namely, prestige. How much good feeling has been sacrificed in the past by acting upon the imaginary advantages of this word. Even Mr. Montague was obliged to deal with this Logey in the following pregnant words in the House of Commons:—

"Time was no doubt when it was a most important function of this House to see—that the theory of Government by prestige was not carried to excessive lengths in India. In the extreme of Government by prestige those who administer the country are I take it answerable only to their official superiors and no claim for redress by one of the ruled against one of the rulers can be admitted as a right. If for instance a member of the ruling race inflicts an injury upon a member of the governed race, no question will arise of punishing the former to redress the wrong of the latter. The only consideration will be whether prestige will be more impaired by punishing the offender and so admit imperfection in the governing caste or by not punishing him, and so condoning the failure of that protection of the governed which is essential to efficient Government. This illustrates as I understand the matter—the prestige theory pressed to its logical conclusion. I do not say that it was so pressed in India, it has always been tempered by British character, British opinion and the British Parliament. Whatever reliance there was in our Government of India is now giving place to reliance upon even handed justice and strength, orderly and equitable administration but great deal of nonsense is talked still, so it seems to me, about prestige. Call it if you will a useful asset in our relations between the British Government and the educated Indian public. Do not misunderstand me and this I say especially to those who may do me the honour of criticising outside these walls what I am now saying. I mean by prestige—the theory of Government that I have just described—the theory that produces irresponsibility and arrogance. I do not of course mean that reputation for firm and dignified administration which no Government can afford to disregard."

This speech was delivered in the House of Commons in 1911; while two years later, when H. E. the Viceroy has by an act of statesmanship calmed the lacerated feelings of the Moslem community in finding a reasonable solution of the Cawnpore Mosque difficulty, he is seriously charged by some of his own countrymen with having given a serious blow to the "blessed prestige." No further comment on such criticism of the Viceroy is called for beyond pointing out that this class of critics are so keenly solicitous of the "blessed prestige" that they feel it would be shaken by the public dancing of Miss Maud Allan in India!

FIRING UPON THE PEOPLE.

Following the wise suggestion made by H. E. the Viceroy when he visited Cawnpore and brought about a settlement of the question. I do not wish to say anything more in regard to this matter. There is, however, one aspect of the question which calls for a few remarks. I would not have mentioned the subject if the incident had been confined to the Cawnpore Mosque affair only, but as it has a grave bearing on the future, I cannot restrain from speaking about it. I wish to invite your attention to the fact that under the existing law the power of firing upon the people under certain circumstances has been deliberately given to Government Officials, and there have been several instances during the past few years when this power has been exercised, resulting in serious loss of life. That the power of controlling an excited mob by firing upon them under given circumstances should remain with the officials in the interests of peace and order must be readily admitted. At the same time adequate precautions are essentially necessary when the question is one of taking life. No ordinary circumstances could possibly justify the use of fire-arms against the people. We have to remember that whatever crowd in India, it is unarmed and its power of injuring the police and other people is very limited indeed. It will readily be conceded that this power should only be exercised on occasions when the position is so grave as to leave no other alternative for controlling and dispersing the crowd. There is bound to be considerable difference of opinion on this point and I therefore think that it is necessary both in the interests of the official granting the order to fire and the general public that some provision should be made by which the exact facts of the case may be authoritatively investigated. I would therefore advocate that the Government of India should lay down as a standing order that an independent Commission of enquiry, on which the Indian element shall be amply represented, shall be appointed to institute an inquiry within a reasonable time after firing had taken place. This Commission should be authorised to take evidence and to report upon the circumstances under which the order to fire was given. The very fact that such a Commission would be appointed on each and every occasion when firing has to be resorted to will have a wholesome restraining effect upon the official charged by law with the responsibility of taking life, and it will create a feeling of confidence among the general public that careful and independent enquiry will be made after the exercise of such power. It is, therefore, in the interests of both the officials and the general public that such a procedure should be laid down. Such an inquiry would save the official from serious adverse criticism to which in the nature of things he is open when life is actually taken. In Great Britain, in consequence of the greater development of democratic principle, firing is under serious control. During the recent Dublin riots, several members of the police were seriously injured to the extent of being obliged to be taken to hospital. Be it remembered that the British people are not subject to the severe restrictions imposed under the Indian Arms Act, and many men amongst a British crowd may be actually armed. Even then firing is only resorted to after all other alternatives have been absolutely exhausted.

The following extracts from Reuter's telegrams will clearly shew what happens in Great Britain under circumstances decidedly more grave:—

London, 31st August.

Two hundred Civilians and thirty police were injured in last night's rioting. One has succumbed in Hospital.

London, 1st September.

The riots continued in Dublin yesterday and two hundred cases in hospital for injuries received. It is stated that during the police charge following upon the arrest of Larkin a number of old men and women and children who were returning from church were struck with police batons. The Mayor announces his intention of moving that an inquiry be held into the conduct of the Police.

London, 22nd September.

Serious rioting took place in Dublin last evening in connection with processions of strikers. The crowd attacked and wrecked tramways and pitched battles with the police ensued in which batons, stones and bottles were freely used. A number of rioters were taken to hospital and several police were injured.

And still there was no firing upon the crowd. In India the circumstances are entirely different. An excited mob has no weapons of an offensive character beyond brick-bats and sticks. The people of India are as a rule highly amenable to the requirements of peace and order. In such a country the taking of life by firing upon the crowd is a more serious matter than in England. It is, therefore, doubly necessary to provide for an independent inquiry in all cases which lead to the taking of life. I can appeal with confidence to the British people and the British Government to support and to give effect to the suggestion which I have made in the interests of everyone concerned, and I do so with confidence, especially because the whole trend of British policy is humanitarian. Government have never hesitated to take measures even when they may be regarded as unpopular if the object is to save life. The policy of Government in organizing large camps for the relief of famine-stricken people during time of famine and thereby saving thousands of lives which would otherwise be lost, is beyond all praise. The great impetus to sanitary measures throughout the length and breadth of this country, in spite of opposition in some quarters, has been studiously adopted with the object of preserving health and life. Nay, Gentlemen, the fundamental principles on which British rule in India is based, namely, absolute non-interference with religious rites, privileges and liberties of the people of India has been deliberately departed from with a view to saving life. I refer to the law which has been enacted prohibiting the immolation of widows on the funeral pyre of their husbands. Sutees who under a high sense of religious sentiment voluntarily offer to sacrifice their lives by a hideous death are prohibited by law from doing so. No amount of religious sanctity attaching to this practice has deterred the British Government from enforcing by legislation that lives should not be sacrificed in this way. Is it too much to ask the same Government to provide adequate and suitable safeguards against the taking of the lives of people who may have congregated together under some exciting cause, however trivial, and had disobeyed the command to disperse, in some cases because they could not do so, however willing they may have been to comply? Is it too much to ask that every official, however well placed he may be, and whatever his status in the service of Government, should always have before his eyes the knowledge that far from receiving the unqualified support of the higher authorities in such a matter, he will have to satisfy an independent tribunal of the circumstances which justified him in taking the lives of unarmed people? As I have already pointed out, it is necessary in the interest of the good name of the British Government, in the interest of officials upon whom the grave responsibility of giving the order to fire is imposed by law, and in the interests of the general public, that the safeguard I have indicated should be provided.

INDIA'S CIVIL SERVANTS.

The administrative standard which Lord Hardinge has held before us in dealing with the Cawnpore question lends point to the innovation which Lord Crewe, the Secretary of State for India, recently introduced. I refer to the idea of inviting all the young men who have chosen an Indian career to meet him at Whitehall and to address them weighty words of counsel and advice. I am inclined to think however that he might have well improved the occasion by impressing upon them on the eve of their entering into the Civil Service of India, the fundamental truth that they come out to this continent not to rule India but to serve India. The three letters of the alphabet I.C.S., which will remain attached to their names during the whole of their lives, and of which every civilian is justly proud, stand for Indian Civil Servants and do not represent any form of rule. If the members of the Civil Service would but constantly bear in mind the uncontrovertible fact that they are the Servants of India, and that they will, during the whole of the remainder of their lives, whether they are in active employ or in retirement, eat the salt of the people of India, and that as Mr. Montagu recently stated in Parliament they must in co-operation with the Indian people for the promotion of the best interest of this country, not merely on the lines which may appear to them best, but on the lines which may be regarded as best jointly by both, the work of administering the country will be greatly simplified, the progress of India will be both rapid and smooth and the causes of estrangement and dissatisfaction will be up-rooted.

During the many years which I have spent in the service of the public in the Bombay Presidency I have come into close and intimate contact with a large number of Civilians and I have made many intimate friends amongst them. As a class I have the highest admiration for their honesty of purpose, their stubborn integrity, their high ability and their sturdy devotion to duty. Would it be too much to ask them to cultivate a better regard for those Indian public men who devote a large portion of their time in the service of the country, who are actuated not by any sordid motives of personal gain but by singleness of purpose in serving their countrymen, to abstain from attributing motives where none exist, to treat their opinions with respect and consideration, and to feel that perhaps there may be another aspect of questions under discussion which may require different treatment?

I have said that the civilians are servants of India, as their very designation indicates, just as much as we all in the service of our motherland. The difference is that while the former are paid for their services, the latter belong to the class not of the "unemployed" but of the "unpaid." It has always been a wonder to me that men of high intellectual attainments and in active occupation in their own trades, industries, commerce and professions, men highly successful in their own private concerns, come forward in numbers, to serve the country at great personal sacrifice and in the face of severe dis-encouragement. Can better proof be required of the sturdy patriotism of such men, who readily make serious sacrifices of valuable time and money in an endeavour to render all the help that lies in their power to secure good Government in India? This class of men are in my opinion the most valuable Imperial asset in India and deserve the encouragement possible in their self-imposed task. Any feeling of suspicion and distrust towards that must result in enhancing the difficulties of the situation.

BALKAN WAR.

It must be with a feeling of relief that you will have seen the end of the Balkan War. Turkey has not been turned out bag and baggage from Europe. Though its European dominions have been curtailed it has still a strong footing on the Continent of Europe. Admittedly, round which a strong Moslem sentiment has concentrated, again flies the Turkish flag. Turkish reverses have this reassuring feature, that they brought to the surface the fact that so many Mussalmans may be divided amongst themselves the sentiment of Moslem brotherhood is a living force throughout the entire Moslem world. Mussalmans in different parts of the world have all rallied their readiness to come forward in a spirit of unanimity and devotion to stand by their co-religionists in their hour of trial and trouble. It is the living miracle of Islam that the sentiment of Islamic brotherhood are so deeply down in the hearts of the followers of our revered Prophet and that the lapse of centuries has in no way weakened the efficacy of the noble mission.

FOREIGN POLICY OF GREAT BRITAIN AND THE INDIAN MUSSALMANS.

During the time of stress and strain charges were made against the Mussalmans of India that they wanted to dictate the foreign policy of Great Britain, that they desired that England should go to war to protect the Moslem States in Europe and Asia. Can anything be further removed from the truth? The Indian Mussalmans fully recognise the danger to England, with all its interests spread over the face of the whole world, to hint that she should thoughtlessly involve herself in a bloody war. It is doing the Moslems of India a grave injustice to suggest that they had the remotest notion of dictating what foreign policy England should pursue. And as a matter of fact they have never dreamt of doing so. All that they have urged—and I think they had ample justification in doing so—was that England as the sovereign power of millions of Mussalman subjects should, out of regard for their sentiments, endeavour to see that Turkey obtained in the Councils of Europe, fair and just treatment. I do not think any one could venture to assert that the request, nay even the demand, that England should do its best in the Councils of Europe to ensure fair, just and equitable treatment to Turkey can possibly be regarded as being in any way unreasonable. It is because the utterances of responsible British Ministers appeared to them to indicate that England's sympathies were against the Turks that Indian Moslem feelings were naturally hurt and that they felt aggrieved. Can any fault be found with them under the circumstances?

At the time of the declaration of war between Turkey and the Balkan Allies, Sir Edward Grey said in the House of Commons that "the great Powers are taking what steps they can to prevent a breach of the peace, definite proposals were made yesterday for collective steps to be taken by or on behalf of the great Powers to overcome these difficulties by representations to the Balkan States and at Constantinople and we agreed to them." The steps indicated by Sir Edward Grey were the declaration that "if nevertheless war breaks out between the Balkan States and the Ottoman Empire they will not admit as the result of the conflict any modifications of the territorial status quo in European Turkey." This was at the time of the commencement of the war. We may reasonably draw the inference from this declaration that if Turkey had been victorious it would not have been allowed to retain any portion of the conquered territory. At the time war was declared it was generally felt in the Chancelleries of Europe that the Turkish soldiers would sweep over the surrounding territory belonging to the Allies, and if these expectations had been realized the might of Europe, including the power of England, would have been asserted to deprive Turkey of any territorial expansion as the result of its victories. But the tide of victory went the other way and the Balkan Allies proved victorious immediately the conflict had begun in earnest. This completely upset the preconceptions of the Chancelleries of Europe and they felt that the declaration of the maintenance of the status quo in European Turkey would be prejudicial to the Balkan Allies. Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, took early opportunity of then declaring that whatever may be the result of the war the Concert of Europe could not possibly deprive the victorious party from securing the fruits of their victories. Are the Mussalmans of India to be blamed if they feel that England was associated with the other European Powers in laying down and enforcing a policy that if the Turks had proved victorious in the combat, they would not have been allowed to obtain any territory belonging to any of the Balkan Allies, but that if the Balkan Allies proved victorious they would be permitted to annex important portions of the European Dominions of Turkey? Is it unreasonable that the Mussalmans of India should feel that fair and equitable treatment was not being meted out to their co-religionists beyond the seas and that England was taking a prominent part in such treatment?

MR. ASQUITH AND THE PEACE OF LONDON.

Well, as you are aware, after the Peace of London was signed and the Balkan Allies fell out amongst themselves, resulting in a re-distribution of the conquered territory, Turkey, availing itself of the opportunity which became so providentially available, recaptured the town of Adrianople and the surrounding country with which a strong Moslem sentiment was associated. Was it wise, was it statesmanlike for Mr. Asquith to declare that so far as Turkey was concerned it would be required to lie within the boundary line settled at the Peace of London? In the face of such and similar declarations from the highest ministers of the British Crown, no fault could be found with the Mussalmans of India if they concluded that England, far from trying to be just and fair towards Turkey, far from endeavouring to secure fair play to the Moslem Khalifate, was siding against it and was co-operating with other European Powers who are the declared enemies of the Turkish Empire. Under all this provocation, have the Mussalmans done anything which would attach any blame to them? Have they swerved in the slightest degree in their feeling of sincere loyalty towards the British Crown? However painful the episode has been to them, they have exercised full self-control and restraint and their conduct far from being blame-worthy deserves highest commendation.

SOUTH AFRICAN QUESTION.

I am appealing to you to exercise patience and restraint in criticism. In doing so I have not failed to realize how extremely difficult it is at times to exercise these virtues. The feeling of indignation and horror which has spread throughout this country in regard to the treatment meted out to our fellow-countrymen and women in South Africa has led to the use of language which under the circumstances could hardly be controlled. But in the face of the grave provocation to Indian feelings and Indian sentiments I cannot help expressing my sense of deep gratification at the masterly pronouncement which H. E. the Viceroy made in Madras. I know that the expression of his sincere feeling of sympathy with the people of this country has laid him open to severe criticism in some quarters. It is a curious anomaly that these very critics, who never forget to preach to us, Indians, the doctrine of submitting to the views of the man on the spot, who never fail to resent interpellations and criticism in the House of Commons on the plea that men on the spot must be considered to understand the position best, that strictures levelled in England against Indian Officials should be treated with contempt as unknowing and ignorant, are the very persons who have come forward to condemn the views and the suggestions of the man on the spot occupying the highest executive position in this Continent. How far-reaching the effect for good which Lord Hardinge's speech at Madras has been instrumental in bringing about, can only be known to the people in India. Lord Hardinge, whose great merit is to keep himself in close touch with the people of this land, who manages to secure first-hand information of the extent of the feeling of indignation and horror that had permeated this country, has done by this pronouncement the greatest service to the Crown of England. Well, gentlemen, in spite of this criticism the Boer Government has been obliged to announce the appointment of a commission of enquiry. You all know the constitution of this Commission and the South African Indian opinion of the men chosen to sit upon it. Our demand was that the Commission should be so constituted as to ensure not only that the men chosen in South Africa should be such as would command the confidence of the people but that the representatives of this country should find seats upon it. This has not been complied with and although the suggestion for such representation has been supported both by the official and non-official opinion in India, it has been ignored. Is it any wonder that the Indians feel under the circumstances that the enquiry will prove a white-washing one and that the sore will remain unhealed?

POSITION OF INDIANS IN THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

But the question that is facing us to-day is not merely the treatment that our fellow-countrymen are receiving at the hands of the South African Government. It cannot be narrowed down to the present residents in the South African Union. That question is undoubtedly emergent and requires to be dealt with forthwith, but the wider question can no longer be postponed but must now be faced and that question is "What is the position of the people of India in the British Empire." Australia is practically barred against us. Canada is contemplating legislation to prohibit Asiatic immigration. The attitude of South Africa is patent to you. The time is therefore ripe to ask whether we are common subjects of His Imperial Majesty the King, occupying identically the same position as the other subjects of His Majesty, or are we so in theory only? Under the gracious proclamation of Queen Victoria, confirmed by the Royal pronouncements of Queen Victoria's two successors, pledges have been given to us in an unequivocal manner that we are the citizens of the Empire. In practice, however, we find that in South Africa, in Canada and in Australia we are regarded in a manner which it is difficult to express in moderate terms. We have, therefore, every right to ask the British Cabinet, through the Secretary of State, for a declaration whether they will manage to secure to us the rights and privileges of British citizenship.

If the answer to the question is in the affirmative, England has got to exercise the powers which legally vest in her to ensure to us such rights and such privileges. If we are not, in spite of Royal pronouncements and Royal pledges, to receive the rights of British citizenship, if we are prohibited from settling in the British Colonies on equal terms with the white races, we are entitled to a clear and definite declaration on the point. It is necessary that we should clearly understand what our position actually is in the British Empire. If we are not entitled, in spite of the pledges already referred to, to equal rights of British citizenship, if that right on the declared authority of the British Cabinet is to be denied to us, then we shall be free to organize means and measures to protect ourselves against this indignity. Retaliation is a bad word but it has been freely used in this connection and I do not think any one would venture to assert that the use of the word is uncalled for. Our esteemed citizen the Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale, who has made the cause of the Indians in South Africa his own, considers that retaliation should be applied in the direction of a prohibition to all the South Africans from any employment under the Government of India and the restriction against the purchase of South African coal by the railways in India. I am afraid that retaliatory measures confined to these two things would hardly be successful in attaining the object we have at heart in enforcing the recognition of our rights of British citizenship by the Colonies of Great Britain. We will have to consider and devise means which while living perfectly constitutional, may prove really effective. The intellectual capacity of the Indians is not so meagre as to despair of finding such an effective remedy, but the time for such measures has yet to come. We have thankfully to remember that the Indian Officials are supporting our cause and that many Englishmen in South Africa appear to be in our favour. A majority of the powerful English press is sufficiently outspoken. We have, therefore, to wait for the final result of the present contretemps before, concerting and pressing effective measures in this behalf. There is no Indian who does not regret the necessity of being obliged to start a war of retaliation against component parts of the mighty British Empire, but the fault entirely lies with the British Cabinet. If the British Cabinet is absolutely powerless to secure the rights of British citizenship to the Indian subjects of the Crown, the whole responsibility of the consequences which such a policy will lead to, will be on their heads. I need hardly tell them that the result of such a course from the Imperial standpoint will be deplorable.

WHO WON THE BOER WAR.

This leads me to ask a question which under existing conditions is of paramount importance. I should like to know who were the victors in the Boer War? Whether England came out victorious and succeeded in conquering the Boer republics or whether it was the Boers who successfully defeated Great Britain. If Great Britain was in reality the victorious party, it should not be powerless to enforce its wishes upon the Boers. But from recent pronouncements it seems obvious that the British Cabinet is in reality absolutely helpless in the matter. The plea put forward is that in self-governing Colonies, the British Government can merely use suasion and nothing else. If this argument is carried to its logical conclusion, it means that any legislation affecting the people in South Africa by the Union Parliament, shall be accepted irrespective of how it affects the different sections of the population. Well the Union Parliament as it is constituted at present, contains a large Boer majority. It, therefore, follows that any Legislation which the Boer majority in the Union Parliament may pass imposing unbearable disabilities upon English residents themselves must receive the assent of His Majesty, England would be obliged under such circumstances also to declare that it is powerless to interfere with the domestic legislation of a self-governing Colony. As a result of such legislation the English people in Natal may be hounded out of that Colony, and still the British Cabinet I suppose would sit with folded arms and declare to the world its utter helplessness to secure justice to their own people. If this is a fact then it clearly follows that though nominally Britain won the Boer War it was the Boers who were really victorious, and as a result of such victory annexed the British Colony of Natal to the Republics of the Transvaal and Orange Free State. Can anything be more absurd? Would Great Britain remain so indifferent if the Boer majority took it into their heads to act in the manner indicated? Gentlemen, it does not require any prescience to know that the whole of Great Britain would be excited from one end to the other and the might of Great Britain would come down on the recalcitrant Boers and the might of England would prevail. It is only when the persons affected are the people of India that this helplessness is manifesting itself.

A curious sidelight is thrown on the issue I have raised by the public pronouncement of General Botha, the South African premier. In the speech which he delivered on the 24th November, he is reported to have said that "Their country was part of the British Empire, yet they were as free as if they were an independent State on a footing of equality with the sister states and they were a sister state of England. Our first duty in the interest of the Union itself is in my opinion to stand on a friendly footing with the British Empire, without in any way departing from the least of our principles." I should like to know what the British Ministers have to say in regard to this claim. If they admit it, could they still claim that they won the Boer War?

We are told that it is an economic question which is at the root of the trouble. The Indians are thrift they can live more cheaply than the white settlers and they can successfully compete with them in trade and commerce. The doctrine of the survival of the fittest does not presumably apply to South Africa. When the Indians demand legislative and executive measures for the protection of India's economic and industrial interests, the same school which is preaching economic considerations, in British colonies trot out the principle of the "survival of the fittest." They want to have it both ways. May I tell them such a policy can lead to no good?

SEPARATION OF JUDICIAL AND EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS.

The question of the separation of the judicial and executive functions has been so well threshed out throughout the country that I would not have referred to it here, but for the fact of the recent discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council on the subject. I do not wish to enter into the history of the question, as it is well-known to you. There is, however, one aspect of the discussion in the Imperial Council which requires to be brought out prominently. When the resolution on the subject was put to the vote, it was found that every Indian member, whether elected or nominated voted in favour of it. It is a memorable incident in the political progress of India that all the different elements constituting Indian representation unanimously demanded that a beginning should forthwith be made in the direction of separating the judicial and executive functions. The resolution was, of course, negatived by the official majority. Whatever the technical fate of this resolution it raises constitutional questions of far-reaching importance.

CHOSEN REPRESENTATIVES OF THE PEOPLE.

His Majesty the King Emperor in reply to the loyal address presented at Delhi by the Imperial Legislative Council, called the members of that body "the chosen representatives of the people of India." It is an undisputed fact that all the elected members are chosen by such electorate as have been laid down by Government themselves. Many of them represent all the different provinces of India on a territorial basis. Some of them represent the land-owners and some the important Moslem Community on a communal basis. Others have been nominated by His Excellency the Viceroy himself. All Indian "chosen representatives of the people of India" have unanimously asked that a beginning should be forthwith made with this reform. Though the resolution was lost by the vote of the official majority we are entitled to ask whether that will be the last word on the subject.

I cannot conceive that such will be the actual result. If the united voice of India expressed through their chosen representatives is powerless to secure a reform which has as in this instance received the support of many high officials, the recent Council reforms can hardly be regarded as an appreciable advance on previous conditions. We have secured more seats on the Legislative Councils, we have obtained the very valuable privilege of moving resolutions and dividing the house on them, but our function still remains that of a consultative body, who are free to express their views and sentiments, but whose united voice remains inoperative. Gentlemen, I am ready to recognise that under present conditions of the administration of the country it is necessary that there should be an official majority. I do so because the legislative functions vesting in these bodies are of a far-reaching character. A Legislative Council can not only pass or reject fresh legislation, but can repeal and amend existing laws. It is, therefore, right that the power of the majority should remain in the hands of Government. But it is absolutely necessary that adequate safe-guards should be provided against the arbitrary exercise of such power.

It is not sufficiently recognised that the non-official members of the Legislative Councils in India occupy the position of what we understand as the "opposition" in Parliament. I do not mean that they always oppose Government or that they work in the spirit of party. The career of the Indian members of the Legislative Councils indisputably proves that they have been actuated by a high sense of duty and patriotism, and have proved most useful to Government in their legislative and other work. What I do mean is that it is their function to represent the public view and offer suggestion and criticism in regard to measures introduced by Government. They work practically on some basis akin to an "opposition." It is now recognised as an axiomatic truth that the efficiency of Government largely depends upon a strong opposition. Any measures which would impair the efficiency of the opposition would unquestionably react on the efficiency of the administration. Such an opposition is represented by the non-official members in the Legislative Councils. There is, however, a fundamental difference between the "opposition" in Parliament and the opposition in India, and I am sorry to find that this is not adequately realized by Government officials. In England the party on the opposition to-day may well hope to sit on Government benches to-morrow. The whole attention of the party and its press is directed towards winning the suffrages of the people of Great Britain so that they may succeed in securing a majority at the next general elections and occupy the Government benches. As I have already said, the party in the opposition to-day may be the party in power to-morrow. All the power and patronage—and the extent of this is colossal in England—which may vest in the party in power to-day is enjoyed by the opposition to-morrow. The position of the "opposition" in India is quite different. The power and patronage—and it is most extensive even in India—which must necessarily attach to the Government in office remains always in the hands of the officials. The Government benches must always remain in their occupation. The "opposition" must always occupy the same seats. They can never hope to exercise under present conditions the power and the patronage vesting in Government and the telling influence which directly results therefrom. In spite of this serious disability, men are found ready and willing to accept serious sacrifices in the public cause. They are ready to accept Government displeasure in the honest and conscientious discharge of their duties. Scrutinize the class of men who occupy seats on the Legislative Councils in India and you will observe what classes they are drawn from. You will find amongst them men engaged in important trades and industries, in agriculture on an extensive scale, in professions in which they coin money. These men whose time is of the utmost value readily come forward at the call of duty to serve their country, without any hope of winning a position which will secure to them the power and the patronage inseparable from the Government office. Nay, they have frequently to face official displeasure. I feel strongly that it is necessary in the interests of good government that the authorities should make every endeavour to rally this class to themselves. Far from regarding them as critics and agitators it is best to hold them in esteem as men who are materially contributing towards the better administration of the country and who deserve all encouragement possible in their self-imposed task.

"THE PRESS ACT."

The remarks I have made on the question of the general position of the non-official members apply equally well to the liberty of the press. It is through non-official members of the Legislative Councils and through the responsible Indian press that Government stand to obtain direct information as regards the feelings and sentiments of the people. Just as full encouragement is needed to secure the best men to serve on the Legislative Councils, adequate liberty of expression is necessary for the Indian press. I have no sympathy with those newspapers which regard license as liberty and are habitually transgressing the bounds of liberal journalism. At the same time it is necessary that no undue restrictions should either be imposed or by any action of Government officials, should be felt to stand in the way of a full and free discussion of public matters. The only independent source from which Government can keep itself in daily touch with the feelings and sentiments prevailing in the different parts of India is through the Indian press. If the actual effect of any measure of Government leads to a condition under which Government are themselves deprived of this direct knowledge, it is harmful and mischievous in its results. I have been constrained to make these remarks because I am personally aware of the fact that the Press Act, with the wide powers it confers, is operating in directly discouraging even well-established and long-standing Indian newspapers from freely expressing their views. I think that time has come when the question regarding the operation of the Press Act should be carefully and judiciously examined and the necessary measures applied in order to remove the disabilities now existing.

MOSLEM IDEALS AND POLICY.

Having touched thus briefly on current events I should like to say a few words in regard to the question of our policy and our ideals. I do so with considerable hesitation; but I am obliged to deal with it in view of the fact that during recent times much difference of opinion has manifested itself among the Mohammedans of India, and statements have appeared in the press to the effect that the League has been captured by the young hot heads of the community, that it is tottering and is on the verge of collapse, that leading men amongst us are abandoning the League either openly or quietly. It will strike any one that there must be something radically wrong with the machinery by which the Mussalmans have organised themselves to promote their communal interests, if these statements were true.

MY POLITICAL FAITH.

Before I deal with this question, I should like to place before you my own faith and belief in regard to the political future of India. I do so with a view to removing the slightest chance of my attitude being misunderstood or misconstrued. Looking to the growth of political life in India during so short a period in the life of a Nation as the last 50 years, it must strike even a casual observer that the progress made by the country is phenomenal. With the liberal educational policy adopted by the British Government, we have been enabled to come in close contact with Western thought and culture and with the history of the rise and progress of democratic institutions in the West and their present ascendancy; and it is but natural that our horizon should be widened and that we should become keenly anxious to move steadily forward on similar lines. I think we should not be true to our Mother-land if we did not strive to attain a high standard of progress on democratic lines. I am one of those dreamers who firmly believe that given a sufficiently long spell of British rule in India, we are bound to become united as a nation in the real sense of the term. When that time arrives, (as it is sure to do), we shall have qualified to rule the country ourselves, and self-government will be absolutely assured to us. It will be the proudest day in the history of England when, having accepted the guardianship of a people over 300 millions in number, belonging to an alien race, divided into innumerable sects and creeds it has guided their evolution and has successfully carried out a far-sighted policy enabling them to reach a pitch of consolidation and solidarity, making them perfectly qualified to govern themselves. The debt of gratitude India owes to the Crown of England for the peace and order prevailing throughout the length and breadth of this vast Continent, the safety of life and property, the earnest and humanitarian policy for our welfare and advancement, the studious efforts to train and educate us to the highest standard possible, is nothing to what India will owe when the work for this country is completed and the heritage is handed over to the children of the soil. I have called myself a dreamer and you are welcome to regard me as such if you like, but this I will tell you that I have profound faith in the realization of my dream and it depends upon you to exert yourselves to fulfil the destiny which is inevitably yours. No country, such as India is, can remain for ever under foreign rule, however, beneficent that rule may be, and though British rule is undoubtedly based on beneficence and righteousness, it cannot last for ever.

India is our Mother-land, our proud heritage, and must in the end be handed over to us by our guardians. I regard the connection of England with India in the nature of guardianship over minor children. If I may apply the analogy I would say that the Hindoo and the Muslim are two brothers, sons of Mother Hind and in a state of minority, and that Providence has chosen the British to be the guardians of the minors. I need not remind you that in the hour of our need two European nations, namely, France and England, applied for this guardianship and it was granted to England. How well, how nobly, the obligations so imposed have been discharged by England is evidenced in every direction to-day. The minors are gradually and steadily growing up in health and strength under the fostering care of a people who were the first fight for democracy, and who have after centuries of travail and application raised it as a system to the present standard of efficiency. India is loyal to the backbone to England, not only for all that it has done for India, but for all which India may well hope to obtain in the future. Loyalty of an alien people based as it is in India on a firm conviction of self-interest, is bound to be deep-rooted and genuine. Any suspicion of the deep-rooted loyalty of India is unjust and groundless. Constitutional agitation against Government measures there will be and there must be. We cannot convince our guardians without constitutional agitation and it is the common failing of all guardians all the world over, that they are difficult to be convinced of the steady growth of their wards. Such growth is largely imperceptible to them, taking place as it does under their very eyes. As I have said, the minors are in reality steadily growing up and their needs and requirements are multiplying. The wards would be false to the training which the guardian in the noble discharge of his duties has himself given if they did not respectfully ask, nay clamour, for larger allowances suitable to the respective ages to which they may have reached and the best policy to be adopted towards them is to recognise the fact from time to time and make further grants in a generous spirit.

BRITISH CONNECTION INDISPENSABLE.

It will be obvious to you that it depends entirely upon yourselves how early you will realize your proud destiny. It will call for the best in your nature, you will have to be patient and preserving, you will have to be prepared for all calls of self-sacrifice and devotion to your Mother-land. You will have to rise above petty jealousies and personal considerations, you will have to unite in a bond of Indian brotherhood to make your path easy in the stubborn task that lies before you. You will have always to bear prominently in mind that an early realization of your ultimate hopes and aspirations, depends wholly upon retaining in the land the beneficent rule of the Crown of England. During the transition period the presence of the British in India is absolutely indispensable. You are bound to grow to adult manhood in time and come into your inheritance, but you must in no way be impatient of your guardian. In trying to accelerate the pace do not retard your progress. We have to remember also that we shall not reach the goal by the use of physical force. Anarchism and bombs never have in the history of any nation ensured progress or helped in attaining their end. Believe me, gentlemen, that when the time arrives the force of moral pressure will be irresistible and it will absolutely ensure the realization of our proud destiny.

GRACIOUS MESSAGE OF THE KING.

This is fully borne out by the noble message which His Imperial Majesty delivered to you during his recent visit to India. As you are aware, it consist of three words "Educate, Unite and Hope." Can any message be more pregnant with far-reaching significance? Can better words be found in the English language to indicate to you in what direction your future lies? By the word "Educate" is meant not merely the passing of examinations. It is used in a broader sense and calls upon you to qualify yourselves for the noble destiny that awaits you. Your leaders during the past generation fully realized the significance of this word and they advised you to concentrate your attention on educating yourselves before everything else. Their advice to eschew politics at that stage was, as you will now recognise, highly wise. But for that concentration the Mussalman community would not have made that progress in education which we see all around us to-day. Involving the Mussalman community in political strife at that stage would not have been to their interest. They had lagged far behind in the race of education. Concentration on "education" was essentially necessary. If the Moslem mind had been diverted into different channels, it would have proved highly detrimental to our cause. The community as a whole, following the wise guidance of their elders, devoted all their energies to educating themselves. The fruits which have resulted would not have been attained in any other way. I cannot conceive that the policy of abstaining from political life was meant to be permanent. It was clearly realized that when, as the result of concentrating attention on educational progress, the community had been raised to a sufficiently high standard, politics would come as a matter of course. How well that policy has succeeded, I need not tell such a representative gathering as I find assembled here to-day. Within the short period of six years since the date on which the Mussalman community organised themselves for political work, the progress made will be admitted on all hands to be highly gratifying. This is the result of concentration on education which as you will observe is the first word of the gracious message of His Imperial Majesty. May I ask you whether this experience does not teach us that it is best to concentrate our attention and our energies upon the next word of the Royal message, namely "Unite"? You are aware that however much you may qualify yourselves by education and other means, you will have to unite yourselves in a common bond of Indian brotherhood before you can hope to reach any form of self-government. Having reached the necessary stage of union, there is nothing you cannot hope to obtain. There is nothing which will keep you out of your heritage. Let every Indian take to heart the gracious message of our King, in his own person and family, and try to live up to it. Every true son of India owes this debt to his country, to act on the principles enunciated, and the future, though far distant, may well be regarded as absolutely assured to you. Well, let me appeal to you and through you to all the people of India to work for your Mother-land on the lines indicated, and thus contribute to the ultimate fulfilment of the proud destiny which inevitably awaits you.

IDEALS.

Having explained at considerable length my political faith for the future of India you will easily understand that I cannot object to the ideals which have been adopted by the two leading political organizations of this country. The Congress ideal of self-government on Colonial lines has the advantage of being clear and definite. The League ideal of self-government suitable to India appears to me vague and indefinite. You must have had good reasons for adopting it but I cannot help remarking that I would have personally preferred something which was more definite and distinct. Whatever the ideal I should like to appeal to you to bear constantly in mind that nothing should be allowed to create a feeling of impatience, a desire to reach it by short cuts, or a tendency to excite the passions of the people. Nothing is more detrimental to advance the cause of India than impatience and disaffection. Far from accelerating the pace towards the ultimate attainment of the goal, it will undoubtedly have the effect of setting the clock back.

We have recently heard a great deal about a divided feeling amongst the members of our community. It appears to me wholly unwise to fall out and be divided on a point which even in the opinion of the most enthusiastic amongst us will not be reached till after several decades of strenuous and united efforts. Whether the final consummation of our highest aspirations takes several decades or several scores of years or some centuries is in the womb of time. It largely depends, as I have already pointed out, upon ourselves. Why then waste our energies in fruitless discussions and dissensions upon the form of Government which we should strive to attain at the end of that indefinite period? When a sturdy union amongst all the conflicting elements prevailing in India of to-day is a condition precedent to any sound and steady progress, would it not be wise to devise means by which we may be able to concentrate our undivided attention on the problems of the day and by united exertions ensure steady and solid progress?

Everyone must recognise that no form of self-government is possible in India unless the two principal communities, the Hindoo and the Moslem, are closely and conscientiously united. What can be a nobler aim, a loftier goal than to endeavour to secure India united! Once we become sincerely and genuinely united there is no force in the world which can keep us from our heritage; without such union the Indians will have to wait indefinitely for the realization of their fondest hopes. Instead of having differences and dissensions amongst ourselves at the present time on matters of remote realization, I would earnestly appeal to all true sons of India to concentrate all their energies, all their talents on the consummation of ensuring a united India. Then we might well leave the future to take care of itself, full of hope, and full of confidence. If the two sister-communities devote their energies and concentrate their efforts on the realization of such an ideal, in a spirit of reasoned compromise, all our difficulties will crumble away and India will rise phoenix-like from the ashes of discord and struggle to a fresh and robust life full of promise and full of hope.

MOSLEM POLICY.

The next question which I must deal with now is what should be the policy of the League as representing the Mussalmans of India. The answer which I would give to the question is briefly this. Our policy towards the British Government should be one of unswerving loyalty and towards the Hindoos one of brotherly love and regard. I hold that the policy which should guide us should be that of the younger brother in family towards his guardian and towards his elder brother. While fully maintaining his individuality and remaining keenly alive to his own needs and requirements, he should extend to his guardian his respectful homage and to his elder brother his brotherly affection and sincere regard. My advice to you to offer unswerving loyalty and respectful homage to your guardians does not mean blind or servile submission to all his mandates. Loyalty and homage are in no way inconsistent with representation and agitation. All the constitutional means which are open and available to you should be made use of, both freely and fully, to advance India in every direction, to promote the best interests of our community and to secure better administration by moderate and sober criticism of Government measures. It is unnecessary for me further to dilate upon this aspect of the question, as I am sure you clearly realize what your constitutional rights and privileges are. Make the best use of these, and notwithstanding all the discouragement you may meet with, persevere in your efforts and thereby make your full contribution towards the better administration of this country.

When I am advising you to extend brotherly affection and sincere regard towards the elder brother, I am not forgetting that you are entitled to reciprocity at his hands. The union of the two brothers cannot stand on a one-sided arrangement, I call the Hindoo the elder brother, and I am sure you will agree with me in the view that he occupies that position in the Indian family. He is senior in numbers, in education, in wealth and in many other ways. His obligations therefore under the Indian system of family life are necessarily greater. In order that there should be a sincere and genuine entente each brother must be prepared to discharge his relative duties towards the other in the right spirit. Let us first examine whether the Mussalmans have endeavored to discharge their obligations in the past towards the Hindoos. If we have not done so, we ought to be prepared to make amends and rectify our conduct. You are all aware that the birth of organized Moslem political life dates from the day on which a representative deputation from all the parts of India, headed by our acknowledged leader, His Highness Sir Aga Khan, waited upon H. E. Lord Minto, pressing on the attention of what I will continue to call the guardian, the claims of the younger brother to share directly by election in the representative institutions in the country. This was the first sign that the growth of the younger brother had reached a stage when his needs and requirements were keenly felt, that the training which the guardian had provided for the children was having the same effect upon the younger child as it had had upon the elder one, that the flame of patriotism had been kindled in him also (I trust never to be extinguished thereafter), and therefore he solicited those opportunities for the service of the public which had been given earlier for the benefit of the family. It appears that our steady growth was as inappreciable to the guardian as it was to the elder brother. But we could no longer remain passive spectators of the progress taking place all around us, and we desired to share the burden and the responsibility of service to our country. We craved for a part of those opportunities which had been made available to the people of India, and which had been enjoyed by the elder brother during the period of our infancy. The guardian recognised the force of our just demands and signified his willingness to provide those opportunities which were our legitimate due. How stubbornly the elder brother resisted this recognition of our just rights is now a matter of history.

In view of the cordial relations now subsisting between the two sister communities, I do not wish to dilate upon this point but I cannot help remarking that the elder brother lost a splendid opportunity of winning the younger one, at an impressionable age, wholly towards himself, by failing to realize the far-reaching consequences of wise statesmanship at that psychological moment. There appears to me nothing wrong or unreasonable in the demand of the Moslem community, for those opportunities of serving the public directly by election which have been conceded to the people of this country. The Indian National Congress, which stands for the highest national sentiment in the country, has had to recognise the special representation of the Moslems on the "All India Congress Committee." It has also laid down as a part of its creed that, "in any representations which the Congress may make or in any demands which it may put forward for the larger association of the people of India with the administration of the country, the interest of minorities shall be duly safeguarded." May I enquire what difference there is in principle between duly safeguarding the interest of the minorities (and the Mussalmans form the most important of such minorities) in the political rights and privileges which should be demanded in the future and those which have already been obtained? I cannot conceive that the demand of the Mussalmans for adequate opportunities for representation on the public bodies in the country was in any way unreasonable or unjust or in any way militated against the ultimate realization of the brilliant destiny which awaits the people of this land. Wise statesmanship and sympathetic consideration of each other's needs and requirements are essentially necessary during the period of transition through which every country must pass before reaching its highest destiny. May I enquire whether the Moslem representative on the Legislative Council have been in any way wanting in public spirit or independence, and whether they have not sincerely co-operated with the representatives of the other communities in promoting the best interests of the country? May I request our friends to consider what a tower of strength the association of Moslem representatives with the representatives of other communities furnishes in promoting the political cause of India? When both the representatives elected by the Hindoo majority and by the Mussalmans on the communal basis jointly demand the political and economic progress of the country do they realize how difficult it would be for the guardian to resist such an united demand?

I should like to call your attention in this connection to an extract from the able speech which Mr. Badrudin Tyabji, who afterwards became the Honourable Mr. Justice Tyabji, delivered in Madras as the first Mohamedan President of the Indian National Congress. He said:

"Gentlemen, it is undoubtedly true that each one of our Great Indian Communities has its own peculiar, social, moral, educational and even political difficulties to surmount, but so far as general political questions affecting the whole of India are concerned, I for one am utterly at a loss to understand why Mussalmans should not work shoulder to shoulder with their fellow-countrymen of other races and creeds for the common benefit of all."

May I inquire whether we have not worked in the League on the broad principles laid down by a distinguished co-religionist of ours from the Presidential chair of the National Congress? Examine the resolutions which the League has passed from year to year and compare them with those passed by the Congress, and you will clearly observe that on all questions affecting the common interests of the people of India we have readily and sincerely co-operated. Idealists have however to remember that the Mussalmans of India have their own "peculiar, social, moral, educational and political difficulties to surmount," and that they have therefore to maintain their organized associations and institutions. Remaining keenly alive to our own needs and requirements we have throughout the existence of the League extended a cordial hand of fellowship and co-operation to the sister communities, and I cannot give better advice than to ask you to continue this line of policy as the most foresighted and wise.

MOSLEM ATTITUDE.

Two years ago, finding that Hindoo and Moslem sentiment was becoming estranged and feeling that such a condition was detrimental to the well-being of the country, it was the Moslem community which took the initiative, and under the guidance of their recognised leader, H. H. Sir Aga Khan, went in the form of a special deputation from Nagpore, the seat of the Annual Session of the Moslem League, to Ahababad, the seat of the annual meeting of the Indian National Congress, to meet representative Hindoos and to discuss means by which more cordial relations might be ensured. It was again the act of the younger brother, making a peace-offering to the elder, declaring in an unequivocal manner how keen and how anxious he was to reach a better understanding between the two. You are all aware that after an important discussion a representative Committee consisting of the leaders of both the communities was appointed for the purpose of discussing the points of disagreement and suggesting means and measures by which, in a spirit of reasoned compromise, more cordial relations might be brought about. Two years have passed since the date this Committee was appointed, and it is to be regretted that not a single meeting has yet been held. Whatever may be the cause for this long delay in meeting for such a laudable object, it cannot be gainsaid that we have been always anxious to discharge our obligations towards the elder brother in the right spirit. It is a matter of regret that such a splendid opportunity has not yet been utilised. If there are any reasons which make it difficult to get this Committee together, I would ask you to appoint another Committee for the same purpose. I make this suggestion because I feel strongly that in the interests of India as a whole and those of each of the sister communities, it is pre-eminently desirable that representative men chosen by each should meet from time to time and discuss points about which any disagreement or feeling may exist. Believe me, gentlemen, if a friendly discussion between the recognised leaders of both the communities takes place periodically, it will clear the atmosphere and bring them both much nearer together.

I have briefly indicated how anxious we have been to discharge our obligations towards the elder brother, and we shall always be ready to carefully consider any points on which he may feel that we have failed to do so. If there are any such points, I trust they will be authoritatively communicated to us and I need hardly say that they will receive our anxious attention. I have already said that the brotherly relations between the two cannot stand on a one-sided arrangement. "We are, therefore, entitled to ask that the elder brother should indulge in a little introspection and examine for his own guidance whether he has discharged his obviously greater duties towards the Moslem. I am sure we shall all be very interested to learn the directions in which this has been done. For a thorough understanding between the two, I think it is necessary that the suggestion which I have already made, viz., to appoint a representative Committee, should be acted upon, and that it should meet periodically and discuss all the points affecting the interest and relations of each with the other. It is because I feel that far-reaching result for good will accrue from such a course that I have referred to the matter once again.

THE LEAGUE AND LONDON.

I am sure you will all appreciate the reasons which have induced me to keep to the concluding part of my address, any reference to the recent happenings in London. You will recognise how delicate matter was. The Mussalmans of India have a high regard for Syed Ameer Ali who has during the period of nearly half a century rendered yeoman service to the cause of Islam. His great achievements in the field of literature, his masterly exposition of the faith of Islam, his active co-operation with our distinguished leader H. H. Sir Aga Khan in promoting our political advancement are few of the directions in which he has conferred lasting obligations upon the Mussalmans. On the other hand we have Syed Wazir Hasan and Mr. Mohamed Ali, two of our foremost workers in the interests of Islam. During the comparatively short period of their career, they have proved beyond the shadow of a doubt, their sterling worth, and their whole-hearted devotion to the Moslem cause. The singleness of purpose with which they have identified themselves with the best interests of Islam has justly earned for them high appreciation. It would have been under the circumstances most unfortunate if the differences of opinion which manifested themselves in London should have had any permanent effect. At a time like the present we could ill-afford to lose the services of such a veteran as Syed Ameer Ali, whose presence at the head of our political organization in the centre of the vast British Empire is of great value. I am sure, Gentlemen, you will have learnt with a feeling of relief and gratification that through the kind offices of our esteemed leader, H. H. Sir Aga Khan, the prevailing difficulties have been overcome and that the London League is again a united whole ready to work strenuously and zealously for promoting our best interests.

There is, however, one point in connection with the recent discussion which requires to be emphatically laid down. The London League must be regarded as a branch of the Parent League, as its very name indicated, and must work on the line of policy laid down in India. Differences of opinion must be welcomed, but differences of principle cannot be allowed. Constitutional means are open to each Branch of the League to raise questions of principle, but in that case the required procedure must be implicitly followed.

Gentlemen, you must have been amazed at the criticism which has been recently levelled against what are termed the educated young Mussalmans of India. Sedition and disloyalty appear to be the stock in trade of some critics. Need I tell them that there is not even the shadow of disloyalty or sedition amongst the Mussalmans of India, whether young or old? Need I add that His Majesty's Mussulman subjects in India are as thoroughly loyal to-day as ever they were before? It is perfectly true that the vivifying influence of education is having upon them the same effect as it has had upon the sister communities. They have become politically articulate and have organized themselves for the purpose of promoting the best interests of their community. They are availing themselves of the constitutional means open to every section of the Indian people. Can a single instance be quoted in which they have gone in the slightest degree beyond the accepted limits of constitutional agitation? Not only have we not over-stepped its legitimate bounds but I will unhesitatingly declare on your behalf that nothing is farther removed from our minds than to engage in any movement or action which has in it the least tinge of disloyalty or sedition. It would be to the advantage of every one concerned if people would talk a little less of Indian disloyalty and sedition.

In conclusion, I beg to tender to you my grateful acknowledgments for your indulgence in bearing with me for so much time. I am deeply touched by your kindness and consideration and beg to tender to you once again my sincere thanks for the high honour you have conferred upon me by inviting to preside at your deliberations.

The All-India Moslem League.

PROPOSED NATIONAL FUND.

The first resolution was then moved by His Highness the Aga Khan to the effect that in view of the growing political needs of the Mohamedan community, it was necessary to take steps to establish a permanent national fund. His Highness in a short speech strongly appealed for funds, the want of which considerably hampered the work of the League. Every political organisation and party in Europe and America had immense funds at its back and the absence of funds in the League was a national disgrace. If the League was to do any good work, it must be self-supporting; otherwise it could not command self-respect. The fund must come from the nation, otherwise it could not be called a national fund. His Highness said that the committee which was to be formed to collect the fund would be announced later.

The resolution was duly seconded by the Raja of Mahmudabad and passed.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The second resolution which was moved by Nawab Zulfikar Ali Khan expressed the indignation of Indians at the ill-treatment of their countrymen in South Africa and tendered respectful thanks to Lord Hardinge for his pronouncement in Madras. The speaker in the course of his speech reiterated the demand for the repeal of the three-pounds-tax and the removal of other disabilities under which Indians are suffering. He said the personnel of the Commission appointed by the South African Government had given satisfaction to none in India as it had not the confidence of Mr. Gandhi and his colleagues who were immediately affected by it. He eulogised the services rendered by Mr. Gokhale in this connection, describing him as a disinterested patriot, whom all sections in India claimed as belonging to them. The speaker said Indians in South Africa demanded nothing that was not due to them. Their demand was that they should be recognised as subjects of His Majesty the King-Emperor. If the British Government had taken up the matter seriously the affair would have been settled long ago. That public opinion in England could exercise adequate influence on the affairs of colonial governments was evident from the fact that after the storm of indignation raised in India and England, the Union Government lost no time in appointing the Commission. He appealed to all sections to demand justice until justice was done. The speaker in conclusion expressed the obligation of all India to Lord Hardinge for his most generous pronouncement in Madras and thanked him for deputing Sir Benjamin Robertson to lay the Indian side of the case before the Commissioners.

Mr. Abdur Rauf of Allahabad, supported the resolution, and said that the time had come when the promises which were made by the rulers that Indians should be treated as British subjects and that no difference should be made on account of race, religion or colour should be fulfilled.

Mr. Abdul Wadud, Secretary, Moslem Association, Bareilly, said he had been commissioned by Nawab Vicar-ul-Mulk to support the resolution on his behalf. The Nawab was too old to attend the League's meetings. He also sent garlands for the President, Mr. Wazir Hasan and Mr. Mohamed Ali and for Mr. Zafar Ali Khan who had, however, not yet returned.

The President on behalf of the Nawab then garlanded Mr. Wazir Hasan and Mr. Mohamed Ali, amid repeated cheers from the auditorium. The resolution regarding South Africa was then duly passed.

THE EXECUTIVE AND JUDICIARY.

The Hon. Mian Mohamed Shafi moved the third resolution which ran as follows:—"That the All-India Moslem League urges the separation of judicial from executive functions and the placing of the judiciary under the control of the highest Court in every province." Mr. Shafi said there was no necessity to say much or to put forward any fresh reason in support of the scheme of separation because Government had long acknowledged the urgency of that popular demand. It was the duty of Government to fulfil the pledge given by Sir Harvey Adamson from his place in the Imperial Legislative Council. It was a matter of deep regret that a solemn promise had not been fulfilled. The only thing that could enhance the prestige of Government was to take people into their confidence. The Congress and the All-India Moslem League had passed this resolution year after year and Government did not require any further proof that the demand for the reform was strong and unanimous.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Samiullah and supported by Mr. Mohamed Ali. The latter said that two arguments which had been put forward by officials with great emphasis against the separation were those of prestige and expenditure. He was sure the argument of prestige had long been exploded. As for expenditure, the people of India were prepared to meet any extra demand on their finances. He said he did not care for the maintenance of any prestige unless it was based on justice and righteousness and such prestige would be enhanced by the separation of executive and judicial functions.

Mr. Mohamed Ali added that the argument of prestige was the best reason for, instead of being any reason against the separation, for in effect it amounted to this that an Executive Officer demanded obedience to his will from the people in matters in which they were free to follow his advice or not by keeping them in fear of the powers he possessed as a Judicial Officer. This was a form of blackmail which it was wholly un-British to levy, and once the voters in England realized this they would press the Home Government for a long overdue reform. As for the possibility of increased expenditure, his experience of Baroda where the proposed reform was in full working order throughout the State belied such fears. But it was highly significant that although in demanding higher salaries and pensions, more rapid promotions and increased generosity in leave and furlough rules, the officials were so many Oliver Twists, they had a sudden access of thrift the moment the separation of judicial and executive functions was suggested, and every Assistant Collector felt burdened with the load of responsibilities of the Finance Member.

The resolution was put to the meeting and carried.

On 31st December the usual resolution in favour of communal representation met with some opposition by Moslems who desire an understanding on the subject with the Hindu community.

A resolution was moved by the Hon. Mr. Rafi-ud-din (Bombay), which ran as follows:—"That the All-India Moslem League once again records its deliberate opinion that in the interests of the Mussalman community it is absolutely necessary that the principle of communal representation be extended to all self-governing public bodies, and respectfully urges that a provision for the adequate and effective representation of Mussalmans on Municipal and District Boards is a necessary corollary of the application of the principle to the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils, and at the same time essential to the successful working of these public bodies."

The speaker said the resolution was very important yet it should be passed without much discussion as for the last six years it had been unanimously passed at every sitting of the League. Lord Minto acknowledged the justice of the demand long ago.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Zahoor Ahmad (Allahabad), Mr. Mujibur Rahman (Bengal) then moved the following amendment:—"That the All-India Moslem League is of opinion that in order to protect the rights and safeguard the interests of Mohamedans it is absolutely necessary that they should be adequately and effectively represented on all local self-governing bodies and urges upon the Government to make provision for such representation, and the League is further of opinion that the proportion of elected members on local bodies should be increased."

Mr. Abul Kasim, in seconding, said he was as much anxious as his co-religionists for effective representation in councils and local bodies. He explained the difference between the original resolution and the amendment. He did not attach so much importance to separate electorates as to effective representation.

Mr. Mohamed Ali moved the second amendment, which ran as follows:—"That the All-India Moslem League is of opinion that the consideration of the question of communal representation in self-governing bodies should be postponed for a year."

Mr. Mohamed Ali said that in India there were two communities, the Hindus and Mohamedans, and it would be impossible for either of them to annihilate the other. If either community ever desired such a consummation it had had several centuries at its disposal to try this particularly foolish experiment. It was too late to try it again, and if it was not to be tried, why not try the methods of mutual conciliation? It would be to the ultimate interest of India for the two communities to work together. He said the Hindus had always opposed separate representation in the Congress, but this year, out of regard for Moslem feeling, they had not passed the resolution. This clearly showed that the Hindus were convinced of the necessity of a settlement by consent. He wanted the two communities to unite and it was no disgrace for Mussalmans to move forward in the matter. They must show that they were prepared to meet the Hindus even more than half-way. He urged this not because the Hindus wanted reconciliation, but because the procedure, he suggested, was in perfect keeping with the teaching of the Prophet who prayed even for those who had injured him. He would not apportion any praise or blame at present. Both communities were at fault, and both must excuse one another. He made it clear that his views on the subject of communal representation had undergone no change except that the operation of the system in actual practice confirmed him in the belief that the solution of the difficulties of nation-building in India would be the extension of the system of communal representation. Unity would come to India through this apparent separation. India would be united in a Federation of Faiths. But that was not the question before them at the time. All that he asked for was the postponement of the usual resolution on the subject in order to emphasise the points on which there was complete agreement between the Hindus and the Mussalmans and to minimise the points of difference which, he fervently hoped, would be settled by consent when both communities felt fully convinced of the good intentions of one another and became ready to approach each outstanding question in the spirit of reasonableness, equity and compromise. It was undoubted that the two communities stood closer together than they had done at any time during the last quarter of a century, and although recent events in the United Provinces had to some extent dimmed a comparatively cheerful prospect, that was all the more reason that the consideration of that question on which there was considerable difference of opinion between the two communities should be postponed for a year in order that the prospect may not grow gloomier. He appealed in the name of expediency to those who only too often paraded it as their sole virtue and begged them not to disregard the claims of those cardinal virtues of theirs, sobriety and moderation.

Mr. Jinnah, in seconding the amendment, strongly appealed to Mussalmans not to press the question this year. The question was of the utmost importance and the proposal that it should be postponed till next year was a responsible one. He urged them to consider the question dispassionately, not from the point of view of present gain but of lasting advantage in the future. He assured his co-religionists that by demanding special representation they would get only two watertight compartments. The position was extremely difficult. They had begged the Indian National Congress to drop the question, which they did, and it should not be too much to ask Mohamedans to postpone the question for one year. In politics expediency was of the utmost value. There were many reasons why he asked his co-religionists for a postponement, but he could not give all his reasons in public. He finally begged Mussalmans not to press the question, for if they did they would get the shadow and not the substance.

THE AGA KHAN'S APPEAL.

His Highness the Aga Khan came forward and made a stirring appeal to those present to consider the question dispassionately. He said the question was not whether Mohamedans would renounce what they had got. The question was whether the time was propitious to pass a resolution this year. In his opinion it would be better to concentrate on more important problems like that of South Africa. Time should be allowed to the leaders of the two communities to arrive at a settlement. If no compromise were arrived at, they could take up the question next year. It would promote the cause of Islam if they showed their good intentions to their neighbours.

THE AMENDMENT LOST.

The Hon. Mr. Raza Ali (Moradabad) said it did not require much display of enthusiasm to convey the urgency of the demand for communal representation. In the Punjab and the United Provinces Mussalmans were nowhere as far as representation on local bodies was concerned.

Mr. Mazharul Haque, Barrister-at-law (Bankipur) said that he was alone when he made similar proposals at Lucknow last year, but now some leading Mohamedans held similar views to those he held. Their amendment might be lost but the discussion showed who was right and who was wrong. The object of Mussalmans should be to keep pace with other communities. The welfare of India depended on the union of Hindus and Mussalmans. He all along held that separate representation was harmful to the interests of Mussalmans. He entreated his co-religionists not to press the resolution this year.

Nawab Zulfiqar Ali and several other speakers followed. They unanimously contended that nothing would be lost by postponing the resolution for a year.

The Hon. Mr. Abdur Rauf (Allahabad) said the original resolution must be pressed and he was supported by the Hon. Mir Asad Ali Khan, Mr. Alay Nabi and several other speakers.

The President said the question had been amply discussed both by supporters of the resolution, as also by supporters of the amendment. He had only one alternative left and that was to decide the adoption of the original resolution or the amendment by votes.

After a prolonged discussion it was decided, by a ruling from the chair in favour of Mr. Mohamed Ali's contention, that the voting would be in accordance with rule 32 which laid down that votes should be recorded according to the allotment of the number of members to the Council of the League by provinces.

After the votes had been recorded the result was declared as follows:—For the amendment for postponement moved by Mr. Mohamed Ali, 40 votes. Against, 89 votes.

Mr. Mujibur Rahman's amendment was withdrawn and the original resolution was declared passed.

REPEAL OF THE PRESS ACT.

On the motion of Mr. Abul Kasim, Seconded by Dr. Nazir-ud-din Hasan, the League unanimously resolved that the Press Act be repealed specially in view of the recent Judgment of the Calcutta High Court.

INDIANS AND THE ARMY.

Mr. Abdul Wali Khan (Peshawar) moved that the time had arrived when the Government should give Indians a share in the defence of their country by appointing qualified Indians to higher posts and commissions in the Army for which Europeans alone are now eligible. He said it was unnecessary to recount the feats of valour performed by native troops in various campaigns. On many a battlefield it had been seen how much the Indians could be trusted in military affairs. The resolutions being duly supported was carried.

PUNJAB CHIEF COURT.

The next resolution was moved by Mr. Gul Mohamed (Ferozepur) and was to the effect that the All-India Moslem League is of opinion that the status of the Punjab Chief Court should be raised to that of a chartered High Court. The mover said the question had long been before Government and no more time should be lost in giving effect to what the resolution urged. The Punjab had already expressed its emphatic opinion in favour of the scheme.

The resolution was carried after being duly seconded.

INDIANS AND BRITISH COLONIES.

Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami, I.M.S. (retired), moved the following resolutions:—"That the All-India Moslem League records its deliberate opinion that the present status of Zanzibar should not be changed and that the present rights, privileges and status of Indians in British East Africa and Uganda should remain intact." The mover said the whole world was watching what was happening in South Africa and he had no doubt that the people of India were anxious that their fellow-country men should not suffer in anyway in any part of the world. This resolution, as well as the next resolution which protested against the continuous journey clause in Privy Council Order, No. 920, which had the effect of preventing Indians from going to Canada, were unanimously carried.

EXECUTIVE COUNCILS FOR THE U. P. AND THE PUNJAB.

Mr. Mohamed Ali moved the next resolution which urged the establishment of Executive Councils in the United Provinces and the Punjab. The speaker said that the population of the United Provinces was no less than forty-eight millions, which was more than that of Great Britain, where the Government was vested in the King in Parliament in which the voice of the people was predominant. The benefit of such a system was that if one man was going wrong, his action could be checked or rectified by others. In India, however, the unaided judgment of one administrator was relied upon for the good government of half a hundred million souls. With the greatest goodwill he could not attend to all the work that came to him, and in effect he had an Executive Council in the Secretaries and Under Secretaries on whom the work actually devolved. But they had all a Member of Council's powers without his responsibility and the result of the divorce of responsibility from power was as usual deplorable. The speaker referred to Sir John Hewett's standing in the way of this reform, and the hopes entertained of it on Sir James Meston's appointment. The result of the debate in the U. P. Council was not conclusive as Sir James Meston himself had stated. He now hoped that Sir James would support the universal demand for an Executive Council and he trusted that in pressing this reform in the Punjab also he was not any more "disloyal" than those stalwart "loyalists" of the Punjab who assured him that they were just as anxious as he for placing this necessary check on the autocracy of Lieutenant-Governors. Such questions as this and the separation of the judiciary and the executive, the placing of the judiciary under the highest judicial tribunal and not under the executive, and the raising of Chief Courts of which the judges were appointed practically by the Lieutenant-Governors to the status of a High Court of which His Majesty appointed the judges—such questions, said the speaker, were the truest test of so-called loyalty and disloyalty, and it seemed to him that there were more distinctions than differences.

The resolution was supported by the Hon. Mr. Fazl-ul-Haq (Bengal) and was carried.

MOHAMEDAN ENDOWMENTS.

The next resolution, which prayed Government to insist on an enquiry into the general purposes and manner of administration of existing Mussalman endowments, designed mainly for public benefit, was moved by Mr. Fazle Husain and carried.

COW SACRIFICES.

The Hon. Mr. Fazl-ul-Haq moved a resolution to the effect that recognising the necessity of respecting the legitimate sentiments of the Hindu community regarding the manner of offering cow sacrifices on the occasion of the Bakar Id, the League protests against the act on taken by the local authorities of Fyzabad and other places in the said matter, which in the opinion of the League constitutes unwarranted interference with the religious rights of the Moslem community.

Both the mover and the Hon. Mr. Abdur Rauf said that all differences between the communities at a time of a religious festival should be settled by the communities themselves and the authorities should not be allowed to interfere. Mr. Rauf asked the respective communities to devise such methods as to avoid all causes of trouble and respect each other's feelings. The British Government were loved because of their promise of non-interference with the religion of the people and on that account they would protest against any official interference in their religious ceremonies.

PRESERVATION OF SACRED PLACES.

On the motion of the Hon. Nawab Syed Nawab Ali Chaudhri (Bengal) the following resolution was unanimously carried:—"That the All-India Moslem League urges upon Government the imperative necessity of taking all legislative and other steps necessary to safeguard the sanctity and existence of, and to keep intact, all public places of worship and other sacred places in India." In a very brief speech, the speaker urged that to give effect to the resolution the Land Acquisition Act should be amended.

EXTENSION OF THE PERMANENT SETTLEMENT.

The next resolution urged the extension of the permanent settlement to such parts of the country as were ripe for it, and that where Government deemed it inadvisable to do so, judicial restrictions should be imposed on over-assessment. The speaker eulogised the services of the late Mr. R. C. Dutt who had rendered admirable services to India on questions of the land revenue policy of the Government. He said, the agrarian trouble of India would be settled once for all if the permanent settlement were extended all over the country.

There were some dissentient voices against the first part of the resolution and Mr. Mohamed Ali was among the opposers.

The resolution was, however, carried by a majority.

THE INDIAN COUNCIL.

Mr. Jinnah moved a resolution urging the reconstitution of the India Council. The resolution was passed on the same lines as that adopted by the Congress. Mr. Jinnah urged that the salary of the Secretary of State should be placed on the British estimates. He also urged that the Council should be advisory and not administrative. The Secretary of State at present was playing the Great Moghal more than any Moghal ruler of India.

The Hon. Mr. Abdur Rauf said that if the salary of the Secretary of State were placed on the British estimates, English people would have a firm grip on his action.

The Hon. Mr. Rafi-ud-din moved an amendment to the effect that the following words be added:—"That Mohamedan representation should be duly safeguarded in any extension or modification of the Council of the Secretary of State." Mr. Mohamed Ali seconded this.

The amendment being accepted by Mr. Jinnah, the entire resolution was carried unanimously.

THE CAWNPORE MOSQUE CASE.

The last resolution of this year's sitting was moved by H. H. the Aga Khan and ran as follows:—"The All-India Moslem League begs to place on record its warm appreciation of the wise and courageous statesmanship with which His Excellency the Viceroy dealt with the Cawnpore mosque case, and expresses its deep sense of gratitude for his bringing peace to Cawnpore and the Moslem community in a manner which has enhanced the faith of the people of India in British justice."

His Highness, who spoke in Persian, said the truth was with the Mussalman community and it was upheld by His Excellency the Viceroy, who set aside the order of the Lieutenant-Governor. He restored the mosque and Mussalmans got back their right. It was now their duty to thank the Viceroy and he asked Mohamedans to pass the resolution unanimously. Although on some occasions individual officers were too theoretical, justice could always be counted upon in the end.

The Raja of Mahmudabad, supporting in Urdu, related the history of the mosque affair. He said that those engaged in the Cawnpore affair had to bear great sufferings. Every kind of appeal that was made had been refused. After all justice had been done. The hundred and five prisoners who suffered immensely had all been released and His Excellency had not only restored the national honour of Moslems but also the prestige of British Justice.

Mr. Abul Kalam Azad, editor of Al-Hila', said justice was not obtained from the Local Government from which the people expected justice, but from the heights of Simla. Though he knew that justice could not always be expected from individual officers in this country, he knew for certain that justice would ultimately come from the British Crown.

Mr. Mazharul Haque said no one was more grateful to the Viceroy than himself. No better settlement could have been arrived at and he gave a brief account of what happened at Cawnpore and how much relief he now felt. He thanked Mohamedans for their liberal support. In conclusion he said he knew how much Lord Hardinge was abused by the Civil Service in this country, but he had maintained the highest traditions of British rule.

The resolution was received with great acclamation and carried unanimously.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

On the motion of Mr. Wazir Hassan, the election of some office-bearers for the All-India Moslem League was carried through. Mr. Wazir Hassan announced that His Highness the Aga Khan had resigned the Presidentship of the All-India Moslem League. He thought it would be a calamity for Mahomedans when His Highness resigned.

The President said that, however painful the decision of the Aga Khan, it was irrevocable, and they had to accept it. He, however, appealed to the Aga Khan not to place his resignation in their hands to-day and to continue as President till the rules of the League were altered.

His Highness said he would remain President for the time suggested. He said that in no case would he sever his connection with the League as Vice-President.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The Raja of Mahmudabad proposed a vote of thanks to the Chairman. With cheers for the President, the Aga Khan, and the Raja of Mahmudabad the current session of the League broke up at 7.30.

All-India Mohamedan Educational Conference.

THE following are extracts from the Presidential address delivered by Mr. Justice M. Shah Din at the twenty-seventh session of the All-India Mohamedan Educational Conference held at Agra on the 26th, 27th and 28th December:—

After referring to the Aligarh College, the President said:—Gentlemen, one of the most pleasing results of the spread of the Aligarh movement in India was the organised effort recently made by our community to collect funds for the establishment of a Moslem University at Aligarh. The wave of enthusiasm which passed over all classes of Musalmans throughout the length and breadth of the land and the striking success achieved by the promoters of the University idea under the brilliant leadership of His Highness the Aga Khan are significant proof of the great awakening which has taken place among our people; and this is mainly due to the gradual infiltration of liberal ideas first promulgated at Aligarh. These ideas, and the principles underlying them, must be diligently spread among Musalmans and applied to the new order of things which is coming into existence; and you may then be sure that in the domain of education, as also in other fields of activity, our community will come to occupy a position worthy of its traditions and of its numerical strength in the country. With you education is the supreme need of the hour, for remember that upon the extent to which your community will be educated on modern lines will depend your progress, relatively to the other communities, in all the more important walks of life. A disregard of this truth will assuredly endanger your position in this country.

The Moslem University question has been discussed for the past three years in many of its bearings in all parts of the country; and having regard to the fact that it is under the consideration of certain representative Committees duly empowered to deal with it, I do not feel called upon to say anything special about it on the present occasion. I may, however, be permitted to remark that, after having shown unusually keen interest in it the community seems to have relapsed into something like indifference towards it. I know that this is chiefly due to the fact that momentous events of a most serious character have happened in the Moslem world which have engrossed the attention of the Indian Mohamedans and have placed their scanty resources under a severe strain. But now that the clouds have rolled away and we are in sight of clearer skies, I earnestly beseech you to turn your attention once more to the University question which has become for us a question of sovereign importance. And in this connection may I venture upon a word of advice? It is essential to the right resolution of this question that your leading men should bring to bear upon it their best qualities of head and heart, and it is equally necessary that the rank and file of the community should follow their lead in this matter with confident loyalty. I very much doubt whether our leaders fully realise the nature and extent of the responsibilities which rest upon their shoulders; they have launched upon an experiment of enormous difficulty with probable consequences of a far-reaching character; and at times it seems as if they were driving the chariot of the Sun with hands unequal to the task. This is borne out by the discussions which have taken place over the University question both in the Moslem press and at the meetings of the Committees that are charged with its detailed consideration, and thoughtful men have often shaken their heads over the results thus far achieved. The grave defect in the general attitude of the Mohamedans towards this question is that almost every one who has subscribed, or even promised to subscribe, to the University funds claims the right to give his opinion as to the constitution of the proposed University and the future management of its affairs without stopping to consider whether he has the necessary capacity to form a right opinion about these matters. People who do not know even the rudiments of the educational problem in India have rushed into print and have expressed opinions on the Moslem University scheme which have staggered men who have received University education themselves and who therefore realise, to some extent, the complicated nature of the great issues involved in the situation. I would earnestly advise the community to leave the consideration and decision of the whole University question in the hands of educational experts—men fully qualified by education and experience to speak on this question with authority—and I would implore those experts to do their work with thoroughness, courage and discrimination. The whole question bristles with difficulties; they must be realised and faced, and fair-seeming generalisations or hasty conclusions must be avoided. My own belief, founded upon a brief experience of the actual working of a University, is that our real difficulties will begin after the Charter has been granted and the Moslem University has come into existence. College scheme, and we thankfully acknowledge that the remarkable success which has attended the efforts of the Peshawar Musalmans in this matter is due mainly to his generous sympathy and support. This College bids fair to become a great moral force in the North-West Frontier Province, and among the Mohamedans of that Province, the name of Sir George Roos-Koppel will go down to posterity as one of their greatest benefactors.

The educational problem with which we, Indian Mohamedans, are confronted has two sides—and these I may perhaps not inappropriately term the technical side and the liberal side. The technical side of our educational problem has reference mainly to our relative position, as compared with the other communities in respect of the number of Mohamedan scholars in the various stages of instruction in Schools and Colleges of all kinds, the proportion of Mohamedan who have taken University degrees, their number in the learned professions, and their position in the public service of the country. In this connection, we have to study the causes of our comparative backwardness in primary, secondary and higher education, and have to devise means for removing the existing disparity in this respect between the other leading communities and our own. The liberal side of our educational problem is concerned with quite different kinds of phenomena which exhibit themselves, in close affinity with the higher and more refined aspects of individual and national life, in an invigorating atmosphere of culture and enlightenment in which alone can flourish the most fruitful virtues of civilized man. I shall explain my meaning by a simple illustration.

In your experience of the concrete results of modern education most of you must have come across two types of educated men in this country. One is that of a young man who has applied himself assiduously to his text-books; who by passing successive examinations has risen laboriously from the lowest rung of the educational ladder to the highest; and who, after a brilliant academic career, has carried off a great many of the prizes open to men of his time. In the student world he has the reputation of being a walking encyclopædia of knowledge, and his College fellows look up to him with nervous respect as a man of great condition. But scratch him and you will find a barbarian, without a vestige of real culture in him, and he is none the less a barbarian because he carries a mountainous load of books on his back. As Sadi says:

چارپاے برو کتابی چند

The other type is that of the student who, in going through his School and his College curriculum, has paid more attention to the spirit of the books he has read than to their verbal frame work; who has not distinguished himself in the examination hall or won laurels at the University Convocation, but who has assimilated the knowledge placed at his disposal by his teachers; who has tried to apply it to the actual facts of life; who has acquired a wider and more practical outlook upon the world and has thus become a truly cultured member of society. His inner self is in perfect harmony with his enlightened exterior, and he is a moral force of no mean potency in his own social circle.

What is true of individuals is also true of communities, and among the latter you will find the same types of temperament and behaviour which I have described above. Now, although the present needs of the country are such that we must continue to pay attention to the technical side of our educational problem, or, in other words, must try to produce from among us as many "educated barbarians" as we can, we must not lose sight of what I have called the liberal side of that problem, that is to say, we must endeavour to understand and assimilate and exhibit in our daily actions the most enduring principles of modern civic life so as to become in course of time a community of cultured and enlightened men.

The march of events in India has brought us to stage of progress at which it should be impossible for anyone but the most bigoted Mullah not to recognise the urgent need of an organised and sustained scheme for promoting sound education among our women. In the West women have been playing, for a long time past, a by no means unimportant part in the healthy evolution of national life, and of recent years signs are not wanting in the East, and especially in our own country, to show that the weaker sex is inwardly feeling its strength and seriously means to step out of its accustomed seclusion to take an honourable and increasing interest in the more practical concerns of the outside world. It is impossible now to stem the tide which is flowing in this direction even if some of you, with a supreme contempt for the needs of the times, were to think of doing so, and you would be well advised so to regulate it into existence; and my fear is that very few of the promoters of the scheme are giving themselves the necessary training to cope with the task that lies before them. The practical training in education and work which the Trustees of the Aligarh College are receiving under present conditions is not the kind of training required for the governing bodies of the proposed University, which, like the Syndicates and Senates of the existing Indian Universities, will be in independent charge of the whole work of higher education connected with the various faculties of Western and Oriental learning. Our University will be an examining as well as a teaching body and questions relating to the laying down of standards, the selection of text-books for all the examinations, the appointment of Examiners, the conduct of Examinations, and all subsidiary matters will have to be thrashed on and settled mostly by men on the spot. The governing body of a College affiliated to a University, such as the Aligarh College, is never confronted with these problems; and when we remember the increasing difficulties which the Aligarh authorities have to face as time goes on, we can form a faint idea of what is in store for the Court and Senate of the proposed Moslem University. Our educationists must therefore train themselves assiduously for the new work that they will be called upon to do; and if they fail to attain the requisite standard of efficiency I fear that the University which has been so much talked of will prove a doubtful boon. Gentlemen, continued the president, the Government of India have recently laid down an extensive programme of educational expansion, and the Mohomedans must be prepared to take full advantage of the facilities thus afforded for the spread of education among the upper classes and the masses of the country. The Government of India resolution, dated the 21st February 1913, sketched the broad outlines of the policy which the Department of Education intends to pursue in the matter of promoting both elementary and higher education, and that resolution marks a most important stage in the educational development of this country. Soon after, on the 3rd of April 1913, the Government of India addressed a circular letter to all the Local Governments and Administrations on the subject of Mohomedan education, calling attention to the unsatisfactory condition of that education, except in the primary stage, in all the provinces, and inviting suggestions and recommendations as to the best means of improving it. In that letter the Government of India expressed their anxious desire that all reasonable facilities should be provided for the education of Mohomedans and indicated generally the direction in which enquiry and special action will, in their opinion, be useful. The Government of India letter is still, I understand, under the consideration of most of the Local Governments and the latter have asked for the opinions of the Islamia Anjumans and the leading Mohomedan gentlemen in their respective provinces on the points raised in the letter in question and generally on the subject of advancing Mohomedan education. I earnestly hope that the various Anjumans addressed by the Local Governments will consider the whole subject thoroughly in all its bearings, with special reference to their local requirement and will submit practical and useful suggestions for improving the education of Musalmans in all stages of instruction, more especially in the secondary and collegiate stages, in which our community is most inadequately represented. We are all deeply grateful to the Government of India for the special interest it has taken in Mohomedan education and on behalf of the Indian Musalmans may express the hope that the Local Governments throughout the country may see their way to adopt special measures to encourage and promote the education of their Mohomedan subjects in accordance with the policy outlined in the Government of India letter of the 3rd February last. The whole community is awaiting with deep anxiety the result of the momentous step taken by the Supreme Government in this matter; for the Mohomedans have now come to recognise that in modern education alone lies their salvation, and they feel that their educational development will be assured if their own efforts to improve their education are supplemented by practical sympathy and encouragement from Government. They know that at this moment there is at the head of the Indian Government a broad-minded statesman who is prepared to weigh sympathetically the special claims of backward communities to considerate treatment in the best interests of the general progress of the country; and they are determined, on their own part, to do all that lies in their power to help themselves.

A most gratifying instance of self-help on the part of our co-religionists and of sympathetic encouragement by a Local Government in the matter of our education is afforded by the recent establishment of an Islamia College at Peshawar. We are all deeply grateful to Mr George Roose-Keppel for the great interest which he has taken from the very beginning in the Islamia College as to be able to divert it into proper channels. The enormous influence of women on the essentially human side of the character of mankind must be obvious to the most superficial observer; and our first duty at the present moment is to refine and purify that influence in our country and to bring it to bear upon the totality of our individual and corporate life in order to make it more fruitful in relation to the great movements of the world.

From the time when the first stirrings of new life send a thrill of joy through an expectant family circle to the supremely critical moment when the last ray of hope is extinguished and the dark shadows of death close in upon an emaciated figure, the personality of woman stand out as being in close vital touch with some of the most powerful springs of human thought and action; and so her part in shaping the destiny of man has been recognised in the modern age as one of great motive power. You will all remember the pregnant saying that the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world, and I may add that the delicate fingers that in sick chamber close, with an inexpressibly affectionate touch, the eyes of the expiring man have ever been busy in unravelling the tangled skein of this private affairs which fill a large part of the span of life. The formation of useful habits in early life; the stiffening of the moral fibre in the child; the development of the social sympathies and antipathies of the youth; the successful working of that most delicate and difficult of all human relationships called marriage; the creation of an atmosphere of domestic harmony and concord, of affection and contentment in which the best private virtues always thrive—all these depend, in a large measure, upon the extent to which woman is trained and permitted to do her own proper share of work in society.

No scheme of national education will be complete among the Indian Mohomedans which does not make ample provision for the education of women on modern lines, with special reference to the peculiar need of a progressive Islamic community. This does not by any means imply the wholesale adoption of the methods of instruction and of the standards of culture which have come to be associated with Western civilization; we in the East have our own distinctive traditions and predominant tendencies of thought, and we must evolve a new type of culture as the result of a wholesome combination of the Asiatic and European systems of training. One thing is, however, clear, and that is that the purely Eastern modes of education would be as stale, insipid and unprofitable in the case of our women as they have proved to be in the case of our men, and the community must make up its mind once and for all to allow its girls to be instructed in the elements of knowledge according to the more scientific methods of the modern age. The time has long since gone by when even our leading men favoured the idea of concentrating all our energies upon perfecting the education of boys before taking up the question of educating our girls; we have advanced far beyond the stage at which such a view could be held and acted upon without endangering our national position in India. In these days the education of girls must proceed pari passu with that of boys, and I am certain that a disregard of this principle will result in serious difficulties and greatly handicap us in the race of life.

There is urgent need of emphasising this principle in our national system of education, and the public mind must be trained to recognise its importance. Unfortunately the Indian Musalmans has still very primitive ideas on this subject; and this was made painfully clear only recently in the Punjab in the course of a controversy which was waged there over a proposal to introduce the teaching of English into the curriculum of a new Girls' School which has been started by the Anjuman-i-Himayat-ul-Islam of Lahore. The question aroused a heated discussion both within the Anjuman and outside it; and I felt genuinely distressed at the enormous amount of turgid nonsense that was retailed in the vernacular press by writers who posed as well-informed critics, but who seemed to have the crudest conception of what education really means for the sexes and what the special requirements of the Mohomedans are in the India of the present day.

After referring to the active sympathy of the Begum of Bhopal the speaker continued:

Gentlemen, if I were asked to sum up in one short phrase the failings of the Indian Musalmans at the present moment, I would reply—Want of Self-discipline.

I am aware that human activity spreads itself over such a vast surface and expresses itself in such a variety of concrete forms that any generalisation intended to cover its innumerable manifestations in any one phase of life would often both misleading and untrue. But at the same time we can, I think discover at any particular stage of the moral and material progress of a community some of the predominant traits of its character which manifest themselves with more or less persistence in its thought and action, and which for the time being, serve to differentiate it from other communities. It seems to me that we Mohomedans suffer, in a peculiar degree, from a lack of disciplinary self-restraint, and even our virtues are at times made to appear as serious faults because of this great defect in our national character. Illustrations of this can be easily furnished from the religious and secular life of our people. An excess of zeal in the observance of religious ceremonial is the most striking characteristic of the Musalmans, and their piety often manifests itself in extravagant forms to the utter disregard of the spirit underlying their religious precepts. They forget that Islam in all its injunctions insists upon a reasonable adjustment of the religious and the secular duties, discourages asceticism with its excessive to the affairs of the next world, and enforces the rule of the golden mean between two extremes in all human relations. Our preachers always administer an over-dose of theological admonition to their congregations, and the latter are thereby led to be over-zealous in their performance of the chief practical duties enjoined by Islam, regardless of the limitations imposed in connection with them by the great Law-giver. Much of our energy thus runs to waste in a spirit of indifference towards some of the chief concerns of life is engendered; and little activity is shown by our people in overcoming the difficulties that lie in the path of secular advance. Think for a moment of the way in which our most useful institution of alms giving is abused by the generality of the pious Musalmans. Every one of them considers himself free to dole out his charity as he chooses; the objects of charitable relief are not carefully selected; no method is observed at all in the distribution of such relief; all advice and directions for the organisation and systematic control of Zakat are resented; and the result is an appalling waste of substance and strength which, if the Musalmans only submitted themselves to a little judicious discipline, could be utilised to great national ends. Our educational institutions would not then be starved, as is the case now, through want of financial aid, and the problem of Mohamedan backwardness would be partly solved. Consider, again the serious difficulties which have to be faced both in India and in Arabia itself, because Mohamedans who are too poor to pay the expenses of a pilgrimage to Mecca and who are therefore prohibited by Islam from undertaking it, insist on going to the Hajj in large numbers every year, with the result that many of them are either left to perish in Arabia or prove a heavy burden to their richer fellow pilgrims. The drain on the resources of the Musalmans involved in this proceeding which is repeated year after year, is enormous; and it could be easily avoided if they were to learn how to strictly regulate their exuberant religious fervour according to the very sound rules laid down by Islam. The one great fault in the Moslem character is want of sobriety, moderation, restraint and self-denial, and yet these are the qualities to which Islam assigns a high place in the list of human virtues. A man can be as selfish, wasteful and immoderate in devotional exercises as in his worldly relations with his fellow-beings, and the inculcation of this truth should be the aim of all religious education.

If we turn to the secular side of our life, we find that want of self-discipline is a great impediment in the path of Moslem progress. The tendency observable in the younger generation towards destructive criticism without a corresponding anxiety to show constructive work is an illustration of this failing, and one result of this unhappy tendency has been a weakening of the sense of responsibility in our community which may do a great deal more harm than it has already done. Again, consider the utterly unmethodical way in which the very large funds collected from the Indian Musalmans in aid of various movements have been administered in this country and you will find that you have a great deal to learn from other communities as to how you should regulate your patriotic action by reference to business maxims in order both to prevent your resources being frittered away and also to apply your funds to their proper objects. This is one way of educating your community to a right appreciation of some of the factors which make for moral progress in India.

Another department of human activity in which we Mohamedans suffer from lack of discipline is our literature, and in this connexion I shall call your attention to one phase of our amorous poetry. The beloved of the Mohamedan Urdu poet of the old school, in whom is incarnated his highest conception of human beauty, is a freak of nature with a mouth little bigger than the geometrical point and a waist thinner than a hair. As an example of the former, we have the couplet of a Persian poet whose style and taste our Urdu poets have tried to imitate and acquire.

کردی زلفی نقطہ موہومہ رادونیم اسے نائف کلام حکیمان یانلو

And as an instance of the latter. I may quote the well-known verse of an Urdu poet—

صنم کہتی ہیں تیرے بھی کر کے کہانی کس طرف کوئی کدھری

If you think for a moment, you will perceive that in the domain of literature this kind of poetry, illustrating as it does the poet's passion for immoderate exaggeration, is the direct result of want of discipline in the poetic faculty; and when it is remembered that all our best writers on Prosody assign to مبالغہ a high place among our recognised figures of speech which are supposed to lend beauty and force to our poetry, you will admit that we lack disciplinary training not merely in the common every-day affairs of our life, but also in regard to some of the natural springs of thought which should powerfully contribute to our intellectual improvement.

In conclusion he said:—

Gentlemen, to the Indian Mohamedans Agra, where we are assembled to-day, is an enchanted name round which cluster some of the best traditions of Moslem progress and culture: and it is in the fitness of things that you should draw your inspiration from the historic scenes and sights that surround you. The very ground on which you are treading must recall to your minds the stirring memories of a heroic age, when your co-religionists bore with admirable fortitude the heat and burden of the day, and with patient labour, unflinching resolution and indomitable courage developed the arts of war and peace and maintained for a long time a high standard of civic life. At a time when the tide of Mughal supremacy was almost at its lowest ebb, the constructive genius of Akbar the Great brought the scattered elements together, evolved order out of chaos, and devised and perfected a system of administration which has been the wonder of Indian statesmen down to the present day. Under his Imperial care the arts and sciences flourished to a degree hitherto unknown to Mohamedan India, and it was his master hand that laid the foundation of that fusion of the Indian races which in this distracted land, still rent as under by inter-communal strife and religious antagonism, must ever be the ambition of the highest statesmanship to accomplish. A little later came to the Mughal throne Shah Jehan the Magnificent who gave India a long spell of peace—peace that hath its victories no less than war—who patronized piety and learning and exalted merit above ancient lineage and riches, who made art the study of princes and placed before the people the best specimen of aesthetic culture who immortalised the most abiding phase of human affection by building the Taj,—that perfect embodiment of faith, hope, love and beauty of which not India only but all the world is proud. That inimitable monument, with its magnificent dome poised in the clear crisp air of a winter morning and its tall minarets shining in the rays of the risen sun, holds aloft before you, if only you would reflect for a moment, the highest ideals of purity and refinement, of devotion and self-sacrifice, which are, and must always be the aim and object of all true education.

From Sikandra on one side and from the Taj on the other the two great Mughal Emperors are watching your proceedings and your work with sympathy, they are with you in spirit, and it is for you to show by the manner in which you would discharge your great trust how far you are worthy of their benedictions.

Indian National Congress.

President's Address.

The following are extracts from the presidential address delivered by the Hon'ble Nawab Syed Mohamed Saheb Bahadur at the XXVIII Indian National Congress held on the 26th, 27th and 28th December 1913 at Karachi.

Referring to the Indians in South Africa President said:—The foremost question that is just now agitating the public mind in this country is the question of our brethren in South Africa. The tale of woe that has been reaching us from there, since the Boer country became part of the British Empire, is really heart-rending and that the responsible British Statesmen should have been so far unable to do anything by way of attempting a settlement fills us with profound sorrow, almost with despair. We know the hardships to which our fellow-countrymen are subjected and we cannot pay a fitting tribute in words to the courageous manner in which they are enduring those hardships; for, they are confident that British justice and sense of fair-play will ultimately prevail. Gentlemen, this unfortunate question has assumed an acute form and reached a stage where we have to pause and ask, whether we are not British subjects? The treatment accorded to Indians clearly shows that the Colonists take it for granted that we are not. At any rate, they have so far failed to recognise the claim of the Indians to consideration as British subjects. The war with the Transvaal was undertaken mainly, if not solely, on the ground of ill-treatment accorded to the British Indian subjects and it is to be greatly deplored that their position should have become much worse after the incorporation of the country into the world-renowned British Empire than it was ever before. May I ask in your name that when the object with which that costly war was undertaken is not gained, where is the justification for it? I have the authority on this point of no less a person than the Marquis of Lansdowne who was Minister for War when the conflict began and was well-qualified to make a pronouncement on the situation by reason of his having been the Viceroy of India previously. Lord Lansdowne speaking at Sheffield in 1899 said:—"A considerable number of the Queen's Indian subjects are to be found in the Transvaal, and among the many misdeeds of the South African Republic, I do not know that any fills me with more indignation than its treatment of these Indians. And the harm is not confined to the sufferer on the spot; for what do you imagine would be the effect produced in India when these poor people return to their country to report to their friends that the Government of the Empress, so mighty and irresistible in India, with its population of three hundred millions, is powerless to secure redress at the hands of a small South African State?"

"We cannot be too thankful to Lord Amptill who has taken up our cause in South Africa in right earnest. His sympathy for the people of this country which he uniformly manifested during his term of Governorship in Madras has endeared him to all of us. And as a very large number of immigrants go from the Southern Presidency it is but fitting that his Lordship should raise his voice in defence of the rights of those whom he had governed with sympathy and benevolence. Lord Amptill referring to the speech of Lord Lansdowne aptly observes. "Those were far-sighted and prophetic words, for at that time India was quite unconscious of the indignity, and it is only after the lapse of a decade that we have seen 'the effect produced in India'." The views expressed in 1899 by Lord Selborne, who afterwards became High Commissioner at the Cape, were no less emphatic than those of Lord Lansdowne and I make no apology for repeating them here. "Was it or was it not," asked

Lord Selborne, "our duty to see that our dusky fellow-subjects in the Transvaal, where they had a perfect right to go, should be treated as the Queen in our name had promised they should be treated? If they agreed with him and admitted that these were questions which we had to answer as trustees before our fellow-countrymen and before history, then they would agree with him also that the path of duty was to be ruled not by sentiment, but by plain facts. We were trustees for our brothers all over the world. Trustees also for our fellow-subjects of different races and different colours. For all those and the unborn children of these. Therefore, the test we had to apply in an emergency like this was the simple test of duty. Was it or was it not our duty to see that the rights and the future interest of those he had named should be maintained? Was the British Government going to make its name respected and to have the pledges given by it faithfully observed? Was it going to see that the British subject wherever he went all over the world, whether he were white or black, was to have the rights which his Queen had secured for him?" Far from any indications appearing that their lot would in a measurable distance of time be made less intolerable to them, they are being subjected in an ever-increasing degree to fresh disabilities and indignities such as are traceable clearly to the inebriation of the Boer mind caused by sudden acquisition of independence and power. Apart from higher considerations of justice, fairness and humanity, the consideration of Imperial interests, as to how their attitude and conduct towards the Indian subjects of His Majesty will affect the prestige of the Empire to which the Boer as well as the Indian owes allegiance is deliberately disregarded by the Union Government. The fate of one hundred and fifty thousands of our brethren and countrymen settled in South Africa cannot be a matter of indifference to us, as I am sure it cannot be to our Rulers. The heroic struggle that they are carrying on against overwhelming odds evokes our heartfelt sympathy for them and our deepest indignation against their oppressors. But, Gentlemen, what could our sympathy and indignation do in this situation? We can send, as indeed we are already sending so liberally, pecuniary relief to the oppressed, but we cannot restrain the hand that oppresses. It is for Imperial Government to step in and alter the course of things in favour of our brethren. We have had any amount of expressions of sympathy, of encouragement and of hope, but no prospect of action is yet within our sight. The spectacle of a world-wide Empire embracing about 500 millions of people as its subjects, being powerless to restrain an irresponsible Colony is not only unedifying in the extreme but is incomprehensible and causes dismay to the Indian mind. The position is now vastly worse than before, not merely from the point of view of the increasing disabilities and the intensity of suffering, but from the point of view of their moral effect. In the days of the Boer Government the Indian settlers had the feeling that their wrongs were due to an unjust and unsympathetic foreign State which only needed to be brought to the notice of their own Government to be remedied. But to-day they find the Imperial Government standing by while blow after blow is deliberately aimed at them with terrible precision and effect. This indifference has aggravated situation and has roused bitter feelings between two countries of the Empire and is certainly derogatory to the high character of British statesmanship. Not only that, that it leads one to think that this indifference in effect encourages the South African Union in the belief that their mistaken policy has the support of the Government at Home.

The British Government are responsible for the present difficulties which they could have easily foreseen and avoided by imposing conditions regarding the rights of Indian settlers at the time of granting Self-Government to South Africa. It is, therefore, that I say, that we should look up to them and make an earnest appeal to them. It is a pity that the Parliament had no hand in the matter; otherwise I am sure our friends in Parliament would have raised their voice in support of our rights. I have more faith, I confess, in retaliatory measures such as the placing of an embargo on the importation of coal from Natal into this country, and the closing of the doors of competition for the Civil Service against the South African Whites. It seems to me that these are the only weapons at present available and the Government of India should lose no time in making use of them. I am aware that these measures have the disadvantage of being merely irritating without being directly effective or inflicting any real disability on the Colonists. But their moral effect would, I am convinced, be very great on our people and will not be altogether lost on the Union Government. By having recourse to these retaliatory measures our Government would be showing before the whole world that they are in earnest and would not tolerate the ill-treatment of Indian subjects of His Majesty in any part of the Empire. We have to advocate retaliatory measures because we have been driven to do so much against our own will. We however hope that the resources of representation are not yet exhausted and that the Imperial Government have not yet done their utmost to secure justice for our countrymen. While recognising that their position one of great difficulty in view of Colonial autonomy. I would at the same time point out that the present Liberal Government have claimed great credit for unifying South Africa as a triumph in that they have applied liberal principles in their Colonial policy, and it is inconceivable that Liberal principles in practice can under any circumstances involve injustice and oppression.

REFORMED COUNCILS.

Coming to the questions connected with the Reformed Councils. I need not refer to the regulations in detail which were framed by the Indian Government for carrying out the Morley-Minto Reform Scheme. The Congress has in successive sessions expressed its regret that the regulations have not been made in the same liberal spirit in which the original reform despatches were conceived. The public in India, at the time when the regulations were issued, being anxious to give a fair start to the scheme did not express their full sense of dissatisfaction with the proposed regulations, especially as they were reassured in this behalf by the express declarations of Lord Minto's Government at the time, which were as follows:—

"The Governor-General in Council is conscious that many of the details of the scheme which is being introduced may be found on trial to be unsatisfactory or capable of improvement. Experience alone can show how far methods which are new to India give to the different classes and interests a measure of representation proportionate to their importance and influence, and to what extent an untrained electoral machinery is suitable to the varying circumstances of the different Provinces and the numerous electorates. Defects will no doubt be discovered when the rules are put into operation, but, if this proves to be the case, the law admits of the regulations being amended without difficulty."

It was hoped, therefore, that the anomalies and serious defects, both of detail and of principle, which were found to exist in the regulations would be rectified at the first opportunity which presented itself after the first elections had been held and the Reformed Councils constituted. It has been, therefore, a matter of extreme disappointment to the public in India that the revision of the Council regulations which was made last year was confined to making a few trivial changes and introducing a few amendments in consequence of the transference of the Imperial Capital to Delhi and of the other changes embodied in the Delhi despatches. In the constitution of the Legislative Councils different proportions have been fixed in respect of the official and non-official, as well as the elected and nominated elements in the various Provinces, much of which to the ordinary mind seems to be founded on no intelligible principle of differentiation. Bengal from the first started with an elected non-official majority in its Legislative Council and in the redistribution of territories made in 1912, both old Bengal and new Bihar have been given two separate Legislative Councils, having elected non-official majorities. On the other hand, Madras and Bombay, the oldest of the Provinces, have been provided with a non-official majority composed of nominated and elected members barely sufficient to satisfy the regulations.

By far the most serious of the drawbacks in the regulations, which have been allowed to exist in the revised regulations, are those relating to the disqualifications for membership, the arbitrary and unreasonable manner in which restrictions are imposed on candidates seeking election to the Councils, and the general disparagement of the educated classes that it involves. Property qualifications have been prescribed in various degrees and in various methods in the different Provinces, and the decision of questions connected with electoral rules is committed to the absolute discretion of the executive Government. It is our duty once again to urge an immediate revision of the regulations so as to make the non-official majorities in all Provincial Councils really effective for practical work, and to remove invidious differences in the qualifications prescribed for candidates seeking election.

In spite of the repeated and unanimous requests of the people of the United Provinces for the establishment of an Executive Council there, the question is hung up without the authorities assigning cogent reasons. Sir John Hewett's opposition to the proposal is too well-known to you, but with the change of the Lieutenant-Governorship in the United Provinces, it was hoped that it will receive sympathetic consideration at the hands of Sir James Meeson, and it is a matter of considerable surprise to those who knew His Honour as a man of liberal and progressive views, that he has not yet formulated proposals for establishing an Executive Council. In view of the fact that this question was the subject of a resolution which was moved in his Council and which received strong support from the non-official members, I am hopeful that it will receive due consideration at the hands of the Government of India and the Secretary of State.

As regards the Imperial Legislative Council I may say that the representation of some of the Provinces is defective and for this reason I would suggest an increase of at least half a dozen seats on the Council and there being thrown open for popular election. We all know that at present we have at the head of the Government in India a sagacious statesman whose far-sighted and sympathetic policy has endeared him to the people of this country, and I fervently hope that His Excellency Lord Hardinge before laying down the reins of his exalted office will remove the present defects in the Imperial Council and make it fully representative.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

When the Government of India in 1908 submitted for approval to the Secretary of State the group of constitutional reforms which resulted in the passing of the Indian Councils Act, the Government of India claimed that their scheme as a whole "will really and effectively associate the people of India in the work, not only of occasional legislation, but of actual every-day administration." The fact that I want to emphasise here is what Lord Morley himself mentioned, that that scheme of reform "is not, and hardly pretends to be, a complete representation of the entire body of changes and improvements in the existing system that are evidently present to the minds of some of those whom your Government has consulted and that to the best of my judgment are now demanded by the situation described in the opening words of the despatch." Lord Morley proceeded to point out that it is "evidently desirable to present our reform of the Indian constitutional system as a whole and that from this point of view, it seems necessary to attempt without delay an effectual advance in the direction of Local Self-Government."

It is now five years since these words were written and the Government of India are yet maturing proposals for making an advance in this direction "without delay." The reluctance to revive the old village organisation and to establish village panchayats is particularly pronounced in some Provinces, while a degree of tardiness in considering proposals for the expansion of local and municipal administration coupled with the oft-repeated desire to hedge further advance with over-cautious restrictions, is noticeable among all grades of administrative authorities in India. Lord Morley quoted the memorable words of Lord Ripon that it is not primarily with a view to improvement in administration that this measure is put forward and started; it is chiefly desirable as an instrument of political and popular education," and that there is little chance of affording any effective training to the people in the management of local affairs or of the non-official members thereof taking any real interest in local business, unless "they are led to feel that real power is placed in their hands and that they have real responsibilities to discharge."

The Royal Commission on Decentralisation which submitted its report shortly after this, fully endorsed Lord Morley's views and insisted that the village should be made the starting point of public life in India, that village panchayats should be revived all over the country as the first unit of Local Government, and that the constitution and functions of other local bodies should be broadened and liberalised in various ways. The Imperial and Provincial Governments have been cogitating over this part of the recommendations now for over four years, and repeated inquiries in the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils have not so far elicited any sympathetic assurance as to the recommendations being likely to be carried out in the near future. The latest announcement is that the Government of India have submitted their proposals to the Secretary of State and obtained his approval, and that they would shortly introduce the necessary legislation for carrying them out. It is not easy to anticipate what these proposals are, but the Congress has a right to demand that the Commission's recommendations should be fully carried out, and the proposals of the Government of India should be placed before the public as a whole and not piece meal. We must impress upon the Government that this question should be treated as part of a progressive political policy and not as one of mere administrative exigency.

PRIMARY AND TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

The unrest swept over the country from one end to the other is a thing of the past, at any rate, we are no longer face to face with its turbid waters and dangerous and insidious currents, but only with some of the evils that have lain beneath the surface of the unrest and are now discernible. Now that the storm has happily passed away, let us address ourselves to the task of meeting the underlying evils in the way they ought to be. There had been a steadily increasing feeling, on the part of the people, of dissatisfaction with their surroundings and a steadily increasing yearning for a better and more bearable existence. Even a casual observer must be struck by the desire manifested on every side for more light in the shape of education, both Primary and Technical. Primary Education, I need not say, is the remedy of remedies that will help the masses at present steeped in ignorance, superstition and lethargy, to get out of the slough of despond, and will teach them self-help by placing within their reach, through the medium of Literature, the benefits that would accrue from adopting modern methods and principles in their hereditary and time-hallowed occupation of agriculture and other small industries; and that will surely mould in them a frame of mind that would co-operate with the Government in any measure that may be taken for public good, by removing the disposition to believe in the ascription of wrong motives and intentions to Government as regards their particular acts and measures. In short, Primary Education will give more food to the masses, reduce to an appreciable degree the existence of the economic problem, remove most of the social evils and conduce to the stability of the British Rule.

It is a source of great pleasure and satisfaction to observe that the recent visit of Their Imperial Majesties was an important landmark in the history of our country. Ever since the blessed day of their advent and ever since His Imperial Majesty emphasised in his speeches the need for a wider element of sympathy in the administration of the country and pressed for a rapid advancement of education as the panacea for all our social and political evils, the essential importance of education, as a factor of national prosperity has come to be fully recognised by the Government, and we gratefully acknowledge their earnest effort to foster and push it forward. But at the same time we feel that they do not go far enough. The political fears that the Government entertain as regards the adoption of the principle of compulsion are altogether imaginary, and if the scheme which has been put forward is carefully considered and followed by Government, the administrative and financial difficulties with which the Government believe they are confronted, will soon disappear in practice. So long as the local institutions retain their strong official complexion, people would naturally hesitate to confide in them. But before these institutions are entrusted with the initiation and control of Primary Education, if they are made more popular and representative, the people would be glad to co-operate with them and would even be willing to bear the imposition of a special cess which will be ear-marked for the purpose of being devoted to Primary Education. I may point out that when, in the famous Despatch of 1854, Sir Charles Wood laid the foundation of the system of public education, a memorable advance was made. And as the authorities with genuine statesmanlike foresight, recognised that England's prime function in India was to superintend the tranquil elevation of the moral and intellectual standard of life among the people, I fail to see any plausible reason that could be adduced against making a modest and cautious beginning to introduce compulsory and free Primary Education in selected areas that may be considered to be ripe for it.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

The question of the employment of Indians in the higher and more responsible positions in the Public Service of this country is not a question of merely individual careers, but is one of much higher and wider importance. Not to speak of the material and economic drain that the exclusion of Indians from higher posts in the public service of their own country involves, it is repugnant to the nation's sense of self-respect. With the growth of intelligence and self-consciousness among the people, their part is an increasing-disposition on their part to compare their own position with that of the other nations of the world, and to regard their present political status as incompatible with the rights of freedom and equality conferred on them by the British Constitution and guaranteed to them by British traditions. In the words of Sir Thomas Munro "the aim of the British administration of India was to be to raise the minds of the natives, to raise their character and to render them worthy of filling higher situations in the management of the country, so that in fullness of time Indians would be able to frame a regular Government for themselves and to conduct and preserve it." We feel that we are not in this respect treated in accordance with the spirit of the proclamations and promises made by the British Sovereigns, the Parliament and responsible Ministers. It is, therefore, a matter of sincere pleasure and great satisfaction to us that a Royal Commission under the able Chairmanship of that eminent and sympathetic statesman, Lord Islington, has been appointed to enquire into the question of Public services. Without in any way anticipating the recommendations it may make, I can say that the manner in which the Commission began to take evidence during the last cold weather, amply justifies the hope that it will do justice to Indians when it comes to formulate its final conclusions. In the course of the speech in which he opened the sittings of the Commission on the 8th of January last at Madras, his Lordship said: "We are confident that we shall receive such assistance and co-operation that subsequently when the fruits of our labours are published it may be found that we have reached a reasonable basis of agreement which will give satisfaction both to the just demands of the services and to the legitimate aspirations of His Majesty's Indian subjects, and be consonant with the orderly development of the administration of this great country." The remarkable insight and the keen interest displayed by Lord Islington in the course of the enquiry encourage us in the belief that the result will be gratifying to the expectations raised in the minds of the people. It will not be out of place for me to express a hope that the much-discussed question of the separation of judicial from executive functions will receive a solution at the hands of the Commission, which will satisfy public opinion.

In the course of the evidence before the Commission, it was suggested by some of the witnesses that the Public Services in India should not be open to those Colonists who do not treat Indians on a footing of equality. And if much stress was not laid on this, it was due to the fact that the situation in South Africa had not assumed such an acute form and as dangerous a proportion as at present. As the crisis in South Africa has become so threatening as to constitute an imminent danger to the interests of the Empire. I venture to submit to the Commission the advisability and necessity of lying down, as a matter of principle, that those Colonies which do not treat Indians as equal subjects of the King will not have a share in the administration of India, and candidates from such Colonies will be debarred from taking part in any competitive examination, or entering into any of the services of this country. In making an earnest appeal to Lord Islington and members of the Royal Commission to include this suggestion in their recommendations, I would like to point out that it is not only calculated to show to South Africa that the Commission wishes to maintain strict impartiality, but it will serve as a warning to the Colonies and prevent them from following the example of the Union Government. It will also strengthen the hands of the Government of India and the Imperial Government in my action which they may contemplate to take in an emergency.

INDIANS IN THE ARMY.

Closely allied to the question that I have now dealt with, is the question of higher career for Indians in the Army. Meeting at Karachi so close to places distinguished as the home of warlike races from whom the Indian sepoy is largely drawn, we can appropriately go into it at some length. From its earliest years the Congress has included in its resolutions a demand for the establishment of military colleges in India in which natives of India as defined by statute, may be educated and trained for appointment as commissioned or non-commissioned officers according to their capacity and qualifications, in the Indian Army. That demand apparently remained unheeded till the advent of Lord Curzon whose Viceroyalty was a succession of promises either broken or only partially redeemed. You may remember, Gentlemen, that soon after his arrival he formed a "Cadet Corps" consisting of Indian Princes and Noblemen with head quarters at Dehra Dun. The Congress of 1901 held at Calcutta welcomed it as the first instalment of a policy which will culminate in the establishment of military colleges as recommended by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, at which natives of India may be educated and trained for employment as officers of the army. The expectation was not realized and the Madras Congress in 1908 reiterated its demand, in view specially of the high recognition of the valour and fidelity of India troops by His Late Imperial Majesty King Edward VII, in his message to the Princes and the people of India. Lord Minto, true to the spirit of policy of his Government, pressed on the authorities at Home a scheme framed by his Lordship in this matter which had the full support of his Council and of the Commander-in-Chief. The words in which he referred to the scheme, in the course of a speech he delivered as chairman at a meeting in London on April 24, 1912, deserve repetition here. That speech seems to me to be a remarkable illustration of his policy, his broad sympathies and of his grasp of Indian points of view which distinguished his career in India.

His Lordship said:—"I must take friendly exception to what Sir W. C. Plowden has said as to my not having faced the question of Commissions in the Army for Indian gentlemen. I can assure you that I not only faced it, but that I fought it every day. It was my hobby the whole time I was in India to try and obtain such commissions for Indian gentlemen and I hoped that I had succeeded. It is curious that British opinion of to-day as regards the possibility of granting commissions is less advanced than it was a generation ago. The views of many people to-day are much behind the times in comparison with those of distinguished officers even before the Mutiny. As long ago as 1844, Sir Henry Lawrence dealt with the question. Subsequently Lord Napier wrote a memorandum in 1865 on the same subject, stating that the Government of India had then the matter under consideration. Sir George Chesney, Sir Donald Stewart and others, all hold the same views. All these distinguished officers admitted that a great injustice was being perpetrated in withholding such commissions; they maintained that young Indians gentlemen should have greater opportunities for military distinction; but at the same time they all laid down that they must not command British troops and that the solution of the difficulty was the raising of special Indian regiments in which Indian gentlemen should receive commissions. I am afraid that racial antipathies, however narrow many of us may think them, are much stronger in India than they are at Home. I do not know why. But at any rate, we cannot do away with these racial antipathies by word of command; the only way to lessen them is by example and by constant sympathy for our Indian fellow-subjects. By force of example and by constant sympathy, let us hope that racial prejudices may gradually disappear. Under existing conditions, it would, in my opinion, be a grave mistake to appoint a young Indian of good family to a British regiment or to a regiment of the Indian Army against the wish of its British officers. It would only create friction and we should be worse off than we were before. I fought this question in India over and over again and before I came away, the Government of India, the Commander-in-Chief and all my Council were in agreement with me that the commission should be granted. We therefore framed a scheme for the raising of a regiment to be officered by selected Indian gentlemen who would generally have received a military education in the Cadet Corps. Our proposal was that the regiment should begin with a skeleton of a few British officers to give it a start; and young Indian officers should be grafted to it in the ordinary way, with bond fide commissions who would rise in due course of promotion; while the British skeleton will gradually disappear and an Indian officer will eventually obtain command of the regiment which would be in the course of 20 years or so. The scheme was sent Home and it was my earnest hope that it would receive official sanction before I left India. I am sorry to say I do not know what has happened to it since then. I feel, however, that it would be unfair to the Government of India not to take this opportunity of saying that, as far as they were concerned, the necessity for the commission was recognised and the difficulty was dealt with. The opposition to our proposal was at Home!" This last sentence illustrates the spirit in which the India Council deals with Indian aspirations. Fortunately however, a beginning has been made by His Majesty nominating two or three Indian noblemen only recently and it remains for the Indian National Congress to bring to bear on His Majesty's Government the weight of the unanimous and earnest wish of the Indian people for a satisfactory solution of this important question.

Resolutions.

The Congress met again at 12-15 on December 27th, the attendance being the same as yesterday.

The President moved a resolution that the Congress desired to record its sense of the great loss sustained by the country by the death of Mr. J. Ghosal, who was a staunch worker in the Congress cause and the death of Mr. Justice P. R. Sundara Aiyer. The resolution was carried, the assembly standing.

Diwan Bahadur Govind Raghava Aiyer (Madras) moved the second resolution—

"That this Congress enters an emphatic protest against the provisions of the Immigration Act in that they violate the promises made by Ministers of the South African Union and respectfully urges the Crown to veto the Act and requests the Imperial and Indian Governments to adopt such measures as would ensure to Indians in South Africa just and honourable treatment. This Congress expresses its abhorrence of the cruel treatment to which Indians were subjected in Natal in the recent strikes and entirely disapproves of the personnel of the Committee appointed, by the South African Union to enquire into matters, as two of its members are already known to be biased against Indians, and as it does not include persons who command the confidence of Indians in South Africa and here. This Congress tenders its most respectful thanks to his Excellency the Viceroy for his statesmanlike pronouncement of the policy of the Government of India on the South African question. This Congress requests the Imperial and Indian Governments to take the steps needed to redress the grievances relating to the questions of the £5 tax, indentured labour, domicile, the educational test, the validity of Indian marriages and other questions bearing on the status of Indians in South Africa. That this Congress expresses its warm and grateful appreciation of the heroic struggle carried on by Mr. Ghosh and his co-workers, and calls upon the people of this country of all classes and creeds to continue to supply them with funds."

In moving the resolution Mr. Govind Raghava Aiyer said that the resolution related to what might be called the question of the day and without referring to the conditions of Indians in South Africa, the speaker turned to the question of principle, and those who did not sympathise with them urged that the Imperial Government could not interfere with self-governing colonies. It was no argument at all. Indians were striving to get self-government within the Empire. But before the rights of self-governing colonies there was justice. Indians were only questioning the act of the Colonies in respect of not allowing Indians to live there as citizens. After refuting the other arguments of those who were not sympathetic with them, the speaker referred to the six points mentioned in statement made by Mr. Gokhale. They wanted that the racial bar should be removed. South African Indians should have the right to enter Cape Colony; the right of domicile should be restored; the abolition of the £5 tax; the recognition of Indian marriages in South Africa, and a sympathetic administration of the South African laws. After explaining these points in detail the speaker concluded by saying that there was yet hope, for they were fortunate in having a sympathetic Viceroy in Lord Hardinge. His Excellency, as a responsible administrator, considered it his duty to dissociate himself from the policy of the Union Government. It had been said in some quarters that it was more diplomacy, only to please the Indians. The speaker, however, thought that in it lay a principle which was higher than diplomacy. For the courageous and statesmanlike declarations of the Viceroy this Congress and the whole of India was grateful to his Excellency.

Lala Lajpatrai, in an eloquent Urdu speech, seconded the resolution. He said that they were only demanding citizenship of the Empire. The question was whether they were entitled to it or not, and if they were not, he would call upon those who had assumed the guardianship of India to be true to this guardianship and trust, otherwise Indians would charge them with criminal breach of trust before a tribunal before which they all had to stand one day. The only way in which that trust could be exercised was the way taken by Lord Hardinge. The Viceroy had felt the weight of the injustice and had thrown off reserve and risen equal to the occasion, as the responsible head of India. The speaker asked Indians to shield the Viceroy against the vituperations of opponents. After briefly referring to the disabilities of Indians in South Africa, Lala Lajpatrai made a stirring appeal for funds.

Mr. Choudhari in supporting the resolution said that they formed a component part of modern civilization, that the self-consciousness that pervaded the world also found a place in their hearts, and that, being as they were, they legitimately asked for the same position as other colonists got without effort. Indians had sacrificed their life-blood for the Empire, and what had the Boers done? Yet the Boers had been given privileges of self-governing colonies while Indians had been completely denied citizenship. In conclusion he said that their demand was for justice and their firm determination was to get justice from the Imperial Government.

Mr. M. T. Kaperbhoy of Bombay, in supporting, said that so long as the idea remained with the White races that they were superior to Indians, so long was the trouble bound to continue, and they could only get rid of it by bringing about a complete regeneration in India in social and intellectual matters. To achieve this they must all combine and co-operate. The salvation of India lay in the true union of the people and her onward march of progress depended upon constitutional and constructive methods. In conclusion the speaker appealed to Hindus and Mohamedans to combine for the common good of the country.

Mr. Hafiz, A Sindhi Mohamedan, in supporting said, he was glad to see a number of Mohamedans present as delegates. Though very few had come, they had come fully prepared to join the Congress and make common cause with the Hindus for the common good of the country.

Lala Goverdhandas of the Punjab and Mr. Sahai of Behar, supported the resolution.

Before the resolution was adopted, the President announced that he had received a message from Japan which said that the Indian community in that country had contributed Rs. 5,000 and they desired the President to remit that amount to Mr. Gokhale to be sent to South Africa. The President further announced that funds in aid of South African Indians would be collected after the day's sitting was over.

Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu, in moving a resolution on Hindu and Mohamedan unity, said that it was no easy thing for the Moslem League to have publicly declared the adoption of the ideal of self-government within the Empire. In the past that ideal formed the subject of strong criticism, not only from timid Indians but from high officials in the land. When such was the attitude of officials, naturally some of the less advanced, timid and hesitating Moslems were more cautious and took time to consider what would be their position as regards the Congress. The speaker congratulated the Moslem League for declaring publicly that India could not rise if they confined themselves to a separatist policy. Last year the Moslem League adopted wholeheartedly the position of the Congress. If they, Hindus and Mohamedans, now stood face to face there was nothing to stop the Congress from stretching hand of fellowship to the Moslem League. Appealing to Hindus, he advised toleration. Appealing to Moslems, he asked them to regard every man as equal, as preached by Mohamed. In conclusion, Mr. Basu said: "Now, brethren, Hindus and Mohamedans, in our hands lies the destiny of our common country. Whether we belong to the same race or not, whether we believe in the revelations of the Gita or of the Quran, we have reason to be proud of our past in India. Asoka and Chandragupta, Akbar and Shahjahan are names which will rouse the enthusiasm of any race and shed lustre on the followers of any creed. The Moghul Emperors saw the vision of a united India. Under the aegis of British rule, let us realise that vision. Once we begin, our course will be less and less difficult. One we begin to feel that preferments are not pedestals on which a nation can rise, once we begin to feel that we are not distant communities, entrenched in different camps but parts of one body, our course will be easier. If there have been misunderstanding in the past, let us forget them. Let them run out like the desert sands through the interstices of the wind and let us set about writing a new horoscope for India on the scroll of time and the India of the future will see a stronger, nobler, greater, higher, aye, brighter nation than was realised by Asoka in the plenitude of his power, than was a revealed to Akbar in the wildest of his visions. Shall we fail to do so? If we should suffer from misgivings, then we are not fit to enter the Temple of our Mother, raised to-day by the joint hands of Moslem and Hindu. God willing, we shall not fail. God willing, we shall stick to the banner we have raised. Storms may come and waves may break, but hold fast: the banner will yet fly triumphant and gather round it Hindus and Moslems in a common brotherhood, animated by the same objects, inspired by the same ideals, and working for the same aims."

Mr. Mudholkar, is seconding the resolution moved by Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu, said, that the proposition was fraught with great good for the country. The fundamental principle of the Congress was that all Indians were brethren, and that all should work together. Previously, only a few educated Mohamedans adopted that idea, but now they found that the organisation established for protecting Mohamedan interests had adopted the fundamental principles of the Congress. The League had not only adopted that principle, but had also recognised that the political future of India depended on the harmonious working and co-operation of the various communities in the country.

Mr. Jehanger B. Petit, in supporting, said, that a visible indication had been given by the All-India Moslem League that it would co-operate with the sister communities for the advancement and regeneration of the country. He regarded this departure as a landmark in the history of the country. Some had predicted that it would be impossible for Hindus and Mohamedans to unite and work together. That prediction had been proved false.

Mr. Shesagiri Aiyer, in supporting, said that some delegates had objected that the resolution was humiliating to the Congress. He failed to see how it was humiliating to the Congress. But even if the Congress were humiliated by the union of the two great communities of India, that humiliation was desirable.

Mr. Khare, in supporting, said, he was glad to see a change in attitude of the Moslem League. From enemies they had become friends, and by their unity they would in the near future achieve self-government within the Empire.

Mr. Wacha, in supporting, said, that in his opinion, the Indian National Congress was entering to-day into a new nativity. The Indian National Congress is bound to achieve a new nativity. He was three score years and ten, but he hoped to see the fruition of the new destiny.

The resolution was carried.

Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu moved following the resolution:

"That this Congress places on record its warm appreciation of the adoption by the All-India Moslem League of the ideal of self-government for India within the British Empire and expresses its complete accord with the belief that the League has so emphatically declared at its last sessions that the political future of the country depends on the harmonious working and co-operation of the various communities in the country, which has been the cherished ideal of the Congress. This Congress most heartily welcomes the hope expressed by the League that the leaders of the different communities will make every endeavour to find a modus operandi for joint and concerted action on all questions of national good and earnestly appeals to all sections of the people to help the object we all have at heart."

Mr. C. A. E. Ramaswamy Aiyer of Madras moved a resolution urging the separation of the judicial from the executive functions and the placing of the judiciary under the control of the highest court in every province. As it was an old resolution the speaker confined himself to pointing out the evils of the combination of two functions, and the urgency of their separation.

Mr. Khetish Chunder Ganguli of Bengal seconded. Other speakers supported the resolution which was carried.

ABOLITION OF THE SECRETARY OF STATES COUNCIL.

Mr. Jinnah moved a resolution urging the abolition of the Council of the Secretary of State as at present constituted, and made the following suggestions for its reconstruction: (a) that the salary of the Secretary of State for India should be placed on the English estimates; (b) that with a view to the efficiency and independence of the Council, it is expedient that it should be partly nominated and partly elected; (c) that the total number of members of the Council should be nine; (d) that the elected portion of the Council should consist of not less than one-third of the total number who should be non-official Indians chosen by a constituency consisting of elected members of the Imperial and Provincial Legislative Councils; (e) that not less than one-half of the nominated portion of the Council should consist of public men of merit and ability, unconnected with the Indian administration; (f) that the remaining portion of the nominated Council should consist of officials who have served in India for not less than 10 years, and have not been away from India for more than two years; (g) that the character of the Council should be advisory and not administrative; (h) that the term of office of each member should be five years."

Mr. Jinnah, in moving the resolution, described how the Council was constituted. There was no place in the Council for the advocacy of the views of non-officials, because the Council was composed entirely of officials and it ought therefore to be abolished. The Council was formed in 1858 and it should have been reformed long ago.

Mr. Samarth, in seconding, thought that they were right in saying that it would be a retrograde step to change the present advisory Council into administrative body. One of the vital proposals in this resolution was that a portion of the Council should be nominated and then duly elected. All that he wished to say was that a further advance should be made in representation by election.

Mr. Krishan Ram, who supported, said there was absolutely no notification which required India to bear any portion of the expenditure and the Secretary of State's Council was in no way helpful for the administration of the country in its best interests.

Mr. Gopaldas Jhamalpal supported.

Babu Surendranath Mullick said that Europeans were indifferent in matters which did not touch their pockets. He insisted upon the total abolition of the Council and on its being placed under the direct supervision of Parliament. If they relied wholly and solely on the conscience of the British people, they might then perhaps expect full justice to be done to them.

The resolution was carried.

The Congress met at 1 p. m. on December 28th. The proceedings commenced with the singing of the well-known Punjabi National Song.

Sardar Nand Singh moved a resolution protesting against the prohibition of Indian immigration to Canada resulting from the continuous journey clause and urging upon the Imperial Government the necessity of securing the repeal of that regulation. The speaker said that instead of bringing glad tidings, Christmas week had brought a deplorable tale from Canada and other Colonies. In this matter Sikhs were feeling that injustice has been done to India and that the treatment accorded to Indians by the colonists was unjust and cruel, and they were condemning with one voice the colonial atrocities. After citing instances of the troubles to which Indians were subjected in Canada, the speaker prayed for the intervention of Government.

Mr. Krishna Kumar Mitter, in seconding, said the world was God's and all men had the right of free access to all parts of it. This elementary truth had been forgotten by many races and countries, and this was the root cause of the troubles of Indians in the colonies. That inhuman and cowardly law, of the continuous journey regulation, was passed because Indians were sober, industrious and frugal.

Mir Ayub Khan, a prominent leader of the Mahomedan Community, supported the resolution in a forcible Urdu speech. The Mir had hitherto attended Congress as a visitor but was so moved by the last two days' proceedings that this morning he had himself registered a delegate, and took part in the proceedings. He said that his sympathies had always been with the Congress. There had always been something against Mahomedans, but since the Congress had extended its hand to Mahomedans, the latter were willing to join the Congress. The welfare of the nation could not be attained without the joint labours of the two great communities in India. He appealed to the people to contribute to the South African and Canadian Funds.

Pundit Rambhuj Dutt also supported the resolution which was carried.

Mr. Bhupendra Nath Banerjee moved a resolution protesting against the continuance of the Indian Press Act on the Statute Book and urging its repeal, especially in view of a recent decision of the High Court of Calcutta which had disclaimed the fact that the safeguards provided by the Act were illusory and incapable of being enforced. He said: "I am dealing now with what was a piece of panic legislation. The Government of India with all other Governments, with not always an easy conscience, is liable to panic; but, unlike other Governments, the Government of British India must not forget that its position is peculiar and nothing is more calculated to do it harm than its liability to panic, and nothing more dangerous than hasty action undertaken in fear or anger. Sedition may pass like the breath of the wind, anarchy may raise its matted locks in dark and unholy corners, but that may also go, but what it seems will, not go is the impression that a handful of boys with explosives in discarded tin-pots and a few hysterical newspapers can disturb the equilibrium of the Government of India and bring it down head over heels; and that is what happened in 1910. The Indian Press was liberated in 1827 amidst circumstances of great solemnity, with a declaration that boldly looked the future in the face. The early rulers of India were not timid men, were not frightened of shadows, not men who carried their hearts on their sleeves, not men who troubled themselves with Continental analogies, not men who ran to Austria or Russia for models of Government. They rescued India from misrule and anarchy, they wrested the dominion of India from the French; they wanted to give India the benefits of British administration; they wanted to infuse the country with the Spirit of British rule. Those were men who wielded alike the sword and the pen, and were at home alike in the busy haunts of men and in the seclusion of the Council Chamber. This is what Sir Charles Metcalfe, the liberator of the Indian Press said to a deputation that waited on him in 1837. Referring to those who were opposed to the removal of the licensing laws for the Press, he said: "If their argument be true that the spread of knowledge may be ultimately fatal to our rule in India, I close with them on that one point and maintain that, whatever may be the consequence, it is our duty to communicate the benefits of knowledge. If India could only be preserved as a part of the British Empire by keeping the inhabitant in a state of ignorance, our dominion would be a curse to the country and ought to cease." These are memorable words, and their grave significance should never be lost sight of. Unfortunately they were lost sight of in 1910, and the Government of India took a hasty and hurried step towards what Sir Charles Metcalfe sought to avoid. Did they think what they were doing by the law they were passing? Killing sedition? Did they believe that they were choking off the subterranean channels through moisture brought to that plant of the noisome growth? They must have. But the question may be asked. Have they succeeded? Their success is writ in large characters for the man who runs to read. And so it was anticipated by those whom panic and passion had not blinded to reason. And sedition driven underground is more dangerous than sedition whose roots you can reach with one's eyes open. We barred our way to the sources of danger and, gentlemen, it was not as if there was no law dealing with sedition. It was not as if we had not succeeded in suppressing newspapers which were offending. In Bengal, the "Sandhya" had gone, the "Yugantar" had gone, the "Bandemataram" had gone. Sir Herbert Risley declared in a speech that out of 47 cases for sedition instituted under the laws then existing, the Government had secured a conviction in every one of them. What more could be wanted? The answer was given that the prosecutions involved great labour and much consideration. Consequently the Government wanted a sweeping measure, not causing so much trouble. Alas! the blindness of rulers and of men! How human foresight is apt to be vain, how human schemes go the wrong way! Gentlemen, you will allow me to pass to another branch of the subject. The Government of India had to put a sieve on their own conscience. They had to reconcile the British public and a Liberal administration. They had to re-enact what Gladstone had helped in removing, and who could find for them more plausible reasons than that keen, gifted and astute scholar and politician, Sir Herbert Risley? He brought into requisition the laws prevailing in Austria, the conditions of which he said were similar to India, forgetting that Austria-Hungary had their Diets and that Ministers could be removed. But these slight considerations do not affect our rulers when they draw analogies from the Continent of Europe for the enactment or introduction of a retrograde or reactionary measure. But, said Sir Herbert, we in India shall be better off than in Austria. The Bill does not propose to confer any power on the police. They will be absolutely outside it and will have nothing whatever to do with its administration. I think there is a difference between the police and the C. I. D. The one is open public, the other secret, subterranean. And Sir Herbert was only thinking of the police, keeping the C. I. D. in reserve. How is the law administered? As soon as an application is made for registration, the magistrate refers it to the C. I. D. and upon its report depends the fate of the newspaper or the press. There are many Pressmen in this assembly. They will correct me if I am wrong. But Sir Herbert Risley had not only to throw dust in the eyes of the British public. He had also to reintroduce on a much larger scale what Gladstone had repeated, namely, the Vernacular Press Act of 1878, and he pointed out the difference. It was not like the Press Act of 1878, a purely executive measure. The initiative indeed rests with the Government but ample security against hasty or arbitrary action is provided in the form of what is virtually an appeal to a highly competent judicial authority. This was not all. This does not rest on the elusive assurance of an astute statesman. The Law Minister at the time, whose honesty and candour are above all question, said in words of great emphasis that he had provided safeguard which would make a Local Government hesitate before it made an order of forfeiture, because there was a tribunal which would sit over it and could reverse its decision. There was another safeguard. Under section 4 of the Act, the Government would have to state the offending words, signs or visible representations. That was the safeguard guards. The Local Governments would have to particularize the offence and there would be the right of appeal. Well, no Local Government did set out particulars. In a recent case the High Court of Bengal held that the declaration of forfeiture was invalid and illegal. But the invalidity was protected by Section 22 of the Act and the High Court had no power to interfere. Then as regards the safeguard of appeal, this is what the Chief Justice has said: "Of the two alleged checks on executive action supposed to be furnished by the Act, one, the intervention of the courts, is ineffectual, while the other for this very reason can be, and in this case has been, disregarded without impairing the practical effect of a forfeiture purporting to be under the Act. Well, gentlemen, this is what we have come to. We have a special law of a very drastic nature without any safeguards. We say that that law is not necessary. We say that that law can never serve the purpose for which it was intended. We say that that law will make criminal administration mere difficult, because it will shut out the sources of information. We say that it will make the general administration of the country a matter of grave concern, for it will act as a wet cloth on all expressions of public opinion. We say that, situated as the Government of India is, foreign in its composition and a loof in its character, that that law is a source of great pride (sic), that it is against the spirit of the British Constitution, that it is derogatory to the self-respect of a nation, of a people if you will, which is fast developing its self-consciousness, and we say, on the authority of the highest tribunal that the safeguards supposed to be provided do not exist, and we appeal to the Government of Lord Hardinge, who has shown a courage in his treatment of great and burning questions like the Partition of Bengal and the grievances of Indians in South Africa, and a just indignation over the Mosque bungle in Cawnpore, comparable only with that the early administrators of India, to remove a dark and inglorious spot in what is justly regarded as the brightest diadem in the British Crown."

Mr. D. G. Dalvi of Bombay, in seconding the resolution protesting against the continuation of the Indian Press Act, said that though he had agreed with the general principles of this Bill when it came on to the Statute Book, he was of opinion that it should have been repealed after four years. He said the Press Act was introduced when there was sedition in the country. Now that the panic was over, the law should be repealed. So-called anarchy and bomb-throwing had nothing to do with the Press in general. The police, having this weapon, carried on prosecution in a haphazard manner. It was essential that the executive power should be under the authority of the High Court. Indians highly cherished the liberty of the Press to which the Act gave check.

Mr. J. Chaudhari, in supporting, cited specific cases of hardships to which Pressmen had been put under the Act.

The resolution was further supported by two Sindhi speakers, after which it was carried.

Rai Baikunt Nath Sen moved a resolution with respect to the Public Services Commission, protesting against the charges of general incompetence, lack of initiative and lack of character which some Indians had levelled against Indians. It prayed that the Royal Commission would recommend an increase of India in the higher appointments, a simultaneous Civil Service examination, that the age-limit for Civil Service candidates should not be lowered, that the judicial and executive services and functions should be separated, that restrictions against appointments to higher offices should be removed, that the division of the Services into Imperial and Provincial should be removed and that the people of these dominions of the Crown where Indians were not accorded the rights of British citizens should be declared ineligible for appointments in India.

In speaking to the resolution, Rai Baikunt Nath Sen said that it might be asked that, while the Commission was going on with its work, why should the Congress pass such a resolution? The reply was that serious charges had been levelled against Indians and, if the Congress kept silent, it might be construed as a partial admission, and therefore, they were going to emphatically refute those charges. Then he cited instances of some Bengali Civilians who had proved more efficient during the recent unrest in Bengal than European magistrates. In view of the progress made by Indians in matters of education, and in view of the present policy of the Government, the speaker thought the time had come when there should be a simultaneous Civil Service examination both in London and in India.

Dr. Niranjan Shree, in seconding, said that the first principle that should be recognised was that India was governed for Indians and that her children should first be admitted into the Services of the country and that non-Indians should be appointed only when there was no competent Indian and that only for a limited time. The division of the Services into Imperial and Provincial was most derogatory. A contented India with a service filled by her own sons was a greater asset to England than an irritated India whose loaves and fishes in the services were monopolised by non-Indians. The resolution being supported in Madras by two Karachi delegates was carried.

Other resolutions were adopted praying for the introduction of a permanent land settlement in ryotwari areas, for the opening of the higher ranks in the Army to Indians, for the introduction of free compulsory education, for the establishment of residential universities supplementary to the existing universities, for making provision for industrial and technical education, and protesting against the action of the Government of India in vetoing the election by the Calcutta University of Messrs. Rasul, Suhrawardi and Jaiwal as lecturers.

Another resolution urged that all High Courts in India should have direct relations with the Government of India alone.

The next resolution gave cordial support to the Swadeshi movement and another resolution urged the total prohibition of the recruitment of labour under indenture whether for work in India or elsewhere.

Resolution praying for an increase of the powers of local bodies, the revision of the Council Regulations, the establishment of Executive Councils in the United Provinces and the Punjab were moved from the chair.

The President moved another resolution authorising the All-India Congress Committee to arrange for a deputation to England to represent Indian views on the South Africa question, the Press Act, the reform of the India Council and the separation of judicial and executive functions.

The Congress next recorded its sense of appreciation of the services of Sir William Wedderburn and other members of the British Committee.

A resolution was moved by the Chair that the following message be sent to Mr. Gandhi and was carried unanimously:

"The 28th Indian National Congress, Karachi, expresses deep indignation at the ill-treatment of Indian strikers in Natal and accords its cordial support to your request for the extension of the composition of the Enquiry Commission by the addition of two gentlemen enjoying the confidence of Indians in South Africa, and fervently trusts that your demand will be satisfied so as to secure a full and impartial enquiry. India at your back in your struggle, heart and soul."

Rai Baikunt Nath Sen, in moving a resolution expressing regret at the retirement of Mr. D. E. Wacha and Mr. D. A. Khare from the office of General Secretaries, paid a warm tribute to the signal services rendered by them.

Mr. Wacha, on behalf of himself and Mr. Khare, thanked the audience for the kind words of praise spoken in appreciation of their services and said that they had only done their duty as servants of the Congress, and that their present retirement from the Secretaryship of the Congress Committee was in no way due to a want of interest. On the contrary their interest would last as long as health permitted. As a word of advice to the younger men of the Congress, Mr. Wacha said that the Congress had now been 23 years in existence, that it had passed through many a phase, through the phases of ridicule, contempt and obloquy, but that it was now entering on a new era when it was shaking hands with their Moslem brethren. A new star had arisen for the Congress and the course of this star would shape its future destiny. During its onward progress its course would be sometimes one of storm and stress. But remember this: "Toil on, toil on; but go onward in your progress. We can only reach our goal step by step, that goal which will crown us with success. Let it be self-government."

Nawab Syed Mahmud Bahadur and Mr. Subba Rao were appointed General Secretaries for the next year. Mr. Subba Rao in reply invited the next Congress to Madras.

Mr. Golam Ali Chagla, Secretary of the Reception Committee, proposed a vote of thanks to the President and said that the Nawab's presence had been productive of fruitful results. It was due to his presence that the Hindu-Mohamedan entente resolution had been adopted whose effect would be far-reaching.

Mr. Basu seconded and several delegate supported.

The president made the following reply:—

"Gentlemen, from the bottom of my heart I thank you for the very warm vote of thanks which you have just passed. It desire to convey to you once more my grateful appreciation of the great honour you have done me by electing me to preside over the deliberations of our National Assembly. I thank you all for the ready and willing assistance you have rendered to me in the discharge of my duties, and for the indulgence you have shown me in carry them out. It is not necessary for me to sum up the work accomplished during the last three days. I will only repeat, what my predecessors have said so often, that the work of this Congress is by no means over with the three days session, but that these three days are only the starting point and guide for continued and steady work in the course of the year that opens out before us. I do not wish to indulge in common places, but let me impress upon you that the Congress is not concerned with any work of momentary or local importance nor with the accomplishment of isolated objects. It aims at sustained and systematic work towards continuous progress, including peace and plenty, self-improvement and solidarity. The Indian National Congress is not an annual show, but is an organisation designed to stimulate and guide serious national work in which all who have confidence in the country's advancement, on modern lines, and have faith in its future destiny, are called upon to labour in a spirit of self-sacrifice and co-operation and in the exercise of the public virtues specially demanded by the exceptional conditions of the country. As a visible representation of our national aspirations, the Congress will attract and rally together the best minds among us, and even occasional failure will impel them to strive onward further in the belief that, for committees as for men, the test of real greatness is the capacity for self-denial and disinterested devotion to the public good. The zeal, earnestness and mutual confidence manifest among all that worked for the success of this session, among the delegates, the members of the reception committee and the volunteers, are undoubted indications of our determination to be a united nation. Let us not hesitate, falter or despair. Let us march forward, on and on. Let us be up and down, and not rest until the goal is reached.

You gave me a very warm reception on my arrival here, and during my stay here received great kindness from you for which I cannot sufficiently express my obligations to you. I shall carry with me very happy recollections of your city and of your excellent qualities, which I assure you will endure till the last hour of my life. Once again I express my grateful thanks for all you have done to make my stay among you comfortable and pleasant."

On the conclusion of the President's speech the Congress was dissolved.

Selections.

The Tango.

ALL Britain is now divided into three parts. There are those who rave in praise of the Tango. There are those who rave against. And there are those—a quiet majority—who know little about it and careless.

True, it is not easy to preserve a virginal ignorance, since the newspapers and the theatres have made the Tango their own. But many excellent people are really clever in dodging inconvenient knowledge. A few years ago a play called "Ben Hur" enjoyed its day of fleeting popularity in London. A certain great man was asked if he had seen it. "Of course, on the hoardings," was his reply. "But I mean have you seen the play?" "A play, is it? Really, I thought it was some new brand of whisky." People of this kind note the constant references to "Tango Teas" and "Tango Suppers," but probably connect the word with the idea of some cunningly advertised drink or beef essence.

Those who are at all interested in the Tango, however, are interested very much. The question is the Tango a shameful and ridiculous dance or a thing of rare grace and beauty?—cuts across all social and party lines. There are sound Tories who applaud, and violent Radicals who condemn it. Serious youth is appalled, cheery sensibility delighted. It has its friends and its enemies in Mayfair and Whitechapel alike. To express an opinion either way in public is to invite the most deadly and withering retorts from offended partisans. The pro-Tango party draw all their arguments from the ball-rooms of London; the "antis" rely on terrible stories of the Paris cabarets. They may be left to fight the matter out between themselves. The unbiased investigator is only concerned with the actual facts.

It is hardly a year ago since the Tango reached this country from South America by way of Paris. It was at first no more than a music-hall freak. But some of those mysterious people who inspire new social fashions were attracted by its sinuous movements and the strange backward kick, and this year it made its way into private houses as well as public ball-rooms. Enterprising hostesses smiled a welcome to the innovation. Dancing, once regarded by young men as the outside edge of boredom, became suddenly popular. The languishing industry of Mr. Turveydrop revived into vigorous life. Everybody, in the limited social sense, began to acquire the knack of swaying and kicking on the approved Tango lines. The resulting spectacle was too much for Hepzibah Countess of Grundy. That lady—everybody remembers her husband's elevation late in Victoria's reign—above the signature "A Peeress," broke out into scarcely co-herent protests against the "disgraceful travesties of dancing" to be seen in London ball-rooms. She had a debutante of eighteen—a Miss Pordenape—to protect, and that ingenious young person's cheek was assumed to be scarlet over the shocking evolutions of the Tango.

Lady Grundy's protest, of course, only advertised the dance, and the Tango has now passed through many of the phases of a popular craze. It holds the comedy stage without a rival. It has conquered the country houses. No great hotel is without its Tango teas and suppers. Millinery and dressmaking have responded to the Tango inspiration; and now even the journalists, the last to discover and the last to abandon a new idea, are beginning to discuss little else. That familiar figure, "the well-known Harley Street physician," has broken out. One side of the Street—say the odd numbers—recommends the Tango as an ideal exercise for the middle-aged. It is a fine, healthy exercise, "bringing all the large muscles in to play, inducing healthy skin action, and specially useful in cases of confirmed insomnia." The even numbers retort that grim possibilities lurk for the too vigorous Tango dancer—cardiac trouble, and muscular strain and liability to dislocation of the tibia. The "Lancet," too, will soon, no doubt, analyse the atmosphere of a Tango dance-room and prove that it yields an almost incredible number of bacteria to the square millimetre.

The aesthetics are equally divided. M. Richepin gives the Tango a distinguished ancestry and a good character. It is the incarnation of the spirit of the dance, and it comes to us from Pallas Athena, though it has had wanderings since it satisfied the Hellenic instinct for grace. Other voices scarcely less distinguished are raised against the innate savagery of a dance said to betray in every gesture its fitness for the cowboys and gauchos who evolved it. Indian or negroid—Spanish decadence grafted on to primitive animalism—this is the degraded ancestry of the thing European degenerates are not ashamed to embrace. Broadly speaking, the voting follows strictly party lines. The Academician condemns; the Futurist applauds. The school of art that still declares grass to be green is hostile to the Tango. Those who believe grass to be purple, with blotches of blue and yellow are warm friends of the Tango.

The argument, presumably will go on until the Tango—danced, photographed, "filmed," blessed and banned—has reached the stage of a generally recognised bore. Then, if it has real merits, it will quietly take its place in full odour of respectability in the repertory of established dances. Such was the fate of the Polka, the Lancers, the Schottische, and the rest. For the Polka, which so preoccupied Paris that in 1840 the Times complained that its correspondence was interrupted, was condemned, by Mrs. Grundy (not then ennobled) as a thing of license and contagious immodesty. Even the decorous waltz, the blameless mainstay of the modern programme met a storm of opposition when it reached these shores a century ago. The Tango may prove to have no more vitality than the American eccentricities which have had their little day in London, but has an interest for the moment as the expression of the spirit of the age. It represents a revolt from the tyranny of tradition, together with a bewildered outlook on the future. It says in effect, "Give us something new—or at least novel—ugly or beautiful matters not. Anything rather than dull perfection on the old lines."

It expresses, too, the modern passion for youthfulness. The child was curious to know what became of the old moons. A greater puzzle is what becomes of the old men and women. People refuse to grow old; perhaps because they are afraid to. They are like the wonderful one-horse shay, proof against the ordinary process of gradual depreciation. They last so many years, seemingly unchanged and unchangeable, and then—suddenly drop into pieces. Old age is unfashionable, and gravity pardonable only in the very young. It is said that the majority of Tango students are well over fifty. A boy may delight in bluebooks, a Greuzelike young girl may addict herself to the study of Eugenics; but that way fogginess and frumpiness lie for the man or woman over forty. Hence the excessive catering for the youthful in all departments. The newspaper reader who craved for "something about sunspots" has disappeared. His successor is assumed to be interested almost exclusively in the activities of those mysterious classes discussed in a scientific spirit by Mr. George Grossmith—the "bloods" and the "nuts" and their female equivalents.

And yet the silent majority really cares as little about these things as the honest yeoman under Charles II, troubled about the freaks of Scaly and Rochester. Modern feverishness is impressive enough in the newspapers, no doubt. But most men who have fairly extensive acquaintance will agree that on the whole the British pulse beats as healthful music as heretofore. John Bull is John Bull still, though he sometimes tries in his awkward way to cut a Parisian caper.—The Saturday Review.

Civis Britannicus—New Style.

THE strike of the Indians in Natal illustrates better than any other instance the unreality of much talk about the unity of the British Empire. A chief count in our case against the Kruger Government was their unjust and oppressive treatment of British Indians. We claimed from them full privileges of entry and residence for Indians in accordance with the London Convention. After the war, when country was under our control, we did virtually nothing to redress or abate those grievances. Lord Milner allowed the matter to stand over, and when self-government was given and the Union Government was formed, the worse counsels of the Transvaal and Natal prevailed over the more liberal policy of the Cape. The liberties of entrance, settlement, and occupation were further curtailed, an ignominious system of identification was imposed, and a high license tax of £3 upon unindentured labor was extended from the Transvaal over the whole Union so as to keep all Indians to the more servile occupations. Protests and peaceable representations have procured some trivial concessions, but no real abatement of grievances. Two years ago, after prolonged negotiations with the Government, Mr. Gandhi believed himself to have secured satisfactory pledges for a removal of the more flagrant injustices. But nothing was done to fulfil the pledges. Last summer Mr. Gokhale, a distinguished member of the Viceroy's Legislative Council, took the matter in hand, and, after a full investigation of the facts, approached the Government. He also obtained what he described as "a definite assurance" of reforms. In particular, he was informed that the abolition of the £3 license tax would shortly take place. But it seems that the Government is either unwilling or unable to redeem its promises.

It is, therefore, no matter for surprise that the Indians of Natal, weary of waiting, have elected to force matters to an issue by a strike and a formal breach of the emigration regulations. With one or two trifling exceptions, of which much has been made, their protest has been conducted in a peaceable and dignified manner. It has been met by wholesale prosecutions and imprisonment, accompanied—according to some reports—by brutal floggings. The indentured miners are sent back to work out their sentences in the mines under prison discipline, which seems to include the right to flog. The Prison Act of 1913, under which colliery compounds may thus be gazetted as gaols, is in itself an eye-opener as to what justice means for colored people in South Africa. Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Polak, the two most responsible leaders of this movement, are sentenced to terms of hard labor. Armed police are everywhere in evidence, and the more truculent Natalians, as usual, are clamoring for the brutal license of martial law. It is easy to understand the panic which prevails in this least civilized section of the British dominions. Natal ought never to have received the status of a "self-governing colony." It is far less fit for such a Government than Jamaica or Ceylon. Its white population is a small racial aristocracy living on the labor of a somewhat larger body of Indians and a Kaffir population ten times its size. It lives in a constant liability to panics, and sees rebellion continually on the horizon. The true story of the so-called Zulu Rebellion seven years ago is one of the most discredited pages of our Imperial history. There was no rebellion. There was a poll-tax, oppressively imposed and illegally collected; protests, and in a few instances, a failure to pay; attacks on unarmed Zulus by fully armed police and soldiery; a harrying of fugitives, and one chief, disaffected on other grounds, with a band of riotous young men, showed fight. Nearly 3,000 Zulus were killed, hundreds of kraals burned, and a Jeffreys assize ensued. Not more than a dozen white men lost their lives in the whole course of the fighting, and no single attack by Zulus upon the white farms scattered over the country was alleged.

If Natal is allowed to have its head, it will adopt similar modes of statecraft in dealing with this crisis. Fortunately, the action of the Union Government will introduce an element of greater gravity. For, oppressive and shift as the Union policy has been, men like Mr. Botha and Mr. Smuts are at any rate open to considerations wider than the exigencies of the moment and the particular locality. They have doubtless their difficulties in making the racial pride, common to the lower type of Boer and Briton, conform to their own higher ideals of government. We cannot expect that the British Government in South Africa will accord to British subjects from other lands even that measure of consideration claimed from Mr. Kruger, or that they will go any further than Canada or Australia towards realizing full equality of rights for citizens of the British Empire. But we do expect, and we should insist upon, their not placing such British subjects in a worse position than aliens from foreign lands would be. For if the subjects of any other civilized State are unjustly or oppressively treated in South Africa, their Consuls are there to look after their interests, and their Governments will use the requisite diplomatic pressure to secure redress. The Indian Government has no representative in South Africa, nor, apparently, has it any status for pressing the claims of its people. But surely this a reductio ad absurdum of Empire, that a fellow-subject of that Empire should have less effective liberty and less security than a foreigner. If Empire is not to be a mere byword and laughing-stock, it cannot rest content with this situation.

It is suggested that the Indian Government can and ought to bring pressure on its own account. It can refuse to permit the migration of the labour which South Africa, for its own purposes and on its own harsh conditions, does require. It can discriminate against South African products, and perhaps in other ways make itself disagreeable. This retaliation it ought, perhaps, to practise, if this is the only way of teaching the elements of justice and reason to South Africa. But surely the supposition that the Imperial Government itself is powerless to prevent such maltreatment of its Indian subjects is premature. What are these Imperial Conferences worth, and this continual bringing together of representatives of our Dominions for discussion of concerted policies of commerce and defence, if they cannot gain acceptance for some such elementary standard of Imperial citizenship as shall preclude at least the worst of the grievances from which the Indians suffer in South Africa? Alike to the Indian and the Imperial Governments the appeal is made, not merely, on grounds of abstract justice, or even of humanity, but also of urgent expediency. The nature of that expediency will be obvious to those who follow the wave of excitement roused throughout India by the reports of events in South Africa. The Indians are a sympathetic people. Moslems as well as Hindus are involved in these grievances, and the resentment against our Government, should they remain unredressed, is likely to have exceedingly grave consequences. Responsible Angli-Indians in India itself as well as here are well aware of this, and are endeavouring to secure some sort of effective intervention. We cannot, it is true, coerce South Africa; but surely we retain, by the Imperial connection, some effective powers of persuasion. If we do not, then the reality of Empire disappears together with its unity.

The Hapsburg Monarchy.*

THE relations of the various peoples which comprise the Dual Monarchy of Austria-Hungary have long been an attractive subject of study to Englishmen. Several Englishmen who accidentally during their travels became interested in one of the numerous ethnological questions of the Empire have returned to the place and the subject again and again, until the watching of some well-nigh insoluble problem trying to solve itself has become a mental passion. One or two Englishmen in this way have acquired a masterly knowledge of some aspects of Austro-Hungarian life. We need only mention as an example Mr. R. W. Seton-Watson, valuable articles by whom have from time to time appeared in the Spectator. But Mr. H. W. Steed says that in spite of the existence of numerous works on Austria-Hungary—some the results of first-hand study and others of reading and compilation—there is room for the observations of one who has passed ten years of constant residence in the Dual Kingdom. Certainly everyone will welcome this book from so able a writer and so well-known an authority on Austro-Hungarian life and politics as Mr. Steed. We think he over-emphasizes some of the influences at work in Austria-Hungary—notably the Jewish influence—but there is so much that is penetrating in this brilliant book that we can afford to put up with some prejudices (as we regard them) even though we may regret them.

If we had to summarize Mr. Steed's conclusions in a sentence we should say that he believes the Hapsburg Monarchy to be a very powerful instrument of cohesion, capable probably of upsetting all the predictions that the fissiparous tendencies of the Empire Francis will end in structural disunion at the death of Emperor Joseph. The very choice of his title shows how dominant Mr. Steed believes the symbol of the Monarchy to be. In his view, the frequent internal crises are crises of growth rather than of decay. It is notorious, none the less, that the peoples of Austria-Hungary are more conscious of their differences than of their brotherhood. They are like ships steering different courses, yet using the same star for the purpose of navigation; the star is the Hapsburg Monarchy. When the Emperor Francis Joseph addresses the various races under his control he calls them the "peoples," not the "people." "Nationality" for them means their own racial birthright, not membership of the Empire. Thus Austrian Germans speak of their "nation" and mean primarily the Germans of Bohemia, Tirol, Upper and Lower Austria, Moravia, Styria, and Carinthia, and secondarily Germans who are not Austrians at all—the Germans of the German Empire, Czechs, Croats, Serbs, Slovenes, Poles, and Ruthenes similarly speak of their "nations" in the ethnical sense. The Austrian essayist, Ferdinand Kürnberger, said that Austria could be comprehended only if it were remembered that she is a kind of Asia. The spirit of the country is both that of a child and of an old man. In the whirl of persons, with all their South German liveliness and Slav changeability, and in spite of the way they "dance up to all things with verve and grace," there is still an Asiatic stiffness, inertness, and conservatism which has "not budged an inch since Biblical times."

The sudden arrival of universal suffrage in a virtually autocratic country was a typical paradox. It was characteristic that the move should have been dictated by the Emperor and forced on by the Socialists working from below. Parliament was reluctant. "In point of fact," says Mr. Steed, "the introduction of universal suffrage was the fulfilment of a dynastic plan long formed and tenaciously pursued. To regard it simply as a 'popular victory' would be to overlook the circumstance that in the Hapsburg Monarchy most things have another than their surface meaning, fulfil another than their ostensible function." The strength of the Throne was proved within very recent history when one of the long series of Magyar attempts to assert the separate nature of the Hungarian army failed like all the others. At the same time, Mr. Steed does not deny that the undermining tendencies of the Magyars are one of the most serious menaces to the Throne. The methods of the Magyars, indeed, are one of the great ironies which have to be remembered in stating a general rule as to the certainty of sweetening a people by a grant of autonomy. Englishmen who are still alive can remember the raptures of enthusiasm with which Kossuth was received in England when he pleaded for the cause of his countrymen. But never since the day when the Magyars got what they wanted have they shown any sign of according to their own subordinates the sympathy which they themselves once craved and won. The mean-ness is the greater because they attained more than they had deserved or even expected, thanks to the sagacity of Déak. When Austria was hard pressed by other troubles and the Hungarian question was still an open and dangerous sore, the Emperor Francis Joseph asked Déak on what terms he would settle the dispute. Déak, with an outward show of chivalry, answered that the Hungarians desired to take no unfair advantage and would require no better terms now than before. It was an answer worthy of that clever leader, for what had been asked for before was a maximum representing much more than the Magyars had hoped to receive. The Emperor, however, gratefully closed with the offer. The Magyars have forgotten everything and learned nothing new, whereas the Emperor himself has never ceased to learn and to change with the times. He has never changed too soon, but has shown an extraordinary aptitude in recognizing the hour of necessity. It may be said that his changes have been only opportunism or mere cynicism. But at all events they have served the Empire well, and have probably saved it. To some ardent proposer of a new scheme of regeneration he remarked: "En théorie, en théorie, peut-être; mais en pratique il faut avoir été Empereur soixante ans."

The Hapsburg Monarchy*. By Henry Wickham Stead, London: Constable and Co., [7s. 6d. net.]

Next to the Crown in importance Mr. Steed places the army. The Church, the police, and the bureaucracy are all, in his opinion, of less account. Of the army he says:—

"It inculcates, moreover, unitary sentiment and devotion to the dynasty. In spirit it is far more democratic than the German army. The bulk of Austro-Hungarian officers are drawn, not as in Germany, from the aristocracy and the nobility, but rather from the middle and lower middle classes. Austro-Hungarian officers are, for the most part, hard-working, hard-living men, unspoiled by luxury, and striving to subsist on little more than their meagre pay. They stand nearer than the German officers to the common soldier. Cases of ill-treatment of men by officers are rare. The subaltern who should restrict his intercourse with his men to the shouting of a few words of command would soon be found wanting. The bulk of Austro-Hungarian regiments are racially composite. Their officers must speak enough of the languages of the men to be able to supplement the German words of command with detailed instructions and explanations in the mother tongues of the rank and file. There results a personal relationship that renders the army in Austro-Hungary a more human and humanizing organization than Germany."

On the Church Mr. Steed delivers a bitter and damning judgment:—

"It has great power, vast wealth, and little living faith. It is an institution, not an evangelizing nor always a purifying agency. 'In tutta Vienna non ho trovato una sola anima,' was the sad verdict of a profoundly religious foreign friar after considerable experience of the Austrian ecclesiastical world. The religious movement, nicknamed 'Modernist,' that affected some of the best minds in the French, Italian, German, and English branches of the Roman Church, left Austria-Hungary practically untouched. Austria has not produced a single 'Modernist' of note. One solitary priest who pleaded for greater spirituality in a book called Nostra Maxima Culpa was speedily silenced and is now forgotten. One Hungarian bishop revealed spiritual tendencies in a series of books and pastoral letters, but found himself condemned and obliged to retract. These are the only signs of loftier aspiration in the Church of Austria and Hungary. The rest is domination, intrigue, enjoyment of fat revenues, and maintenance of control over a people very observant of religious form and very void of religious feeling. In such conditions 'Clericalism' flourishes."

It is in his appreciation of Dr. Lueger, the famous Burgomaster of Vienna, and in his condemnation of Austrian "Liberalism" that Mr. Steed seems to us unnecessarily to excuse and sanction anti-Semitism. The Zionist organization—the most conscious and deliberate expression of Judaism—is but slenderly represented in Parliament, and the whole body of Jews is numerically inferior to such nationalities as the Ruthenes and the Rumanes. Mr. Steed attributes to Jewish capitalistic influences all the inaneities and inconsistencies of Austrian "Liberalism." Moreover, he assumes in many highly civilized countries a degree of anti-Semitism which we ourselves have been unable to detect.

We have not space to mention all the admirable points in the book, but we must add that there is a brief but masterly summary of the South Slav question. Apart from the South Slav question Mr. Steed would assign special prominence (among the dangers that threaten the Monarchy) to the old problem of Transylvanian autonomy and to the newer question of Rumanian Irredentism in the event of the relations between the Monarchy and Rumania becoming less cordial. In this respect the bigoted Chauvinism of the Magyars is once more to blame. Mr. Steed, contrary to one received opinion, does not think that Germany is waiting anxiously for the break-up of the Empire.

"Germany seems unlikely to consent to any essential dismemberment of Austria-Hungary as long as the German Empire is able, by a policy of economic and political penetration, to use the Monarchy as its instrument. A main object of this penetration is to give Germany command of the route to Trieste and, through the Adriatic, to the Mediterranean. The Hapsburg Monarchy will probably be exposed to no mortal peril as long as it refrains from serious insubordination to Germany; and should a European conflagration ever arise out of the numerous unsolved international issues in Europe or the Near East, the Monarchy might hope, in the event of victory, to obtain with German help a considerable slice of Russian territory. In the event of defeat its existence, like that of the German Empire in its present form, might be endangered. But catastrophic hypotheses are best left out of account in these days of intertwined interests and of armies so colossal that defeat could hardly fail to be attended by revolutions fatal to thrones and to the existing social order; and calm consideration of the complicated factors involved leads rather to the conclusion that the Hapsburg Monarchy has but one sure way of escape from its difficulties into a more prosperous and tranquil future—the way of evolution, gradual or rapid as circumstances may permit, towards a form of internal organization better adapted than the Dual System to the permanent needs of its peoples."—The Spectator.

British Indians.

The Marquis of Crewe, Secretary of State for India, received on the 1st December, at the India Office a deputation from the All-Indian South African League, who conveyed to him the views of the League on the position of Indians in South Africa.

The members of the deputation were Sir M. M. Bhowaggee, Major N. P. Sidha, Dr. Jivraj N. Mehta, Messrs. B. Dube, J. M. Parika, C. A. Latif, S. A. Bhisey, N. M. Muzumdar, M. M. Gandexia, A. S. M. Anik, and Sorabji Shapurji.

Sir M. M. Bhowaggee expressed on behalf of the Indian people thanks to Lord Crewe for consenting to receive the deputation at a critical juncture. There was, he said, not a person of Indian birth in this country or elsewhere who was not in absolute unanimity with the objects of the deputation. As to the prevailing feeling—it might be called excitement—aroused among the people of India by recent events in South Africa, there was the powerful testimony of Lord Hardinge. The words of the Viceroy had served to some extent to pacify the intense indignation with which the people of India viewed the trend of things in South Africa. The deputation wished to associate itself with Lord Hardinge's demand for a searching inquiry into the grievances of the Indians in South Africa and the dismal events which had resulted therefrom. The tale of the sufferings and indignities to which British Indians had been subjected in South Africa for years past was long and squalid. It had been bad enough in the time of the Boers; it had been ten times worse since. Old laws to their detriment had been strengthened, new ones had been enacted, and all of them enforced with a rigour unknown before the establishment of British domination there. The effect of all this had been to harass the Indian settlers there, and to lower the whole of the King-Emperor's Indian subjects in the eyes of the world as a law order of human beings, unfit to enjoy the ordinary privileges of citizenship in any part of the globe, for this brand of treatment was being put upon them in other British colonies and in foreign countries. How the all-protecting and merciful rule of the British Crown, under which they were content and proud to live, could suffer 800 millions of its subjects to be thus degraded in the sight of nations naturally passed their comprehension. That there was no justification for such treatment was evident from the fact that responsible Ministers of the Crown of both parties had repeatedly admitted the injustice and harshness of the laws directed against them, and had given repeated promises and pledges for redress. Their pledges had remained unfulfilled.

Even such partial settlement of the most intolerable burdens, such as poll-tax and the unnecessarily drastic provisions of the Immigration Bill which was last year dangled before their eyes had so far been evaded. That settlement was understood to afford a temporary relief from some of the most irksome burdens which were making the very existence of the sufferers impossible, but were a long way off from any appreciable solution of their numerous wrongs, for so long as the people of India were laid under any disabilities on account of race or colour in any portion of the British dominions, so long must they feel sorely aggrieved. That bar sinister must be removed at all costs. It could hardly be contested that most if not all of the hard measures levelled against them were due to race prejudice, and were used with a view to their extirpation from the colonies. After years of patient suffering, and finding that even the little relief they had been led to expect from the more immediately pressing burdens was being finally withheld, some of them had protested in the last few days against their situation by passive resistance, and certain numbers of the indentured labourers had gone on strike. They knew the penalty of the technical offence they were committing, and willingly took their punishment. But the rigour and, in many instances, the brutality with which their punishment had been and was now being carried out was the main ground of their complaint. The horrible tale of their maltreatment in various shapes came from quarters on whose veracity full reliance could be placed. It had been refuted by the local authorities, but past experience of the attitude of the officials there towards British Indians justified belief in the complaints. Even the almost one-sided reports that had appeared in public journals showed that the indentured Indians had been sent back to the mines and fields to work under the lash of the sjambok freely wielded by their employers, and that it was only when thus driven to desperation that they adopted measures of self-preservation. The tale of so many deaths of Indians by the free use of fire-arms on the part of the local police, on the one hand, and, on the other a few scratches or wounds suffered by the latter in the scuffles proved conclusively that the reports of violence by Indians were exaggerated. At all events, there was a strong case made out for an independent inquiry on this point. Whatever the result of such investigation might be, it would be found that the wholesale exercise for the first time in the history of the British Empire of the provision of law which authorised the conversion of compounds into gaols could not have failed to result in a form of torture which the framers of the law could have scarcely contemplated. It was not denied that the sjambok and other weapons had been freely used to compel men to do the very work which in their last desperation they had refused to perform. This incident, this travesty of law, might be possible in a savage country, but it was a method of vindictive barbarism which ought to be impossible in any square foot of soil over which the British flag flew.

All this had been done in the sacred name of law. But the laws of South Africa, specially devised for the extermination of Indian settlers and immigrants, were not such laws as a free nation enacted for the preservation of life, property, and order. It was to the enactment of laws of this kind that the people of India strongly objected, and they sought the intervention of the Imperial Government to procure their repeal or modification. When self-government was conferred on South Africa it was well known that even when the authorities there had limited and controlled powers of administration they had adopted every means to oppress and disgrace the British-Indian settlers. In fact, by repeated solemn pledges the Imperial Government at that very time was under obligation to ameliorate their condition. It could not be contended that in transferring the administration to the Colony the Government deliberately avoided the obligation, leaving their Indian subjects to be trampled upon. In the discussions in Parliament a distinct assurance was given that the Crown's veto was reserved and would be freely exercised in regard to any measures which were unjust or oppressive towards its Indian subjects. That clearly showed that the self-government conferred was limited, with the authority of the Crown reserved. He contended that it was the Imperial Government's duty to mediate at this critical moment. On it, and it alone, rested the responsibility to safeguard the interests of India throughout the Empire. The Imperial Government had finally to arbitrate on these grave differences between the two sections of British subjects, and to that end the following immediate measures, the deputation respectfully submitted, should be adopted:—

1. The release of the passive resisters and strikers now in prison.
2. The amendment of the Immigration Act to remove the racial bar, the refusal of domiciliary and existing rights, and the repeal of legislation which offends against the religious and marital status of the people of India.

3. The abolition of the poll-tax.

4. The institution of a thorough inquiry into the responsibility resting on both parties, Indian and Colonial, for recent events by a tribunal with adequate Indian representation.

5. The adoption ultimately of such measures by the Crown as shall secure to British Indians throughout the Empire the citizenship which have been guaranteed to them by the solemn pledges of the Crown.

Mr. B. Dube quoted statements made by past Ministers of the Crown, including Lord Salisbury and Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, as to the rights of citizenship which should be enjoyed by Indian subjects of the Crown wherever they might happen to be. Coming to more recent times, he recalled the words of Colonel Seely: "If persons are admitted into British colonies they must be given civil rights. 'Free' or 'not at all' seems to me the sound principle for the British Empire." There could be no question then, Mr. Dube added, that Indians in South Africa belonged the ordinary rights of British citizens by virtue of their birth under the Constitution of the British Empire. He did not ignore the difficulties which faced the Imperial Government in South Africa. It was because the leader of the Indians in South Africa, Mr. Ghandi, fully realised those difficulties that there was no demand at present for the full potential rights of citizenship under the Union. Those rights, it was hoped, would come later without any demand having to be made for them. Mr. Dube pointed out how the South African Union Government, instead of lessening the rigour of the laws and regulations that were humiliating to Indians, had materially increased and intensified it. He mentioned as a special grievance the fact that the wife of an Indian who was entitled to reside within the Union could not join her husband and live with him simply because she was married according to the rites of the Moslem faith, which permitted polygamy. Such a law was outrageous, a slur upon the good name of Indian women, and an indirect attack upon their religion. It had produced an unprecedented storm of indignation in every family in India.

LORD CREWE'S REPLY.

The Marquis of Crewe said:—I have listened with close attention to the observations made by the two speakers on behalf of this representative deputation. I need not assure you that the events of which you have spoken—events which cover a long period, events which prove a condition of general discontent among the subjects of His Majesty in South Africa, and which have now culminated in resistance to the law, in tumult, and in actual loss of life—these events are a subject of deep concern to all His Majesty's Government, and, of course, in particular to myself, who, as Secretary of State for India, am finally responsible to Parliament and to the Empire for the well-being of India and Indians everywhere. As we all know, India has been deeply stirred by the reports which have reached her, and though we need not adopt as proved facts every statement which has appeared in the press, yet it is evident that grounds exist for most serious disquiet, and there also exists material for close inquiry, both into the occurrences themselves and to the causes which have led up to them. —(Hear, hear.) As it happens I have enjoyed opportunities of studying this question, which, I think, may be regarded as unique. As Secretary of State for the Colonies for some years and since then as Secretary of State for India, I have been deeply interested in this question. I have discussed the question personally and at length with the South African Ministers specially responsible—with General Botha, with General Smuts, and with the late Mr. Fischer. I have also discussed it at length with representatives of Indian opinion, with Mr. Ghandi, Mr. Polak, and last, but not least, with Mr. Gokhale, whose passage to South Africa I have only encouraged in the hope that it might lead to a permanent settlement there. I need not debate on the character of the Indian spokesmen further than to say that I have always recognised in Mr. Gokhale a man of high ideals, and of a single-minded devotion to the interests of his fellow-countrymen in South Africa. I should like to say to this deputation as to South African Ministers. I believe that they are honestly anxious themselves to deal out fair terms to the Indian population in South Africa, and to see that the laws are humanely administered, but I am bound to say that they are often hampered by the existence in South Africa of a public opinion which is less enlightened than their own and by a degree of racial prejudice from which as individuals they are themselves largely free.

I think we shall be able to see directly the bearing of this particular fact on the position of affairs in South Africa. In the first place, it is generally conceded that South Africa can claim to restrict the immigration into its dominion—that is to say, that if there had been no Indians there at all now South Africa might have declined to admit any. But from this confession to reflections arise. In the first place, South Africa invited the Indians there, and she has profited greatly in two ways—first by the skilful labour of the indentured labourers in Natal, and secondly by the amount of pioneering trading which in the early development of the colonies was done by Indians.

Further, we have to bear in mind that a special claim is established by these facts for considerate treatment of the Indians, a claim which, I am afraid, we cannot regard as having been generally recognised in South Africa as a whole.—(Hear, hear.) The main claim all through has been that there should be no racial discrimination against Indians or against Asiatics as such, and objection is taken either to differentiation by the actual enactment of the law, or by administrative order, or—and this may be noted—by published official statements of any kind. Note the bearing of this fundamental contention on the argument which has been mainly relied on by South Africa through the whole of his controversy and difficulty. That argument is that although the laws are in terms restrictive because South African opinion instead on having them so, yet their operation has been so easily conducted that no particular grievances exist. That is the argument which has been used. On that it has first to be remarked that, besides practical grievances, there are such things as moral grievances which cannot be left altogether out of sight. Even taking the test of practical grievances, and regarding that as the reasonable subject of complaint, though I am quite certain that South African Ministers themselves have desired that the administration of the law should not be unduly burdensome to individuals, can it be said that this wish has always been carried out? The laws are necessarily administered by a number of different officials of all grades. Some of these officials may be stupid, and bound up with red-tape and the literal interpretation of the law. Others, again, may be so affected by racial prejudice that they don't wish that the burden of the law may be lightly borne. So that surely it is a dangerous thing to depend, as South Africa seems to have done, on rational and sympathetic administration of the law to protect individuals from the operations of severe enactments in such circumstances as actually exist in the South African Union.

Now take some of the quite familiar and special instances which have been touched upon in the two speeches which we have heard. Now it is not claimed by the Indian population in South Africa that South Africa ought to legalise polygamy, but, on the other hand, communities that practise polygamy surely demand reasonable consideration. And can it be fairly said that in individual cases this consideration has always been accorded? Well, then, it is apparently recognised by Indians in South Africa—and this, again, we have had mentioned in Mr. Dube's speech—that they cannot enjoy unrestricted movement from province to province. Again, we ask if the regulations which restrict that movement have been modified as far as possible, and has care been taken to the withdrawal of powers which have existed in the past for poor members of the Indian community? when we come to the most noticeable instances of any, and to the cause of the recent events of which we have been reading. What has been the history of the £3 tax in Natal, and the various questions of domicile which have been attached to that tax? Well, there is a regrettable obscurity as to what really occurred when the matter was last before the Union Parliament. Was it the fact that the Union Government were willing to drop the tax but that it was maintained in deference to the views of the Natal members? That, I understand, is disputed. How far was the abolition of the tax even actually foretold or promised? There again seems to be a difference of opinion as to what actually occurred. I can only say that it must be a great misfortune if the Indians in South Africa consider themselves to have been in any way played with in a matter of such weight and importance as this. This impost does not bring in a large revenue; it does not, so far as we can see, seem to serve any useful purpose; and a large body of public opinion in South Africa seems to regard it in a manner which I have just indicated; and yet it has become the main source of these recent difficulties. Rioting and loss of life have followed from it, with what is perhaps in some ways even more serious still, the prospect of long feud and the embitterment of relations for the future. A number of persons have been punished for breaches of the law, some with sentences of considerable severity; but what has doubtless roused more public feeling in India was the repeated allegations of personal ill-treatment by flogging and in other ways.

Now these statements which have been circulated demand inquiry—(hear, hear)—and I am glad to see that General Smuts has gone to Natal to make inquiry in person. I need not say that his Majesty's Government will accept—and in my view everybody ought to accept—categorical statements regarding the conduct of their officers made by responsible Ministers such as General Smuts and his colleagues. But it appears to me that it is to the charges of illegal—or what one may describe as extra-legal—violence that particular inquiry ought to be made. It is altogether wrong and purposeless of anybody to adopt a tone of menace towards South Africa. But I believe that the Government there will agree that if South African repute and the solidarity of the Empire were to be sustained by instituting a form of inquiry which was not solely official no sentiment either of national or of personal amour propre ought to stand in the way of such an investigation. And I add that such an investigation, to be fruitful, ought to be directed not only into the particular circumstances of the last few days, but into the substance of the complaints which are the cause of the restless state of the Indian population of South Africa, I can assure you, in conclusion, that not only we at this office, but His Majesty's Government as a whole, will continue to give unremitting attention to this weighty subject, and it is due, I think, to my colleague Mr. Harcourt and to his staff at the Colonial Office to state my conviction that though he and they may participate less than we do in the actual Indian point of view, yet they are none the less anxious that complete justice should be done to these Indian immigrants in South Africa, whom circumstances have placed under the special care of their Department. That, I think, is all I have to say to you this afternoon. I need only assure you once more that I fully recognise both the important character of your deputation and the supreme importance of the subject upon which you have come to speak.

Sir M. M. Bhowaggee thanked Lord Crewe for his statement, and for its sympathetic tone. In order that there might be no misunderstanding on the subject, he wished to refer to the inquiry that was suggested. Would the interests of India be duly recognised by an adequate Indian representation? There was one passage in Lord Crewe's reply to which attention should be directed. It was the statement that it was simply because Indians had gone in large numbers to South Africa before all these questions arose originally, and because they had been the means of building up the prosperity of some of the South African colonies, that their residence there could be tolerated, and that if the Indians had not gone to South Africa when they did it would have been competent for South Africa to prohibit the immigration. To that view the Indian population would certainly demur, because as citizens of the British Empire, as loyal subjects of the Crown, they claimed the right of entry into all parts of His Majesty's dominions. If the deputation did not make that clear they would be accused by the people of India generally of not having represented their view on the subject. The deputation could go away with some satisfaction in the knowledge that at all events an inquiry was promised, an inquiry in which he assumed Indian interests would be duly represented. Something had been said about an inquiry by General Smuts. If recent telegrams had been read rightly General Smuts had ceased to inquire, and was now refusing to interfere at all. The deputation entreated the Secretary of State for India to use his great influence with his colleagues in the Imperial Government in support of Lord Hardinge's demand for an impartial inquiry, in which all, not only British subjects, but the world at large, might have confidence.—(Hear, hear.)

Lord Crewe, in reply, said:—I must deal at once, and shortly, with the two points which have been mentioned. In the first place, with regard to the general access of the subjects of His Majesty to all parts of the Empire. What I said with regard to the part played by the Indians of South Africa in building up the industries and activities of South Africa in the past was simply observed with the purpose of emphasising the claim which they thereby possessed upon the British and Dutch inhabitants of the Union. I had certainly no desire to engage in any argument on the abstract question of the access of all the King's subjects to every part of the Empire. Certainly I, for one, should never quarrel with any Indian who claimed that right, or who considered that he or she ought to be freely admitted to all parts of the Empire. But as you gentlemen, who are well instructed both in history and politics, are aware, various communities within the Empire hold strong views which tend to modify that right of free access. On the second and more important question, of an inquiry into South African events and of the form which it ought to take, I ought to state that I have not yet had the opportunity of discussing this question with my colleagues in the Government. In stating my conviction that some form of inquiry not purely official would be desirable in order to satisfy public opinion, I was expressing my own view, although I have no reason to suppose that it is not generally held. The object, of course, of any inquiry is to get at the actual facts. It is more for that purpose that an inquiry is held than in order to satisfy the rights or claims of any particular person or set of persons, and if you ask me without prejudice as to whether I think that the Government of South Africa would agree to the holding of an inquiry before a tribunal partly composed of Indian residents in South Africa, I must frankly tell you I don't believe they would.

Sir M. M. Bhowaggee said, he suggested that there should be Indians on the inquiry constituted by the Indian Government through the Imperial Government.

Lord Crewe: As I said, the object is that all the facts should be brought out in a manner which satisfied the public both here and in India and elsewhere, that they really have been brought out. If that is done, the actual machinery is surely of less importance. That is the fact that the truth is clearly brought out. That was the only point on which I had to make a small correction. I thank you very much for the kind words you have said with regard to my position in the deputation.—The Manchester Guardian.

THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF AL-BAYAN FI ULUM-IL-QURAN

HELD AS AN
INTRODUCTION TO THE COMMENTARY
OF THE

HOLY QURAN

CALLED TAFSIR-I-HAQQANI.

The original book was written by M. Abu Muhammad Abdul Haqq Haqqani of Delhi in the Indo-Arabic language. The learned author has left nothing untouched concerning what is required for a valuable book of this nature. The unfair objections raised against Islam by its enemies, through their ignorance or injustice, have been treated and refuted at full length. The existence of God through reasonable arguments, the refutation of suspicions and doubts raised by Agnostics and Atheists, the discussions on the nature and attributes of God, filled with deep learning and logical reasoning, together with refutations of the false and absurd assertions of the opponents are subjects worthy of appreciation by lovers of truth. The nature of angels, their existence as independent beings their transformation into any shape they like: the thorough investigation of the statements of the rationalists and philosophers on the subject: the debates on the mission of the true Prophets; the different aspects of inspiration; and revelation the proof of the miracles performed by the Prophets and Saints; the just answers to the plausible statements of the disbelievers in the Prophets and their miracles; the soul and the next world; the transference of man to it; the reward and punishment of good and evil deeds; the refutations of spurious religions and of Atheists by their insufficient and false teachings; together with reasonable answers to the suspicions cast by the malignant spirit of the enemies of Islam and the false imputations charged by them against the holy person of the Prophet, together with the testimonies borne in favor of him by the critics of Europe, have been fully described in this translation.

An abstract of review by the Comrade.—The translation in English is quite good. The printing and get-up is excellent; Messrs. Thacker, Spink & Co., being responsible for it. The book has about 750 pages, but from beginning to end besides being learned and instructive is very interesting reading for a Moslem, and more so for a non-Moslem in search for truth about Islam. The book for the sake of convenience is divided into three chapters, and has an Introduction which deals with knowledge gained by External Senses, Internal Senses, by Revelations and by means of Signs and Emblems. The first chapter deals with the last and the greatest of all the Prophets of God, Mohamed, the attributes of God—the creator of the universe, Sanctification, Angels, Genii, Soul Resurrection, and the next world, with objections raised by opponents of Islam and answers to them. The second chapter is the most important as it deals with the early history of Islam, gives a brief sketch of the life of the Prophet, and discusses fully all about crusades, polygamy and inspiration of the Holy Quran. Judaism, Christianity, Vedas, Buddhism, Jainism, etc. It explains the Divine Science in the Quran, explaining the prayers, Zakat, Fasting, Haj and Jihad. In the last chapter, a great deal is explained about the Old and the New Testaments and the portions thereof which have been lost. Very useful information is given about the Christian and the Hindu sects, and closes with an account of Zoroastrians. It is a book which will be most useful for the English educated Moslems, as it would give them a very clear insight into their faith, and prepare them to defend it easily against the attacks of the Christian and other Missionaries. Books like this dealing with the modern علم الکلام were badly needed and we strongly recommend all to purchase and study it carefully."

FATEHPUR, Delhi, 22nd September, 1913.

The English translation of "Al-Bayan," the famous book written by Maulana Abdul Haq, had been given to me for reading and reviewing by Hajee Muhammad Ishaq.

The book is so well translated that the beauties of the author's style and diction have been amply preserved. This treatise would be a most valuable addition to the Islamic literature in the English language. It expounds in a most lucid and logical manner the teaching of the Great Prophet, and gives a rational and logical refutation of all the attacks on Islam.

This book would be useful both to the Mohamedan readers and those Europeans who want to learn the truth about Islam.

(Sd.) M. A. ANSARI, B.A., M.B., M.D., M.B.G.S., I.R.C.P.

This book will be a best companion to the Moslems and non-Moslems in India and Foreign Countries and the members of the New All-India Mohamedan Religious Association. Price has been reduced from Rs. 15 to Rs. 10/6 so that learners of truth about Islam may easily purchase it.

Apply to—THE MANAGER.

The General Newspaper Agency

and Talanta Book Depot, Delhi.

Or Hajee Muhammad Ishaq, Merchant, Sadar Bazar, Delhi.

منید عام در شاہوار یا علمی سمندر

(۱) «عظیم الشان قرآن شریف مترجم محشی» تقطیع ۲۰ جیب پائیس روپیہ

کی قیمت کی تفسیر حقانی کا ترجمہ چڑھائی کی علاوہ لغت و جاوندی کی جواہرات درج کئی کئی ہیں۔ ہدیہ مجلد سات روپیہ بارہ آنہ غیر مجلد چہ روپیہ آٹھ آنہ (۲) «الفراروق» مکتبہ علامہ شبلی ندائی قیمت تین روپیہ (۳) «الہارون» قیمت ایک روپیہ آٹھ آنہ (۴) «الامون» قیمت ایک روپیہ آٹھ آنہ (۵) «سیرۃ النعمان» قیمت ایک روپیہ آٹھ آنہ (۶) «جنستان عرب» قیمت ایک روپیہ چار آنہ (۷) «باب الاحادیث» قیمت بارہ آنہ (۸) «اولیائے دہلی» قیمت آٹھ آنہ (۹) «ترجمان حقیقت» ڈاکٹر اقبال کی کل نظمونکا مجلد مجموعہ قیمت ایک روپیہ دو آنہ (۱۰) «سراج الاخبار کابل» پندرہ روزہ ہفت روزہ فارسی زبان کا اعلیٰ ترین اخبار چند سالانہ دس روپیہ * لکھی کا پتہ اسلامیہ بک ڈپو و جنرل اخبار ایجنسی۔ بلیاراد۔ دارالاسط و دہلی

پروہی مفت منسالیجی

اعجاز نما چاول

گذشتہ اشاعت میں اعجاز نما چاول کی منسل قیمت ملاحظہ فرما چکی ہیں اسلئے دوبارہ تعریف کرنیکی ضرورت نہیں ہے۔ چونکہ اس عرصہ میں بہت سی خطوط بیگم صاحبہ کی پاس اس مضمون کی پہنچی ہیں کہ اعجاز نما چاول کا رعایتی اعلان ایک مرتبہ اور شایع کرنا چاہئے تاکہ جو اصحاب اس تعجب خیز چاول کی زیارت سے محروم رہ گئے ہیں مستفیض ہو جائیں *

لہذا بحکم جناب عاشرہ بیگم صاحبہ یہ رعایتی اشتہار فہام کی غرض سے پھر شایع کیا جاتا ہے۔ یعنی جس قدر درخواستیں ۳۰ جنوری تک دفتر میں موصول ہونگی انکی خدمت میں اعجاز نما چاول بالکل مفت پہنچا جاویگا محض ایک چاندی کی ڈبہ، ایک خوردبین، دو عدد طین کی منتش ڈبیان وغیرہ (جو چاول مذکور کی ہمراہ دیجاتی ہیں) ان سب چیزوں کی قیمت وہ نہایت رعایتی بی صرف ایک روپیہ پانچ آنہ بدرجہ وی ہی لکھی جاوے گی۔ اخبار «زمیندار» لاہور اس چاول کی نسبت حسب ذیل خیرالائ کا اظہار کرتا ہے۔

ریویو «زمیندار»۔ عائشہ بیگم صاحبہ فی حال میں ایک چاول جیسپر پڑی سورہ اخلاص نہایت خوشخط حروف میں لکھی ہے۔ ہمارے پاس ریویو کی غرض سے روانہ کیا ہے۔ اگر کسی کی قدرتی بینائی اعلیٰ درجہ کی ہو تو وہ خالی آنکھ سے ایک ایک حرف پڑھتی ہو بخوبی قادر ہو سکتا ہے ضعیف النظر اصحاب خوردبین کی مدد سے جو چاول کی ساتھ دیجاتی ہیں ایک ایک حرف بلکہ ایک ایک لفظ کو صفائی کی ساتھ دیکھ سکتے ہیں۔ عائشہ بیگم صاحبہ کا کمال تعریف و قدر دانی کا مستحق ہے اسکی اصلی قیمت گیارہ روپیہ پانچ آنہ ہے۔ اخبار «وطن» کی ایڈیٹر صاحبہ اپنی ریویو میں چاول کی کمال تعریف کرتی ہوئے فرماتی ہیں کہ اسکی قیمت ۱۰ روپیہ ۱۰ آنہ ۱۰ پیسہ گیارہ روپیہ پانچ آنہ کچھ ہی نہیں ہے *

نوٹ۔ درخواستیں ۳۰ جنوری تک آجانی چاہئیں ورنہ عدم تصمیل کی

فکایت معاف *

ملکی کا پتہ۔ منیجر کارخانہ عائشہ بیگم قاضی اسٹریٹ امرتسرہ

خلع مراد آباد *

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HEREKE, CONSTANTINOPE.Turkish Fezes made in Turkey.

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpacks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

11, 5-14

Sole-Agents for Indiafor Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople.*SHaida & KHURSHED,*COMMERCIALISTS, BADAUN.

- (1) CIGAR and CHEROOTS.
- (2) CIGARETTES:—Turkish and Egyptian (by direct Importation) and others.
- (3) TOBACCOS:—All the best known British, American and Turkish.
- (4) Towels, Banyans, Stockings and Handkerchiefs Embroidered.

KHUDDAM-I-KAABA ON IT.

- (5) Cooking Stoves, Soaps, Powders, Lavenders, etc.
- (6) Stationary. (7) Fancy Articles.

-- SMOKE ONLY --

ENVER BEY CIGARETTES

Manufactured in honour of our HERO whose name is revered in every Muslim Household. Unrivalled for freshness, purity and delicacy of aroma. Fresh TURKISH TOBACCO used. Made daily at—

The Upper India Cigarette Co.,

No. 29, AMINABAD.

LUCKNOW.Wanted.

A F. A. passed Mohamedan possessing good knowledge in English and Mathematics. Thirty or forty years old. Good manners and some religious knowledge is necessary, salary Rs. 40/- (forty only) per month, with food and free lodging, to teach two boys of Matriculation Class, with future prospects on best work.

*Apply to—Mir Aslam Khan,*General Contractor,*Braid Lodge, Civil Lines,*Nagpur.*REDUCED PRICES.*To clear the debt and to save the property of a Mussalman.

* * *

STUDENTS ARE REQUESTED TO ORDER AT ONCE.

* * *

	Original Price.	Reduced Price.
	Rs. A.	Rs. A.
Quran, with English Translation, 1st quality ...	20 0	9 0
Ditto Ditto 2nd ..	10 0	4 8
Ditto Ditto 3rd ..	5 0	2 4
Selections from the Quran, 1st ..	5 0	2 0
Ditto Ditto 2nd ..	2 8	1 0
Life of Mohamed (may peace upon him) ...	1 8	0 12
Karima, with English Translation ...	1 0	0 6
Trilingual Dictionary, English-Urdu-Hindi ...	5 0	2 0
Urdu-English Dictionary ...	2 8	1 0
Ditto Ditto ...	1 4	0 8
English-Urdu Ditto ...	2 8	1 0
Persian-English-Urdu Dictionary ...	3 0	1 4
Roman-English Ditto ...	1 8	0 10
English-Roman Ditto ...	1 8	0 10

Other useful notes, &c. of Matriculation are available at Reduced Prices.

APPLY SHARP TO—O. M. CHIENE,Receiver appointed by the Court,ELGIN ROAD, ALLAHABAD.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1918, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to naughty diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive inasmuch as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANG VILAS.

THIS YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the virile power and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give a publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it so say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that man is not that which a perfume admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parcel necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kutchwar, India.

WEALTH BY THRIFT

AN EASY ROAD TO FORTUNE WITHOUT RISK.

French Thrift is Proverbial.

The French, by their thrift, have accumulated money to such an extent that they have become the Wealthiest Nation in the World. The French Middle and Working classes have long been famous for their thrift.

The methods of investing their precious savings adopted by these thrifty people are therefore of interest to others. They are never in doubt or fear, they sleep undisturbed by vision of misfortune and failure. They are never troubled with qualms of financial disasters.

The Scheme of Enormous Possibilities.

This scheme is that of purchasing Premium Bonds, which as far as safety is concerned, can be compared with our own Government Promissary Notes and Municipal and Port Debentures but which in addition, possess more than a spice of added interest by the fact that holders of such Bonds have a very good chance of receiving at some time in the shape of big premium of £ 10,000, £ 20,000, £ 40,000, besides smaller sums.

What Premium Bonds are ?

Premium Bonds are high class securities issued by various European Governments, perfectly solvent Municipalities and other public bodies as voucher or Scrip for loans contracted under Government Authorization for various public purposes. They are similar to the Promissary Notes, Municipal and Port Trust Debentures of this country. The difference between them is that while the later are issued for a certain period of years at the end of which they are repaid en bloc, the Premium Bonds system is to redeem a certain amount of stock every year until the whole loan has been paid off.

We do not deal in Lottery Tickets.

These debentures or Bond must not be confounded with Lottery Tickets. In the case of Lotteries, all the money paid for tickets is lost, except to the few who obtain a prize. In regard to Premium Bonds, there is no loss because all Bonds which do not secure a prize, are redeemed at their face value. Premium Bonds have an entirely different character from Lottery Tickets. Those who subscribe to them, those who buy them, agree to make a small sacrifice on the annual interest if the money they lend in order one day to have the opportunity of being favored by fortune and receiving in one lump sum more than they could possibly have received by the accumulation of many years of interest.

There are no Blanks.

Every Bond has an equal chance. The subscriptions of each and every Bond either with a prize or at par being as completely and perfectly assured as is humanly possible. There is no loss of Capital.

How the Premiums are Paid ?

The drawings take place at fixed and regular periods in the presence of Government Officials and the public. When a loan is issued, numbers corresponding to those printed on each Bond are placed in a large wheel made of brass with glass sides, which is then sealed up in the presence of Government Official and Committee of Bondholders.

Each number is rolled up in a small metal tube and cannot be seen before this tube is taken from the wheel.

On the day of the drawings, special officials turn the wheel round and round so that the numbers are thoroughly mixed. The seals are examined and then broken by the Government Supervisors, a slide in the wheel is opened, and a boy from an Orphan School draws out the metal tubes. The number first drawn wins the first prize, the second number wins the second prize and so on till the specified quantity of numbers has been drawn. The wheel is then sealed up again till the next drawing. This operation is repeated till every number is drawn out of the wheel. No new numbers can possibly be put in. The successful numbers are published in the Official Gazette, which we subscribe and check the numbers of our clients very carefully and advise him at once either by registered letter or telegrams, immediately any of his Bonds are drawn.

We collect and remit him the amount of all prizes and arrange to pay him of such prizes in Gold, Silver, or Bank draft as he may desire.

Interest of Negotiability.

To the Bonds, are attached coupons by which the holder can obtain payment of the interest due from time to time either through us or any bank.

The Bonds are payable to bearer and are readily saleable at the current market rates.

Easy Payment System.

With some persons it is not always convenient to invest considerable sums at one time and to provide for this contingency we have adopted a plan by which clients can purchase Premium Bonds by instalments, the payment thus being easy. This plan has been found to be of great convenience to persons wishing to buy a combination of several Bonds.

On receipt of the first instalment we forward to our clients a Contract Note stating the number of the Bonds we have sold him, and from that moment the purchaser begins to take part in all the drawings, and is entitled to any prizes which his Bonds may win; in other words, he enjoys precisely the same privileges as if he had paid the full amount of the purchase price cash down with order. On completion of payments, we forward these Original Bonds, and they then become the absolute property of the holder; they will continue to take part in all drawings without any further liability to the purchaser.

In order to control the government of the instalment business we make the following simple rules :—

1. The intervals between the dates of payment must not exceed one month, otherwise a interest on the late instalment at two pice per rupee per month will be charged.

2. Any balance of purchase money remaining unpaid at the time the Bond is drawn with a prize must be paid to us out of the amount of the prize won.

We have made these condition so easy that no one can take exception to them. On the contrary, we should make a wise investment while not wishing to deposit the entire price of the Bonds in one payment.

To every Purchaser of Bonds from us.

We render the following unique and valuable services absolutely free of charge :—

1. We carefully verify all Bonds before delivering them, and guarantee them to be in perfect order, fully paid up and free from all further expenses and liability.
2. We are always willing to lend him money on the security of his Bonds, arranging easy terms of repayment to suit his convenience.
3. We watch over his interest in every possible way, and under no circumstances do we disclose his name or business to third parties, without his consent until his Bond has not drawn for a prize, or at par.

The Premium Bond as a Provision for children.

Your money is completely under your control. You invest Rs. 100. This you may do in instalments if you will, but at any rate, having once paid Rs. 100, you have no further premiums to bother about each year. When you pay your premiums into an Assurance Society, they are in a sense lost to you. You cannot draw them again should you ever wish to do so. And if you fall on adverse circumstances and cannot keep up your payments you lose the whole amount paid to Society. In case of Premium Bonds you can sell them at any time and can help you.

Terms of Business.

Remittance can be made by Bank draft on Delhi, payable to us or self with an endorsement on the back.

By Cheque on any Bank in India payable to us.

By money-order payable to us.

By Currency Notes. 1st halves first and on receipt of the 1st halves the second halves must be sent.

By Interest Coupons, or drawn Bonds.

Two or more than two gentlemen who want to purchase Bond or Bonds in a company can do so, provided they may arrange to divide the prize amongst themselves, which may be won.

We issue regular receipts for the money which we receive for the purchase of these Bonds either direct or through Agents.

All orders which we receive in a week are sent to Europe on Thursdays, when from different governments we receive Bonds legally signed and sealed, which we send to our clients after necessary entries in our Registers.

The results of drawings, in Urdu or English will be sent to every purchaser free of any charge.

If the purchaser likes, he can sell his Bonds to another or give it to his friend or relative without any formal transfer or endorsement on the Bond, but an entry in our books is necessary to enable us to send the results.

We are always ready to lend the money on the security of Bonds and sell it at current market price.

Letters and remittances should be addressed to—

THE DELHI EXCHANGE,
Dareeba Bazar,
DELHI.

Telegrams:—Exchange, Dareeba (Delhi).

Kinds of Bonds.

Prize winning Bonds are of two kinds those which pay out interest annually as well as give chances of drawing prizes. The other kind are those which concentrate the entire amount of their interest into the magnificent prizes distributed at the drawings in which they take part.

We shall be pleased to give the details of other Bonds not mentioned here as also their prices on applications.

Congo Free State Bonds.

Final Redemption 1987 Redeemable at Rs 800 at that date.

A decree, signed in Feb. 1988, by the Sovereign of the Congo Free State, authorised the creation by that State of a national debt of Fr. 150,000,000.

The Congo Bonds do not pay any interest but are redeemable, either with prizes or at par, with an annual increase of fr. 5 per Bond by way of interest. The Drawings are held in Brussels and drawn at par Repays from 1st May 1910 & 8,8 with 4,8 extra yearly

Six Drawings Yearly.

Annual Value of Premiums £20,480.

Feb. 20th	1 Premium ...	fr. 50,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,500
	3 Premiums at fr. 750	2,250
	20 " " " " " "	8,000
pt. 20th	1 Premium ...	150,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,500
	3 Premiums at fr. 750	2,250
	20 " " " " " "	8,000
June 20th	1 Premium ...	100,000
and	1 " " " " " "	1,500
Oct. 20th	3 Premiums at fr. 750	2,250
	20 " " " " " "	8,000
Aug. 20th	1 Premium ...	20,000
and	1 " " " " " "	2,250
Dec. 19th	3 Premiums at fr. 750	2,250
	20 " " " " " "	8,000

Besides these 600 Bonds are redeemed at each drawing at Rs. 135 each.

Price Rs. 64 cash or Rs. 15 with orders and 11 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

City of Antwerp Bonds.

Final Redemption 1993 Redeemable at Rs 66.

Issued in 1903. Annual Interest 2 per cent.

This loan, amounting to Fr. 100,000,000, was voted by the City Council, March 13th, 1903, and authorised by Royal Decree, dated March 26th, 1903. The Drawings are held in public at the Town Hall, Antwerp under the supervision of Government officials.

Annual Value of Premiums $19,000.

SIX DRAWINGS ANNUALLY.

Feb. 10th	1 Premium ...	fr. 25,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
Apr. 10th	1 " " " " " "	500
Oct. 10th	2 Premiums at fr. 300	600
Aug. 10th	20 " " " " " "	4,000
	20 " " " " " "	3,000
June 10th	1 Premium ...	20,000
	1 " " " " " "	2,500
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	4,000
	20 " " " " " "	3,000
Dec. 10th	1 Premium ...	10,000
	1 " " " " " "	2,500
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	4,000
	20 " " " " " "	3,000

Price Rs. 62 cash or Rs. 15 with order and 10 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

City of Brussels Bonds.

Final Redemption 1992 Redeemable at Rs 66

Issued in 1902. Annual Interest, 2½ per cent.

A Loan of Fr. 75,000,000 (£9,000,000) voted by the City Council, May 12th, 1902, and authorised by Royal Decree, dated June 3rd, 1902. The Drawings are held in public at the Town Hall, Brussels.

Annual Value of Premiums £16,000.

SIX DRAWINGS ANNUALLY.

Feb. 15th	1 Premium ...	fr. 100,000
	1 " " " " " "	2,500
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	4,000
	20 " " " " " "	3,000
Apr. 15th	1 Premium ...	10,000
June 15th	1 " " " " " "	1,000
Oct. 15th	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
Dec. 14th	20 " " " " " "	4,000
	20 " " " " " "	3,000
Aug. 14th	1 Premium ...	200,000
	1 " " " " " "	2,500
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	5,000
	20 " " " " " "	3,000

Price Rs. 66 cash or Rs. 15 with order and 11 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

City of Brussels Bonds.

Final Redemption 1995 Redeemable at Rs. 66

Issued in 1905. Annual Interest, 2%

This loan was voted by the City Council, November 13th, and authorised by Royal Decree, dated December 13th, 1905. The Drawings are held at the Town Hall, Brussels, under the control of Government officials, and in the presence of the public.

Annual Value of Premiums £36,000.

SIX DRAWINGS ANNUALLY.

Jan. 15th	1 Premium ...	Fr. 500,000
	1 " " " " " "	2,500
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	5,000
Mar. 15th	1 Premium ...	25,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	4,000
May 15th	1 Premium ...	25,000
AND	1 " " " " " "	25,000
Sep. 15th	1 " " " " " "	1,000
Nov. 14th	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	4,000
July 15th	1 Premium ...	250,000
	1 " " " " " "	2,500
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	20 " " " " " "	5,000

Price 64 cash or Rs. 15 with order and 11 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

City of Ghent Bonds.

Final Redemption 1986 Redeemable at Rs. 60.

Issued in 1896. Annual Interest 2 per cent.

This is a Loan of Fr. 70,000,000 voted by the City Council, July 6th, 1896, and authorised by Royal Decree, dated August 13th, 1896. The Drawings, which are public, take place at the Town Hall.

Annual Value of Premiums $8,000.

FOUR DRAWINGS ANNUALLY.

Jan. 10th	1 Premium ...	fr. 10,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
Apr. 10th	1 " " " " " "	500
Oct. 10th	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	20 " " " " " "	3,000
July 10th	1 Premium ...	150,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	1 " " " " " "	500
	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	20 " " " " " "	3,000

Price Rs. 60 cash or Rs. 15 with order, and 10 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

Credit Foncier Hollandais.

Final Redemption 1980. Redeemable at Rs. 18.

Dutch Mortgage Bond 1904.

A cheapest and best non-interest bearing Bond, Yearly number of Prizes 4440.

Six drawings are held on 15th February, April, June, August, October and December.

1 prize of Fr. 250,000

1 " " " " " " 150,000

1 " " " " " " 125,000

1 " " " " " " 100,000

1 " " " " " " 75,000

1 " " " " " " 62,000

6 prizes " " " " 1,000 each

6 " " " " " " 2,500 "

30 " " " " " " 1,000 "

60 " " " " " " 500 "

240 " " " " " " 250 "

492 " " " " " " 100 "

1200 " " " " " " 75 "

2400 " " " " " " 50 "

7560 at face value, i.e. 31-25 Frano each.

Price Rs. 25 cash or Rs. 8 with order, and 10 monthly instalments of Rs. 2 each.

Croix Rouge de Serbes 1907.

Final Redemption 1981. Redeemable at Rs. 12.

A first class cheap non-interest bearing Bond. These Bonds have the advantage that, when drawn at par, they are not extinguished, but continue to take part in the drawings for prizes, and vice versa. When drawn with a prize, they continue to take part in the drawings for redemption.

THREE DRAWINGS A YEAR.

Jan. 15th	1 Premium ...	Rs. 25,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
AND	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
Sep. 14th	3 " " " " " "	200 1,000
	20 " " " " " "	50 1,000
May 14th	1 Premium ...	100,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	5 " " " " " "	200 1,000
	20 " " " " " "	50 1,000

Price Rs. 21 cash or Rs. 5 with order, and 9 monthly instalments of Rs. 2 each.

City of Ostend Bonds.

Final Redemption 1987. Redeemable at Rs. 24.

Issued in 1898. Annual Interest 2 per cent.

THREE DRAWINGS ANNUALLY.

Jan. 15th	1 Premium ...	fr. 60,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
	1 " " " " " "	500
	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	20 " " " " " "	2,500
	1 Premium ...	fr. 10,000
	1 " " " " " "	1,000
May 15th	1 " " " " " "	500
Sep. 15th	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	20 " " " " " "	2,500

Price Rs. 60 cash or Rs. 15 with order, and 10 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

City of Liege Bonds.

Final Redemption 1995 Redeemable at £4.

Issued in 1905. Annual Interest 2%

A Loan of Fr. 50,000,000 voted by the City Council, April 19th, 1905, and authorised by Royal Decree, dated May 9th, 1905. The Drawings take place in public at the Town Hall.

Annual Value of premiums £11,000

SIX DRAWINGS ANNUALLY

		Fr.
Jan. 15th	1 Premium	50,000
	1 " "	1,000
	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	2 " "	200
	5 " "	150
	14 " "	125
	14 " "	1,750
Mar. 15th	1 Premium	10,000
	1 " "	500
May 15th	1 " "	250
Sep. 14th	2 Premiums at fr. 200	400
	2 " "	150
Nov. 14th	18 " "	2,250
July 15th	1 Premium	15,000
	1 " "	1,500
	2 Premiums at fr. 500	1,000
	4 " "	250
	7 " "	150
	10 " "	125

Price Rs. 62 cash or Rs. 15 with order, and 10 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

City of Liege Bonds.

Final Redemption 1987. Redeemable £4

Issued in 1897. Annual Interest 2%

The issue of this Loan, amounting to about 84,000,000 francs, was voted by the City Council, October 11th, 1897, and duly authorised by Royal Decree, dated October 30th, 1897. The Drawings are conducted in public at the Town Hall, Liege.

Annual Value of Premiums £9,600.

FOUR DRAWINGS ANNUALLY.

		Fr.
Jan. 20th	1 Premium	10,000
	1 " "	1,000
July 20th	1 " "	500
	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	20 " "	150
Apr. 20th	1 Premium	50,000
	1 " "	1,000
	1 " "	500
	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	20 " "	150
Oct. 20th	1 Premium	150,000
	1 " "	1,000
	1 " "	500
	2 Premiums at fr. 250	500
	20 " "	150

Price Rs. 60 cash or Rs. 15 with order, and 10 monthly instalments of Rs. 5 each.

Egyptian Foncier Bonds.

Final Redemption 1953.

Issued in 1903. Annual Interest 3.

Redeemable at £10.

And guaranteed by the Credit Foncier Egyptian, one of the largest Land Mortgage Institutions in Egypt established in 1880, with a capital of fr. 80,000,000. The Drawings are held at Cairo.

Annual Value of Premiums £40,000.

A Drawing for Premiums on 15th of every month.

1 Premium	fr. 50,000
25 Premiums at fr. 1,000	25,000
April 1 Premium	100,000
Oct. 25 Premiums at 1,000	25,000

Price Rs. 100 cash or Rs. 50 with order, and 6 monthly instalments of Rs. 25 each.

Price for issue 1911, as above, and for issue 1914, Rs. 220 cash.

Hungarian Foncier Bonds 1916.

Redeemable at £12-0-0. One half only at £6-0-0.

These Bonds were issued in 1906 (after special Government authorization) by the Royal Hungarian Credit Foncier or Land Mortgage Bank, a rich and powerful institution, founded in 1863, which possesses a Capital of Forty Million Crowns, and a Reserve Fund of Thirty-two Millions Crowns. These Bonds bear no interest but take part in Six Drawings for Prizes Yearly.

Feb. 25th, April 25th, June 25th, August 25th,

October 25th, December 25th.

At which are paid away the following enormous prizes:—

1 Prize of 1,100,000 Crowns, or about £11,250
1 " 550,000 " " £20,625
1 " 330,000 " " £12,875
1 " 200,000 " " £7,500
2 " 100,000 " " £3,750 each.
3 " 15,000 " " £562
3 " 1,000 " " £153

ETC.

738 Prizes per year, amounting to 2,842,500 Crowns.

The Bonds can be obtained from us, either in whole Bonds or two-half Bonds. Two half Bonds A & B series of same or different numbers. These Bonds are not extinguished by winning a Prize, but can win several Prizes.

The Hungarian Foncier 1906 Bonds are not only among the most promising and most advantageous Bonds, and those giving the most immediate chances of an enormous Prize but they are also among the very safest and soundest. They are secured and guaranteed by loans made to the Government and the Municipalities of many cities and towns of Hungary. They rank in fact with first class municipal stocks, and are officially recognised as trustees Securities in Hungary.

PRICE of one whole or two half-Bonds same or (different Nos.) Hungarian Foncier 1906 Bonds.

Rs. 250 Cash or with order Rs. 50 and 15 monthly payments of Rs. 15 each.

Half Bond either series Es 130 cash or Rs. 30 with order, and 7 monthly instalments of Rs. 15 each.

ESTABLISHED 1907.

THE DELHI EXCHANGE,

STOCK, SHARE & EXCHANGE BROKERS,

DAREEBA BAZAR, DELHI.

FOREIGN AGENCIES:

PARIS, BRUSSELS, LONDON, NEW-YORK AND CHICAGO.

INDIAN AGENCIES:

CALCUTTA, BOMBAY, KARACHI, MADRAS, RANGOON & LAHORE.

Special Representatives in all parts of India and Principal Cities of Foreign Countries.

SALE and PURCHASE of SHARES, PROMISSORY NOTES, PORTS and MUNICIPAL DEBENTURES, CURRENCY NOTES of every Circle, Foreign Coins, etc., etc., are effected.

LOANS on Properties, Shares and Securities arranged. Drafts and Telegraphic Transfers procured. ADVICE on Investments given.

LIFE and FIRE POLICIES procured. GOODS Supplied to MUFUSSIL Clients on Commission.

HIGHEST REFERENCE GIVEN.

ORDER FORM FOR INSTALMENT SYSTEM.

To

THE DELHI EXCHANGE,
SHARE AND STOCK BROKERS.

Sirs,

Dareeba Bazar, DELHI.

I wish to buy the following:—

(State which Bonds or Combination is required.)

At the agreed price Rs. _____

and I hand you the sum of Rs. _____ by Money Order, Bank Draft or Cheque, and promise to pay the balance in _____ monthly instalments of Rs. _____ each.

This order is given on the following Conditions:—

1. That the Bonds you allotted to me shall participate in the approaching and every succeeding drawings until their numbers have been drawn for a prize or repayment at Par.
2. That I will be entitled to any prize which the Bonds allotted to me may win at the next approaching drawings or at any following drawings, subject only the deduction of balance then owing on my purchase.
3. That immediately on my having completed the payment of the entire amount the Bonds enumerated on your Contract Note shall become my property absolutely without any further liability whatever on my part and shall forwarded to me by Registered Post.

Name _____

Dated _____

Address _____

Ottoman Bonds.

Loan of 1870 (Bearing no Interest).

Redeemable finally in 1974 at not less than £9. 12s.

SIX DRAWINGS PER YEAR

February 1st, April 1st, June 1st, August 1st, October 1st, and December 1st, that is a Drawing every alternate month, at which the following Prizes are paid away:—

3 Prizes of 400,000 Francs or £16,000 each.
3 " 200,000 " £8,000 "
3 " 60,300 " £2,400 "
3 " 25,000 " £1,000 "
6 " 20,000 " £800 "
6 " 10,000 " £400 "
18 " 6,000 " £240 "
36 " 3,000 " £120 "

And many others making in all.

5,950 Prizes per year.

Every Bond takes part in every Drawing until its No. has been drawn, and will then be paid off on presentation either with one of the Prizes mentioned above or at par.

The Drawings and repayments are under the control of the European Council of Administration (in which the British Bondholders are represented by an English official), and are not in the hands of the Sultan or of his ministers.

The Prizes are paid in full, without any deduction. Bonds drawn at par are paid off at 240 francs (£9. 12s. each).

These Bonds are guaranteed by the Turkish Railways Revenue.

THERE ARE NO BLANKS, THE PREMIUMS ARE PRINCIPALLY AND WE CONSIDER THESE BONDS A SAFE AND ATTRACTIVE SPECULATION.

Price of Ottoman Bonds. Rs. 150 each for cash or Rs. 50 with order, and 11 monthly instalments of Rs. 10 each.

Panama Canal Bonds.

Fully guaranteed by a deposit of French Government Securities.

Repaid at par £16.

SIX DRAWINGS PER YEAR.

February 15th, April 15th, June 15th, August 15th, October 15th, and December 15th, at which the following Prizes are every year paid away in cash:—

3 Prizes of 500,000 Francs, or £20,000 each.
3 " 250,000 " £10,000 "
6 " 100,000 " £4,000 "
12 " 10,000 " £400 "
12 " 5,000 " £200 "
30 " 2,000 " £80 "
300 " 2,000 " £40 "

Altogether 366 Prizes each drawing yearly, amounting to 3,390,000 francs, equal to £135,600. The minimum amount at which these Bonds can be repaid is 400 francs, or about £16.

Panama Premium Bonds were originally issued to raise money for the construction of the Panama Canal, but have never in any way depended upon the Canal itself. The payment of Prizes and the repayment of non-prize-winning Bonds at par, or £16, have always been, and WILL ALWAYS CONTINUE TO BE fully guaranteed by a deposit of French Consols in a French Government Bank. Under the Special Act of June 8, 1888, Trustees are appointed who manage this guarantee fund under strict control on behalf of the bondholders, redeeming the Bonds as and when they are drawn, either with Prizes or only with £16. The repayment of these Bonds being assured under Government control and supervision by an absolutely inalienable Guarantee Fund, it is obvious that Panama Premium Bonds are no more dependent upon or connected with the Panama Canal as an enterprise than they are with Suez Canal.

Price Rs. 105 cash or Rs. 25 with order, and 9 monthly instalments of Rs. 10 each.

Year of Issue	Interest P.A.	Yearly Drawings	No. of Prizes	Cash price Rs.
CITY OF PARIS BONDS.
1871	3	4	352	75
1875	1	4	136	330
1876	1	4	52	330
1892	2½	4	136	65
1894-96	2½	4	84	62
1898	2	1	200	75
1899	2	1	132	70
1904	2½	1	50	63
1905	2½	2	100	62
1912	3	12	504	180

FRENCH CREDIT FONCIERS.
1879	3	6	600	330
1885	2-60	6	318	62
1895	2-80	1	224	260
1903	3	4	560	300
1909	3	12	864	180

FRENCH CREDIT FONCIERS COMMUNALES.
1879	2-60	6	318	75
1880	3	6	318	320
1892	2-60	4	152	260
1899	2-60	6	210	260
1906	3	6	660	300
1912	3	12	1368	180

Prices instalment systems on application.

MULTIPLY YOUR OPPORTUNITIES.

Our advantageous Combinations.

In buying Premium Bonds you are naturally anxious to win Prizes, and of course expect to win with them as quickly as possible and so often as possible. One single Bond would afford you many 'excellent' opportunities of winning Premiums, but it is quite evident that the more Bonds you hold and the more immediate drawings you are interested in, the greater will be your chances of a speedy and profitable return.

Our well-known combinations of judiciously chosen high class Premium Bonds are a great advance upon anything of the same kind ever brought before the public. Clients can make their own combinations if they wish. Prices quoted on application.

Combination No. 1.

Consisting 3 Bonds.

- 1 City of Brussels 1905.
- 1 Credit Foncier Hollandais, 1904.
- 1 Servian Red Cross, 1907.

Participating in 15 drawings each year. Affords the holder 1684 chances to win a prize of Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 100.

Price Rs. 105 cash
or Rs. 25 with order and 9 monthly instalments of Rs. 10 each.

Combination No. 2.

Consisting 4 Bonds.

- 1 City of Brussels 1902.
- 1 City of Antwerp 1903.
- 1 City of Liege 1905.
- 1 Credit Foncier Hollandais, 1904.

Participating in 24 drawings each year. Affords the holder 5135 chances to win a prize of Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 100.

Price Rs. 200 cash

or Rs. 35 with order and 29 monthly instalments of Rs. 10 each.

Combination No. 3.

Consisting 6 following Bonds.

- 1 City of Antwerp 1903.
- 1 Congo Free State 1896.
- 1 Credit Foncier Hollandais.
- 1 Servian Red Cross.
- 1 Panama.
- 1 City of Ghent 1896.

Participating in 31 drawings each year. Affords the holder 5326 chances to win a prize of Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 100.

Price Rs. 320 cash

or Rs. 50 with order and 30 monthly instalments of Rs. 10 each.

Combination No. 4.

Consisting following 4 Bonds.

- 1 Panama.
- 1 Congo.
- 1 Ottoman.
- 1 Credit Foncier Hollandais.

Participating in 24 drawings yearly. Affords the holder 8750 chances to win a prize of Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 100.

Price Rs. 320 cash

or Rs. 50 with order and 30 monthly instalments of Rs. 10 each.

Combination No. 5.

Consisting the following 9 Bonds.

- 1 Panama.
- 1 City of Paris 1892.
- 1 City of Paris 1899.
- 2 City of Brussels 1905.
- 2 City of Liege 1905.
- 2 Congo Free State.

Participating in 32 drawings each year.

Affords the holder 4068 chances to win a prize Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 150.

Price Rs. 580 cash
or Rs. 50 with order and 23 monthly instalments of Rs. 25 each.

Combination No. 6.

Consisting the following 11 Bonds.

- 2 Panama
- 1 City of Liege 1897
- 1 Hung. Foncier 1906
- 1 City of Paris
- 2 Congo Free State.
- 1 City of Antwerp 1887
- 1 Servian Red Cross.
- 1 Ottoman.
- 1 City of Brussels 1902.

Participating in 47 drawings each year. Affords the holder 1998 chances to win a prize of Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 150.

Price Rs. 825 cash

or Rs. 100 with order and 16 monthly instalments of Rs. 50 each.

Combination No. 7.

Consisting the following 8 Bonds

- 1 Panama
- 1 City of Brussels 1905.
- 1 City of Brussels 1902.
- 1 Servian Red Cross
- 1 City of Antwerp 1903.
- 1 City of Ghent 1896.
- 1 Hungarian Foncier 1906.
- 1 Credit Foncier Hollandais.

Participating in 41 drawings each year. Affords the holder 6869 chances to win a prize Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 150.

Price Rs. 450 cash

or Rs. 50 with order and 18 monthly instalments of Rs. 25 each.

Combination No. 8.

Consisting the following 19 Bonds.

- 1 Hungarian Foncier 1906.
- 1 City of Paris 1912
- 1 City of Ghent.
- 1 City of Brussels 1905.
- 1 City of Antwerp 1887.
- 1 City of Liege 1905.
- 1 Panama.
- 1 Congo Free State
- 1 Servian Red Cross.
- 1 City of Paris 1910.
- 1 Communal 1906.
- 1 City of Ostent.
- 1 City of Brussels 1902.
- 1 City of Antwerp 1903.
- 1 City of Liege 1897.
- 1 Ottoman.
- 1 Credit Foncier Hollandais.
- 1 Bevilacqua masa.
- 1 City of Madrid.

Participating in 110 drawing each year and affords the holder 9705 chances to win a prize Fr. 500,000 to Fr. 100.

Price Rs. 1450 cash

or Rs. 350 with order and 25 monthly instalments of Rs. 50 each.

REAL SILVER STUDS & LINKS.

FOR GENTS & LADIES SHIRTS

VARIOUS DESIGNS

AND SHAPES.

Plain, Plain Engraved, Dumb-bells, Racket and Ball, Lock and Key, Square and Torpedo, etc. etc.,

Price Rs. 1-12 per set

Gold gilded Rs. 2

Heavy plated Rs. 2-8

Post Free.

Silver Rings, Nannagas, Cups, and other Jewellery gilded and plain. Watch chains, Button chains, etc., etc.

For prices apply to—

THE DELHI EXCHANGE,

Brokers,

Darceba Bazar, DELHI.

ORDER FORM FOR CASH PURCHASE.

To

THE DELHI EXCHANGE,

SHARE & STOCK BROKERS,

Darceba Bazar, DELHI.

SIR,

Please forward to me:—

(State which Bond or Combination is required.)

IN FULL PAYMENT for which I/we hand you the sum of Rs.

in Draft on Delhi, Cheque, Money Order. Please forward me the Bonds Per Registered Letter as soon as possible.

The order is given on the following Conditions:—

1. That the Bonds you forward ^{me}_{us} shall participate in the approaching as well as in every following drawing, until they are drawn for repayment with a prize, or at par.
2. That you undertake to collect and remit me the interest ^{me}_{us} and watch the drawings on ^{my}_{our} behalf, without any charge.
3. That you undertake to remit me all prizes I may win, after deducting the necessary exchange charges, etc., etc., in Gold, Silver or Currency Notes.

Name

Address

Dated

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER RECEIVED FROM THE
BOMBAY MUNICIPALITY PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

ESANOFELE and MALARIA.

"Treatment with ESANOFELE controlled with quinine in most cases was recently given a fair trial. The majority of the cases belonged to the Parel Hindu Ophthalmic, where MALARIA OF A PARTICULARLY SEVERE TYPE raged this year. 43 cases of Malaria were treated of which FIVE WERE CHRONIC, with considerable enlargement of spleen and General Malaria Cachexia." Result :

REDUCTION IN THE SIZE OF THE SPLEEN	+	+
DISAPPEARANCE OF PARASITES	+	+
INCREASE IN THE HAEMOGLOBIN VALUE	+	+
GENERAL CONDITION OF PATIENTS VERY SATISFACTORY.

Writing on the result of chronic cases the report state : — "Quinine would not have worked equally well in these cases and one is especially emboldened to give this opinion from the case of a Sakharan Jivaji, who was a chronic sufferer and ALWAYS TOOK QUININE OR QUININE AND ARSENIC MIXTURES WITHOUT MUCH BENEFIT.

"On the whole, ESANOFELE appears to have VERY GOOD EFFECT ON CHRONIC CASES.

ESANOFELE is obtainable from all Chemists and Dealers throughout BRITISH INDIA, BURMA AND CEYLON.

General Agents:—

Messrs. B. G. GORIO & Co.,
3, Wallace Street, BOMBAY.

FOR INFANTS
"ESANOFELINA."
AFTER MALARIA.
FERRO CHINA WINE.

MANUFACTURERS:—

FELICE BISLERI & Co., MILAN, ITALY.

WANTED.

A trained B. Sc., salary Rs. 70 rising to 100 per mensem, and a trained B.A. with Mathematical qualifications, pay Rs. 50 rising to 80 per mensem. Experienced men those who have special qualifications in Mathematics may also apply.

The Manager,
FAIZ-I-AM HIGH SCHOOL,
Meerut.

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper, Zink Plate and Stone Engraver. Monogramist. Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

Don't shout but ring.
The Standard Electric
Bell sets, mounted on polished stand. 20 yds.
wire and 6 months
battery ... Rs. 7-8
5 yds. 1 year Rs. 11-0
Clarion Bell Set Rs. 5-0
EAST-WEST CO.
Chandni Chouk,
DELHI.

EVERY KIND OF
PRINTING DONE
IN THE "COMRADE"
PRESS, DELHI.

For Stationery write to—

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

هماري هندوستانی بہنوں کو خوشخبری

اتالیقی نسوان — خواتین و بیگمات ہند کیلئے دریا در توزہ می۔
جملہ علوم و فنون حساب، کماتا بکاتا، سینا بروفا، زمانہ خط و کتابت،
مصوری، کپڑوں کی رنگائی، چپائی، گوٹہ کناری، ٹرٹ، چکن دوزی،
علم طبابت، انتظام خانہ داری وغیرہ کو نہایت قابلیت کی ساتھ دس حصوں
پر ختم کیا گیا ہے۔ اسکو پڑھ کر ہماری ہندوستانی بہنیں نہایت اعلیٰ قابلیت
حاصل کر سکتی ہیں۔ قیمت پانچ روپیہ علاوہ محمول ڈاک۔ مانی کا پتہ
املا میہ بک ڈپو و جنرل اخبار ایجنسی۔ بلہارن دارالسلطنت دہلی

DO YOU WANT

TO EARN ANOTHER

Rs. 3 A DAY?

Reliable persons can add another Rs. 3 a day to their present income by making hosiery on the celebrated "Durbar Auto-Knitter" at home. Previous experience not necessary. Distance no drawback. Work simple.

Our Proposition Briefly Explained.

Purchase one or more Auto-Knitters from us, accord to the number of members in your household who are ambitious to increase their earnings, and we guarantee thereafter to purchase work turned out by you with yarn supplied by us. Our profits do not come through the sale of the machines, but through the success of the operators.

Remittances are forwarded the very day that the finished work is received. The markets of the world are clamouring for hosiery made on the "Durbar Auto-Knitter." We are unable to keep pace with the ever-growing demand. We want more earnest workers—we want you. Write us now for full particulars.

Genz, Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS,

Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay Street, Chowringhee Road, CALCUTTA.

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FULL DETAILS.

FILL IT IN, DETACH ALONG DOTTED LINES, AND SEND TO--DAY.

GENTLEMEN,

I wish to take advantage of your offer. Please send me immediately full particulars, whereby I can earn Rs. 3 a day. Enclosed please find Anna Stamp to help to pay postages.

Name

Address

GENZ, WHEELER & CO., Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay St., Chowringhee Rd., CALCUTTA.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share.
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 7.
No. 3.

Single Copy
Annas 4.

Delhi: Saturday, January 17, 1914.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page		Page
WEEK	... 41	LEADING ARTICLES—
THE SOUTH AFRICAN CRISIS	... 42	The Press Act—1	... 50
IMPERIAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL—		The Indian Moslem's Tasks - 111	... 52
The New Educational Policy...	43	THE INDIAN PERIL—
Resolutions on the Press Act ...	45	The Danger in India	... 56
OUR LONDON LETTER	... 47	India and South Africa	... 56
TETE A TETE--		'The Indian Peril'	... 57
The Confiscation of the "Zamindar" Press	.. 48	The Indian Problem	... 58
'The Indian Peril'	... 49	The Mohammedan Danger	... 58
The London Islamic Society	.. 49	CORRESPONDENCE
Shall I be a Mason ?	... 49	The London Islamic Society's Appeal	... 60
Saved!	... 50	ADVERTISEMENTS	61—64

The Week.

Turkey.

Constantinople, Jan. 7.

The first fruits of the changes in the military administration are already apparent. Two hundred and eighty Generals and Colonels, including Hadi Pasha, Chief of the General Staff have retired. Zia Pasha, Assistant Chief of the General Staff has been appointed Commander of the Tenth Army Corps. It is stated that he will be succeeded by a German officer. Other fundamental changes in the General Staff are impending.

Constantinople, Jan. 12.

Important modifications have been made in the powers of General Liman von Sanders. He now becomes Inspector-General of the Army instead of Commander of the First Army Corps, which will be commanded by a Turkish General, with a German officer as assistant. This is regarded as a concession to Russian susceptibilities. The newspapers state that General Bronsart von Schellendorf has been appointed Assistant Chief of the General Staff.

Constantinople, Jan. 12.

Djavid Bey has left Paris in order to renew loan negotiations. He will afterwards proceed to Berlin to continue negotiations with regard to the Bagdad Railway.

Constantinople, Jan. 15.

General Liman von Sanders, having been raised to rank of General of Cavalry in the German army, his appointment as Turkish Field Marshal has been submitted to the Sultan. The newspapers announce that Mahmund Mukhtar Pasha, who was reported to have been recalled, will remain Ambassador in Berlin. This is not improbable, Germany having made friendly representation in his favour.

Albania.

Vienna, Jan. 7.

Martial law was declared in Valona late last night.

Rome, Jan. 7.

The unexpected news that martial law had been proclaimed at Valona is now explained. A vessel with 200 Turkish troops including six officers arrived last evening at Valona from Constantinople. It was intended to land at night and proclaim Izzet Pasha the former Minister of War in Turkey, King of Albania with a provisional government. With the assistance of the Dutch gendarmery officers proceeded to arrest the Turkish soldiers. It is known that Izzet Pasha has left Constantinople, but whether he is on board the ship which brought the expedition has not been ascertained.

Valona, Jan. 12.

A court-martial has begun under the presidency of Commander Weer, Commander of the Gendarmery of Bekir Aga. Six Turkish officers and five band leaders who were arrested here are accused of being ring-leaders in an attempted Coup d'etat. A number of implicated civilians will also be court-martialled. In fighting near El Basan between the troops of the Pretender, Essad Pasha, and the gendarmery, the former were defeated.

London, Jan. 12.

The Captain of the Steamer which conveyed the expedition of Turkish soldiers first to Valona and then to Trieste states that the commander of the Austrian cruiser Panther boarded him at Valona for examination of his papers and proved that 370 third class passengers whom he had shipped at Constantinople believing them to be time expired Albanian soldiers are really revolutionary irregulars. The majority were arrested and taken ashore with a large number of revolvers and hand grenades. The rest were conveyed to Trieste.

Few details have been received regarding the attempted coup de main at Valona. Apparently, however, no conflict occurred, the captain of the steamer agreeing at the instance of the local authorities to land no one, but take all concerned on to Trieste. Izzet Pasha positively disclaims any connexion with the affair.

Trieste: Turkish officers and troops who were not allowed to land at Valona have arrived here. They are being kept in quarantine under a guard of Austrian marines preparatory to being sent back to Turkey.

London, Jan. 15.

The settlement of the Albanian question seems to be remote. The Prince of Wied refuses to act until a loan of three millions sterling is raised under European guarantee. Meanwhile the Government of the country remains in a tolerably chaotic state.

Aegean Problem.

Berlin, Jan. 8.

It is understood that the Triple Alliance has agreed to the British proposal that Greece shall retain Chios and Mitylene.

London, Jan. 9.

The delay of the Triple Alliance to answer Sir Edward Grey's note regarding the Aegean Islands is due to some hitch at the last moment owing to seemingly certain reservations about giving Greece,

Lemon and Samothrace, besides Chios and Mitylene. Meanwhile, Turkey vehemently refuses to agree to the cession of Chios and Mitylene. Moreover it is doubtful whether the Greek evacuation of Southern Albania will be effected tranquilly.

Constantinople, Jan. 11.

It is understood that the Triple Alliance will reply to the British proposal with reference to the Archipelago when the Greeks have withdrawn from Southern Albania.

A satisfactory settlement is expected in a few days.

London, Jan. 11.

M. Venizelos has left Rome for Paris. It is understood that his mission to Rome has not changed the policy of Italy, but it will have the effect of postponing further the Greek evacuation of Albania.

London, Jan. 15.

Reuter learns that the reply of the Triple Alliance to Sir Edward Grey's note regarding the Aegean Islands was delivered yesterday. The Alliance generally accepts all the British proposals, including the reservations safeguarding the liberties of minorities, whether Greek or Moslem.

The general effect of the reply of the Triple Alliance to Sir Edward Grey's Note is to consent to Greek annexation of Chios, Lemnos and Samothrace, while Imbros and Tenedos remain Turkish. The replies, although practically identical, were presented separately with the purpose of emphasising the fact that the Powers concerned recognise that the ultimate solution of difficulties rests with Europe, not with one or the other group of powers.

Persian Railways.

Teheran, Jan. 6.

The Julfa-Tabriz Railway has reached Durabiz, thirteen miles South of Julfa. There remains about eighty miles to be reconstructed. The Russians say it will be completed by the spring of 1915. There has been no withdrawal of Russian troops from Kazvin yet.

Teheran, Jan. 6.

The survey party in connection with the Khoramabad Railway is obliged to remain for the present at Dizful owing to the activity of brigands along the route.

The party engaged in surveying in connection with the Khoramabad Railway, consists of four British engineers and one Belgian representing the Persian Government, with two assistants. The Persian Railway syndicate is communicating with the Foreign Office. It is believed that matters will be settled with the tribes and that the survey will be completed this winter.

Aga Khan and the Indian Moslems.

London Jan. 14.

An article by the Aga Khan on the Indian Moslem outlook is given the place of honour in the Edinburgh Review to be published to-morrow.

The article says that for upwards of two years they, in common with their co-religionists elsewhere, have undergone the most painful experiences, chiefly on account of international events. The resulting restlessness among them has led to much searching of heart among their best friends, while in some quarters, exaggerated ideas have been entertained regarding the effect of the events upon their hitherto hearty loyalty to the British Crown. The Aga Khan gives an instance of an article by a correspondent in India in the Times of October 7th, and dissects his lurid caricature of the Moslem attitude. He denies there has been any pan-Islamic agitation in the political sense. The Hindus, continues the Aga Khan, have no sentimental interests outside India apart from those provided by emigration of their co-religionists, but all sections of the Moslem world were moved by the deep sentiment originally called into being by the summons to the Islamic brotherhood wedded through centuries into a lasting bond of common faith, literature and outlook on history. After urging that Britain, in her own interests, should be the friend and supporter of the Porte, since the partition of her Asiatic provinces must be disadvantageous to Britain in any conceivable scheme of distribution, the article says that the Moslems were reassured to know that such considerations were duly recognised by the just and wise statesman, the present Viceroy, whose remarks on Persia on September 17th were also gratifying to them. Critics have also been perturbed by the appearance of a new type of Indian Moslem who, apart from Islamic religious and sentiment, has gone through exactly the same education and training as the young Hindu of the same social class. The men brought up under this new system are coming to the front. They have influenced the increasing approximation of political views and sentiments among the educated men of the different communities. This unity and measure of growth of Indian nationhood is part of the wise statesmanship of the British and of the Indians to seek, not so much to satisfy Mussulmans as Mussulmans or Hindus as Hindus, but to win the hearty co-operation of all moderate, loyal and reasonable opinion wherever it exists, thus forming a most effective instrument in the discomfiture and importance of the small but active Indian element permanently hostile to the Government of India. Moslems, while co-operating with the Hindus on a vast number of public questions, have their special needs and outlook, but the crisis in the affairs of the League has confirmed the Aga Khan's conviction that the time has come to realise that the future depends not upon particular leaders but upon the people themselves. The Aga Khan emphasises the importance of the reconstruction of the London League on the basis achieved since the article was written. After surveying the directions in which legitimate discontent should be alleviated, such as the treatment of Indians in self-governing Dominions, promotion of economic development, and the giving of due weight in local as well as in larger issues to public opinion, the Aga Khan says that he looks to the future with hope and confidence, because he is convinced that British statesmanship will continue to respond to the growth of national consciousness in India, thus bringing the awakened people into closer sympathy and co-operation with the aims and ideals of the enlightened rule that has revolutionised the conditions and ideals of Indian life in living memory.

The South African Crisis.

London, Jan. 4.

Durban : Interviewed by Reuter with regard to the correspondence which has been exchanged between Senator Campbell, the well-known sugar planter and Mr. Gandhi, the latter said that he had appealed to Mr. Campbell to continue his co-operation and sympathy. Mr. Campbell, in reply, stated that he adhered to his opinion that the three-pound tax should be repealed and still supported Indians seeking redress from harsh administration and the licensing laws but that nevertheless he appealed to Mr. Gandhi to desist from lawlessness and not to refuse to accept the Commission composed of men with judicial minds and of known integrity. Mr. Gandhi replied that the strike and the subsequent courting of imprisonment were protests against Government's breach of promise to Mr. Gokhale and the three-pound tax, not against the general treatment of indentured Indians. He feared a recurrence of former measures if Government rejected the Indians' prayers. Finally, Mr. Campbell answered that he was glad that the strike was not intended as a protest against indentured Indians because allegations of ill treatment appeared to be the main plank of Mr. Gandhi's supporters.

Durban, Jan. 5.

The Rev. F. C. Andrews and the Rev. W. Pearson, who have come to South Africa to examine the Indian question, addressed a meeting of Indians at Sydenham to-day describing the deep feeling on behalf of South African Indians of all communities in India. The Rev. Mr. Andrews recited a poem in Sanskrit given to him by Mr. Rabindranath Tagore as a message to South African Indians.

Pretoria, Jan. 10.

Mr. Gandhi, interviewed, said, he would not embarrass the Government by resuming passive resistance while the strike was in progress.

Durban, Jan. 10.

The police employed at the time of the recent Indian disturbances are entraining for the Transvaal.

Delhi Jan. 10.

Mr. Gokhale has received the following cablegram from the Rev. Mr. Andrews dated Pretoria 8th instant :—"Mr. Gandhi has announced that while the Railway strike continues he personally will advise the Indian community to suspend passive resistance, so as not to confuse issues or embarrass the Government." Mr. Gokhale has received the following cablegrams from Mr. Polak, dated Durban 8th instant :—"In the case brought by Mr. West against Mr. Todd, Manager of Phoenix Wattles Co., for threatening to thrash him on account of Mr. West's interference in the case of an Indian strike alleged to have died from flogging," Mr. Todd has been bound over to keep the peace for six months and has been ordered to pay costs.

Pietermaritzburg, Jan. 11.

A section of the local Indians consider that the time is ripe for a renewal of passive resistance in conjunction with the strike, in spite of Mr. Gandhi's advice.

Imperial Legislative Council.

The New Educational Policy.

The Hon'ble Surendranath Banerjee moved the following Resolution on the 6th January :—

"That this Council recommends to the Governor-General in Council the publication of (A) all official papers in the possession of the Government of India including correspondence if any with the Senate of the Calcutta University and His Excellency the Rector relating to the affiliation of the Ananda Mohan College up to the B.A. Standard and the orders of the Government thereon together with the replies if any to the representations of local public bodies and meetings (B) all official papers in the possession of the Government of India including correspondence if any with the provincial Governments and Local Administrations leading to the announcement made in para 25 of the Government of India resolution dated Delhi 21st February, 1913, regarding the desirability of introducing the school final examination in the provinces where it has not been introduced and in para 47 of placing the recognition of schools for the purposes of presenting candidates for Matriculation in the hands of the Local Governments and all subsequent correspondence relating thereto."

MR. BANERJEE'S RESOLUTION.

In moving the Resolution that stood in his name, Mr. Banerjee said that the Resolution was an appeal to Government to take the public into confidence regarding certain educational measures and proposals which had given rise to controversy and caused widespread alarm in Bengal. If there was one Department of Government more than another in regard to which there could be no secret and in which the co-operation of the people was essential for its success it was the Department of Education. This view was supported even by Lord Curzon, the author of the Official Secrets Act. The Resolution was brought forward to clear a misapprehension that might exist and secure a complete understanding between the representatives of the people and the Government regarding the vital issues affecting the education of the people, raised in the Government Resolution of February 21st, 1913, and asking for the publication of official papers relating to the application of the Ananda Mohan College up to the B. A. Standard.

ANANDA MOHAN COLLEGE.

Mr. Banerjee narrated the history of the Institution, which was named after one of the foremost men of India, the late Ananda Mohan Bce. He said the Ananda Mohan College was the only second-grade College teaching up to the Intermediate Standard in a district with an area of 6,382 square miles and a population of 4,562,422. In 1911, after the passing of the Universities' Act and the new Regulations, which imposed a heavy financial strain on the College, its very existence was threatened; but in the year 1909, with the help and support of Mr. Blackwood, who was then District Magistrate of Mymensingh, a sum of Rs. 1,23,000 was raised, which gave a great impetus to the College and for which the people were deeply grateful to Mr. Blackwood. In the year 1913 an application was made for the affiliation of the College up to the B. A. Standard, which was strongly supported by the Commissioner of the Division and the District Magistrate. The enthusiasm in the District was so great that about one hundred leading men executed a legal document by which they agreed to pay fifty thousand rupees, thirty-five thousand of which had been already subscribed and thirteen thousands collected. The Government was moved and agreed to contribute Rs. 55,000 and raise the annual grant from six to eleven thousand rupees. The University Inspectors, who were deputed to visit the College, reported in favour of affiliation up to the B.A. standard in certain subjects. The Syndicate recommended the affiliation, which was, however, disallowed by the Government of India on the ground that the building was old and that the staff had not been appointed. Mr. Banerjee said there had been instances where the necessary conditions had not been fulfilled, where the University had declined to recommend, but where the Government of India had granted affiliation. He gave the instance of the Rajshahi College, which was affiliated up to the B.A. in Physics in 1903, although the building and laboratory were not ready. The same case also happened with regard to the Sylhet College, whose affiliation the University declined to recommend but which was granted by the Government of India in view of the fact that the building would be proceeded with. He thought that no objection was raised regarding the affiliation of these two Colleges because they were Government Colleges; but Mr. Banerjee claimed that private Colleges, having regard to their limited resources, deserved more sympathetic treatment at the hands of the Government. This view was strongly pressed by the Education Commission of 1882.

SCHOOL FINAL EXAMINATION.

Mr. Banerjee next referred to the question of the School Final Examination and hoped that Government would do nothing to disturb the present arrangement. By the School Final system a bias was contracted by the local Educational officers against private schools; and it was their views that in many cases guided the decision of the authorities. The system also disclosed the great danger to private institutions involved in the transfer of the power of recognition from the Senate to Government. The School Final was prevalent in Madras where it had reduced the number of candidates. It would never suit Bengal which had its own peculiar local conditions and where it was tried in the Middle English and Middle Vernacular schools and found wanting. If the system was introduced it would restrict higher education.

RECOGNITION OF SCHOOLS.

Mr. Banerjee finally touched upon the suggestion of placing the recognition of schools for the purposes of presenting candidates for Matriculation in the hand of local Governments. He said this suggestion of Government had been received with alarm and anxiety by the people of Bengal, who expressed their unqualified disapproval of the scheme in a public meeting held in the Town Hall in Calcutta at the end of July last. What was the justification for the proposal? Did the Senate of the Calcutta University ask to be relieved or was the work very inefficiently done? He understood that the Bengal Government with the concurrence of the Government of India consulted the Calcutta University who had urged weighty reasons against the proposal. The University did not want to be relieved nor had their work been inefficiently done in proof of which Mr. Banerjee quoted from the Bengal Administration Report. Regarding the Government plea of freeing the University for exercising more efficient control over schools and colleges Mr. Banerjee thought they had too much of it and Lord Morley was right when he said this plea of efficiency was carried too far in the government of this country. Referring to the right of the man who pays the piper to call for the tune, Mr. Banerjee said in Bengal there were about six hundred High Schools recognised by the University. Eighty of these were Government schools, about two hundred and sixty received Government aid and the balance entirely lived on private resources and to them the formula of piper and tune did not apply. Finally he said there was not only no justification for the proposed change but there were strong reasons to show that if it was introduced in Bengal it would be attended with serious risks. In conclusion he strongly appealed to Government. He was not without hope that the proposal for the transfer of the right of recognition of schools from the Senate would not be extended to Bengal. The resolution of the Government admitted that each Province had its own educational system. It had grown up under local conditions and formed a part of the general well-being. The people of Bengal loved their local conditions, in the shaping of which the Government had a supreme hand.

Before Mr. Banerjee concluded His Excellency pointed out that Mr. Banerjee had already exceeded forty minutes and asked him to resume his seat.

Mr. Banerjee concluding, made an eloquent appeal for the publication of papers and not to disturb present conditions.

Malik Tiwana, who followed Mr. Banerjee, pointed out that as a matter of general principle he was opposed to the publication of confidential papers.

The Maharaja of Cossimbazar supported the proposal and urged the publication of all the papers.

Rai Sita Nath Roy Bahadur, in supporting, dwelt on the excellent work done by the Calcutta University and appealed to the Government not to curtail any of its powers. The new idea would prove costly without any corresponding advantage.

Mr. V. R. Pandit was not against the School Final Examination but thought the present method of recognition of the Schools was the best. He pointed out that the University was in the best position to judge, not the local Government. Moreover, the proposed change would progress the development of Secondary Education. Concluding, he submitted that the change would not be welcome and asked for the publication of papers.

Pandit M. M. Malaviya, speaking on the second part of the resolution, said it was true that there was a divergence of opinion regarding the School Final Examination. In Madras, Bombay and the United Provinces it was coming more and more into favour. It was possible that in time opposition in Bengal would wear out but the publication of papers would be greatly welcome as it would throw a new light on the question. There was a strong feeling in all parts of India that the power at present enjoyed by the Universities should not be curtailed.

SIR H. BUTLER'S SPEECH.

The following is the full text of the Hon'ble Sir Harcourt Butler's speech at the Imperial Legislative Council on Tuesday in connection with the Hon'ble Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee's Resolution relating to the educational policy of the Government of India :—

"Although the words of the hon'ble mover were rather strong and fulminant I gladly recognise the moderate tone of his speech and his desire to help. I hope that our educational debates will always be conducted in this spirit. The points on which we agree are many and the points we differ on are few. I think, indeed, that the hon'ble mover is unnecessarily alarmed but I think his alarm is due to a misunderstanding which I hope to be able to remove. I may say at once that the Government desire wholeheartedly to take the people into their confidence. They have no secrets in education and I think that the action of the Government of India since the new department was formed and since His Excellency assumed the office of Viceroy have been consonant with this attitude. There is no intention whatever to substitute a policy of mistrust for a policy of trust and I think I am voicing the opinion and the feeling of you all when I say that it is inconceivable to associate a policy of mistrust with the vicerealty of Lord Hardinge. While there is no desire for any sort of concealment we have to observe the rules and customs of business which have grown up after long experience in the conduct of public affairs, and one of the first principles is this that those who correspond with the Government must feel that they can correspond freely and frankly without fear of the publication of their views except in special cases when the public interest clearly requires it. Many of you are business men and you know that you could not carry on your business for a day if you had not confidence that our correspondence would be respected. In the present instance the correspondence is not yet complete and matters are still under discussion but I hope to be able to tell you enough to satisfy you as to the action of the Government.

FIRST PART OF THE RESOLUTION

"I now turn to the terms of the resolution. As already explained it would be unusual to publish the correspondence between the Government of India, the University and others in regard to the affiliation of the Ananda Mohan College, the facts, however, can be stated in a nut-shell. In a letter dated March 9th, 1913 the Syndicate recommended the raising of the college to the status of a first grade institution, stating that it was in the contemplation of the governing body of the college to entertain the services of an additional professor in every one of the subjects proposed to be taught. From the papers it was apparent that the professors had not been appointed and that certain improvements in accommodation, which had evidently been thought necessary in the first instance, as the Local Government was prepared to give a grant of Rs 55,000 towards them, provided that a sum of Rs. 50,000 was collected by private subscription, had not been carried out. From the minutes of the Syndicate it appears that Hon. the Vice-Chancellor had stated that the question of class accommodation was the weak point about the College but that he had no doubt that whatever sum the local authorities might be able to raise would be spent in extending the class accommodation. He added that the consideration which weighed with him was the congested state of the Calcutta Colleges and that if a properly equipped Mofussil College could take in even 40 to 60 students, that would be a point gained. This letter was received by the Government of India at the end of May and on the 17th of June they sent their reply to the effect that the application had reached them just before the commencement of the academical year, that the present staff and accommodation were admittedly insufficient for the affiliation sought, and that the Government grants, which had been promised, were conditional upon the grant of this affiliation and upon the raising of Rs. 50,000 from local subscriptions. The Government of India were unable to sanction increased affiliation on the basis of unperformed promises, but they expressly stated that when improvements had been carried out they would reconsider the case. The Hon. Mr. Ghuznavi, who was interested in the case, wrote to me on the 19th of July that it had been decided not to press for affiliation and since then the Government of India have received no further information in the matter. They will gladly reconsider the matter if improvements have been effected and in view of the enthusiasm with which the Hon'ble member tells us the district is ablaze, I hope that the necessary condition will be fulfilled, in which case, I think, I may claim the action of the Government of India will have been stimulating to the cause of education. The Hon'ble Member charges the Government with according differential treatment to Government Colleges and to private institutions but he has to go back to 1909 for an instance to support his case. I may mention that in 1909 the present Department of Education had not been constituted nor had His Excellency assumed his office. I have therefore no first-hand knowledge of the cause in point, but I have been able to ascertain the facts and I think the Hon'ble Mover would do well to verify his statements before he makes them. I will quote the orders of the Government of India in regard to the affiliation of the Rajshahi College "With regard, however to the question of affiliation up to the B. A. examination, I am to offer the following observations on the proposals of the University for the restriction of the affiliation. In the case of philosophy the Government of India understand that since the date of the Senate's recommendation the college has complied with the requirements of the University by appointing a second professor to teach this subject, and they do not consider it desirable therefore to order its disaffiliation in philosophy. The proposal to disaffiliate the college in physics and chemistry was apparently based upon the insufficiency of the provision of the staff and the inadequacy of the accommodation. The Government of India are informed that, so far as the staff is concerned, the requirements of the University in both these subjects have now been fully met. Sufficient accommodation has also been provided for the teaching of chemistry while it is understood that plans of the physics laboratory are being pushed on. Since therefore the new accommodation is being provided with reasonable despatch, and since the University inspectors in 1907 reported of the existing accommodation that it would do very well for the small B. A. and B. Sc. classes that the college was likely to have, the Government of India do not feel justified in ordering the disaffiliation of the college in these subjects. In these circumstances the Government of India are of opinion that the college should be permitted to retain affiliation up to the B. A. degree in physics and chemistry." The Council will observe that the case of the Rajshahi College was quite different in that the conditions required had been fulfilled or were in train. As regards the Braja Mohan College we seem to have but little information. So far as my information goes there never was a recommendation for disaffiliation. The commission proposed never was sent down but Messrs. James and Cunningham and Dr. P. K. Roy inspected the College in the ordinary course and made a report to the University. This also was before my time. So far as I have been able to ascertain no inquiry was made into the political aspects of the case. In any case, I think, I have said enough to convince the Council that the Government of India does not differentiate between Government and private institutions. As to correspondence with local public bodies there is little to say apart from the letters and telegrams from the hon. Mr. Ghuznavi and two telegrams received, one from the Secretary of the College, the other from the Secretary of the Mymensingh Association. Before any orders had issued from the Government of India the only communications received appear to have been the following: the Secretary of the College asked why the application had been rejected and was told that the reason had been explained to the University. A resolution was received from a public meeting in Tangail asking for a reconsideration of the decision and telegrams were also received from the Secretaries of the Mymensingh Association and the Nadiabass Sabha, Gobiudapur, to the effect that the local public were mortified. These documents were sent to the Government of Bengal with a request that the senders of the telegrams might be informed that the matter would be considered by Government should the application be renewed through the proper channel. No such application has been received.

SECOND HALF OF THE RESOLUTION.

"I now turn to the second half of the resolution. In respect of this, too, I am obliged to meet the resolution of the hon. member with a negative on the same ground, namely that it would be contrary to practice to publish the correspondence for which he asks. I cannot even indicate at present the nature of the correspondence because it involves questions still under discussion with the local Governments. Still less can I discuss questions of fact or policy on which the replies of local Governments are not yet complete. The discussion must therefore, so far as I am concerned, remain academic. I can, however, assure the hon. member that nothing will be done in haste or without full consideration. Indeed any action in regard to the recognition of schools will involve legislation with its attendant processes of consultation. It may, however, serve a useful purpose if I indicate at greater length than was possible within the compass of a general resolution, the reasons why the Government of India have consulted local Governments in regard to these questions. The two aspects of the resolution are distinct although collateral. Both refer to High Schools only which prepare boys in English either to complete their school courses or to go on to a University. I will deal first with the school leaving certificate or school final examination. This has a long history behind it. For more than thirty years the systems of school education have been criticised on all sides, as being unduly literary in character and unduly subordinate to Examination. The Matriculation Examination, it has constantly been said, has led directly to cram the development of the memory at the expense of the higher faculties, the neglect of character and the loss of health and buoyancy of mind. The interests of the majority have been the interests of the few and the conditions of the matriculation examination have cramped the scope of general education. I may mention that comparatively few pupils (about one-fifth of those studying in the high classes of a school) pass beyond the school stage to college. In order to meet criticisms of this kind the commission of 1882 recommended a school course of a modern and practical character, freed from the dominion of a matriculation examination. This recommendation was generally accepted but did not lead to any appreciable result. Either the time was not ripe or the desire for change had not really sunk in. The whole question was again considered by the Indian Universities Commission of 1902 who advised that the conduct of a school final or other school examination was outside the functions of a university, that the university would benefit if the matriculation were no longer accepted as a test for service under Government, that a school final examination should be substituted as qualifying for admission to professional examinations, and that it could advantageously be made a complete or at least a partial test of fitness for entrance to a University. Sir Gooroo Das Banerji, a name always to be mentioned with great respect dissented from this advice on certain grounds, two of which have since been wholly or in part removed—first that there was then no definite scheme of school final examination and secondly that the resources of the universities would suffer if they were deprived of the matriculation. I cannot without unduly tiring your patience trace in detail the history of the question in the different provinces. You will find full information on the subject in the very able and exhaustive quinquennial review prepared by Mr. Sharp, which will shortly be published. Brief as this review is it will show that the history of the case has passed through three stages. In the first instance the idea was to produce a moderate side course and an examination which would serve as a certificate for employment without necessarily drawing students to a university career. In the second instance the idea was to frame a course which would meet the needs of pupils who did not want a university career but who did not wish to be restricted to a modern side education. In the third instance it was recognised that there were serious defects not only in the matter but also in the manner of examination and an attempt was made to substitute records of the pupil's school career and broad practical tests attainment for a purely written examination were carried out by the external authority of the university. Early attempts to establish tests other than those of an external examination were not successful. Within the last quinquennium, however, new systems have been framed in Madras and the United Provinces. Both of these systems lay stress on the record of the pupils progress maintained in the high classes of schools. The Madras system, while it includes examination, does not make the grant of a certificate conditional on the attainment of any prescribed standard in examination. The grant of a certificate under the United Provinces system does depend on the attainment of a certain proficiency based on written and oral examination. The certificates under both Madras and United Provinces systems are recognised by the local universities as equivalent to matriculation but the Madras certificate is, while the United Provinces certificate is not, the sole qualification for Government service of certain grades. The Madras certificate is open to pupils of nearly all schools and the system of school leaving certificates has practically superseded the matriculation examination. The United Provinces certificate can only be obtained by pupils of certain recognised schools but it is becoming increasingly popular. The only province other than Madras and the United Provinces which has an effective scheme of school leaving test is Bombay, where the scheme does not rely upon the record of a pupil's achievements and character but is purely examinational. This is not recognised by the University and is regarded as the sole qualification for Government employ at that stage. Incidentally I may mention that in both Madras and the United Provinces the test or examination is directed by a special board. In the former province this consists of the director, four officials and four non-officials. In the latter province it consists of the Director, two representatives of the University, one of the Thomason College, Roorkee, one of the Chamber of Commerce, two officers of the department, two non-official members appointed by Government, and the Assistant Director as secretary. I would ask you to consider that the Government of India have brought no pressure to bear in the matter as regards any details of either the Madras or the United Provinces' system. We have performed the growth of two systems very different in character. Our own suggestion combines the features of both systems but we recognise the desirability of an experiment. While we realise that the value of external examinations cannot be overlooked, because they set before the teacher a definite aim, and maintain a standard, we are convinced that the definite aim of external examinations often unduly overshadows instruction, and that the standard of an external examination is necessarily limited to examination results, especially in view of the large numbers that have to be examined, and does not take account of the record of mental development of external growth of character. Our suggestion is that a record should be taken of the progress and conduct of each pupil in the high classes of a High School, and of the marks obtained in the various school tests. The Inspector would enter his remarks upon these records at the time of his visits, and thus obtain some acquaintance with the career of each candidate during the two or three years before examination. The examination itself would be conducted partly by written papers on the more important subjects of instruction but also to a large extent orally, due regard being paid to the students past career. The Government of India have already stated that they are prepared to assist with such grants as they may be able to afford, the introduction of any such system which may be locally practicable. But there has not been any compulsion in the matter nor has the case passed as yet beyond the stage of suggestion.

RECOGNITION FOR SCHOOLS.

"I turn now to the recognition of schools. Every modern system of educational organisation is based on a large and growing measure of state control. It is generally agreed by thoughtful people now that the control of education is a duty of the State to the parents and the rising generation. Referring to secondary schools in their resolution of 1904 the Government of India laid down that whether these schools were managed by public authority or private persons, and whether they received aid from public funds or not, the Government was bound, in the interest of the community, to see that the education provided in them was sound. The Government decided to leave the final act of recognition in the case of all schools to the University. In practice the Universities have, in the main, been guided by the departments of public instruction examinations. Difficulties there have been, in certain quarters, but on the whole the advice of the department has been followed. The Madras University has delegated the act of recognition to the department entirely. We commend the success of Madras to the attention of Bengal. We cannot admit that we have thrown a dark shadow over Bengal education.

"I would like to say a few words of a general character in conclusion. I sometimes wonder whether people realise the enormous changes that are coming over our educational systems, and the necessity for recasting our ideas in regard to them. What may have sufficed hitherto will not suffice much longer. What seems an impossible reform now will, perhaps, be out of date ten or fifteen years hence. Things are moving very fast in the educational world, and if India is to hold her place we must move in sympathy with them. When I look at the results already achieved with the materials at our disposal, and reflect on the possibilities as well as the difficulties of the future I rest in hope. I trust that I have convinced you that the Government of India has no sinister motives in the action which it has taken, but is carrying out a progressive and a fully accredited policy. I ask you to believe in the honesty and good intent of the Government of India and the Local Governments in regard to education. We are straining every nerve to make it more responsive to the needs of the people and the time, and we confidently count on the assistance of Indian parents in the great work before us all."

After Mr. Banerjee had replied the resolution was put to the meeting and declared lost.

Resolution on the Press Act.

MR. BANERJEE'S SPEECH.

In moving the resolution on the press Act Mr. Banerjee said he had no desire to revive memories of a controversy now practically dead and forgotten. The Act passed with considerable opposition in the country, and in the debate in the Imperial Council in 1910 on this measure, a general desire was expressed by the non-official Indian members, including many of the supporters of the Bill, that the Act should be treated as an emergent measure dealing with a crisis that had unfortunately arisen, and that it should not find a permanent place in the statute book; but, views did not prevail and the Press Act had become a part of the permanent legislation, and had been in operation for four years, and the public were now in a position to judge the results of its operation. He did not wish to quote the verdict of popular opinion as that might not be acceptable to the other side, but he would refer to an opinion of an authority of unquestioned weight and importance, an opinion of none other than the Hon'ble Sir Lawrence Jenkins, Chief Justice of Bengal. Mr. Banerjee next quoted the judgment of Sir Lawrence Jenkins in the Comrade case, and said he could not conceive of a condemnation of the law more restrained yet more emphatic. Such a law, so dangerously comprehensive in its scope and yet so exacting in its demands, needed necessary safeguards for its proper administration, and the Government anticipating the need of such safeguards wisely sought to provide them here. Mr. Banerjee read extracts from the speech delivered in the Imperial Council when the Press Bill was under consideration. Mr. Sinha was then law member of the Council and spoke in clear and emphatic terms on the meaning and intent of the Government, a declaration which was heartily endorsed by Lord Minto the then Viceroy.

The speech of Mr. Sinha was an authoritative pronouncement on the official side. The question which Mr. Banerjee now asked was, had the pledged safeguards been provided and if not the public had a right to demand that they should be provided.

Mr. Banerjee next dealt with Section 4, 6, 9 and 10 of the Press Act and said that whenever power was vested in the local Government to direct a forfeiture, the obligation was also imposed to state in writing the subject-matter of the complaint in the notice of the forfeiture, but all that was nullified by Section 22, of the Act. That was the clear meaning of Section 22 and that was also the opinion of the High Court of Calcutta. He read Section 22 and also the opinion of the Chief Justice and asked that in the light of actual wording of the Section and the opinion of the Chief Justice, what became of the safeguards which Mr. Sinha as Law Member gave on behalf of the Government of India. The public were driven to that conclusion that a distinct pledge given by the Government of India through their Law Member remained unfulfilled. Safeguards were promised but the High Court said they did not exist. It was distinctly stated with a view to allay public fear and anxieties that the subject-matter of the complaint would be set forth in the notice of forfeiture and the parties would have opportunities of testing the legal validity of such a notice. It now appeared that the Government need not state the objectionable matter and the pledge stood unredeemed. The Government did not and could not mean such a thing. Apart from the high-mindedness of the Government of India there was internal evidence in the Act itself to show that Government fully intended to embody in the law safeguards promised by Mr. Sinha. Mr. Banerjee thought there was no intentional omission but an error in drafting. He was confirmed in that belief by the examination of Section 17 of the Act which provided for an appeal to the High Court against an order of the forfeiture, but an appeal to the High Court became meaningless unless the materials for a review were placed before that tribunal such as would be provided by the mandatory provisions of section 4, 9 and 10. The Act could not be allowed to nullify in one part what it proposed in another nor impose upon aggrieved parties impossible conditions as regards the burden of proof, for in the opinion of Sir Lawrence Jenkins, the law as it stood required the aggrieved party to prove the negative, that the written matter complained of did not come within the all-embracing net spread by the act. To ask an aggrieved party to prove a negative was a logical impossibility and the gravamen of the burden was accentuated by the fact that he was required to prove an all-comprehensive negative viz. that the publication did not come directly or indirectly within the purview of the Act. The speaker quoted the opinion of Sir Lawrence Jenkins to further illustrate this point. He next said there had been sensible improvement in the situation and the tone of the press had changed for the better, which fact was admitted even by Anglo Indian writers who were opposed to the national aspirations of Indians. The improvement was due to the conciliatory and benevolent policy of Lord Hardinge and looking to the situation from the popular point of view, he was justified in demanding a substantial modification in the Press Act, and in making an ardent appeal to the Government to remove a just grievance. In conclusion, Mr. Banerjee said, the newspaper press was a great organ for ventilating public questions and an instrument of popular education. The press was a sacred gift of British rule and the amendment of the Press Act which he prayed for would soften the rigour of an everlasting ban.

MALIK TIWANA.

Malik Tiwana who followed Mr. Banerjee spoke amidst loud laughter. He opposed the resolution and asked for more stringent press laws. In course of his speech he said:—An unbridled press is the greatest curse of India and there has never been a more appropriate and more useful Act passed in this Council than the Press Act with the exception of two others, the Seditious Meetings Act and the Conspiracy Act, which constitute its part and parcel and which are calculated to strike a blow at and suppress anarchism and seditious propaganda organised or unorganised. I think that it is the seditious press which lies at the root of the other two. It is papers or other seditious pamphlets which poison unsteady persons and result in engendering in their minds either conspiracy or an uncontrollable excitement.

MAHARAJA OF NASHIPUR.

The Maharaja of Nashipore speaking next could not say that circumstances had so changed as to demand a repeal of the Act and he did not think that time had come when Government should be divested of its power to control irresponsible writing. In supporting the latter part of the resolution, he said that if it was a fact that the High Court had no power under the Act to question the validity of an order of forfeiture passed by the Local Government, the ambiguity should be removed.

MR. K. HUDA.

Mr. K. Huda spoke in support of the motion and asked the Council to rectify an unintentional error. He also expressed his obligation to Mr. Banerjee for his resolution.

MR. RAMA RAGANINGAR.

Mr. Rama Raganingar while expressing himself against the repeal of the Act strongly spoke in support of the resolution. He explained the ambiguity in the law and asked for its removal.

MR. M. S. DAS.

Mr. M. S. Das said that after hearing Mr. Banerjee he was convinced that an amendment of the Press Act was necessary. He referred to Malik Tiwana's speech which urged for a stringent law which showed that demand for amendments were coming from both sides. He then referred to the "Comrade" case and urged the Council to accept the resolution.

Mr. Das was criticising the mandatory provisions when time was called.

DR. KENRICK.

Dr. Kenrick was the next speaker. He said that as member of the select committee on the Press Legislation of 1910 and as one having some experience of the working of the Press Act he desired to offer some remarks. Every one must admit that the Act had placed an extremely effective and powerful weapon in the hands of the Executive. But those who were best informed were aware that this weapon had been invariably wielded with extreme moderation in every case in which the necessity for using it had occurred during the past four years. As the Hon'ble mover had mentioned some 800 publications had been dealt with and in only one case had the legality of the forfeiture been contested and in that one case the forfeitures had been comparatively few. He might say that in many—if not nearly all of the cases in which forfeiture had occurred, the publications had been of the most flagrantly revolutionary character and in not a few of these cases it would have been deplorable if the law had not offered some effective and summary means of dealing with such publications. The most complete answer to the resolution was the fact that during the whole course of the time during which the Act had been in force, the only occasion on which the action of the Executive had been tested was that to which the mover had alluded. The Hon'ble mover had urged no doubt in the best faith that the safeguard promised by the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha on behalf of the Government had not been fulfilled, but it was a fallacious argument to quote the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha's words, referring to one class of section dealing with the forfeiture of presses and securities and divorcing them from their context to apply them to a totally different section upon the strength of these alleged violated promise a charge had been levelled against the Government, that it had failed to fulfill its promises.

Mr. Banerjee rose to a point of order to protest against the remarks of Dr. Kenrick. He denied having charged the Government with a violation of its pledges.

Dr. Kenrick repeated his remarks and was supported on the point of order of the vice-president. Concluding Dr. Kenrick referred to the judgment in the "Comrade" case and expressed his opinion that the Act contained sufficient safeguard and asked the Council not to modify its salutary provisions.

MR. SRI RAM.

Mr. Sri Ram in supporting said that the request of Mr. Banerjee was very modest and drew the Councils' special attention to the second part of the resolution.

MR. ASAD ALI.

Mr. Asad Ali in supporting said the resolution concerned not one particular class but all classes of the Indian community. It neither asked for the repeal of the Press Act nor attempted to introduce radical changes into the Act. The first part of the resolution required a clear statement or description of the offending words or articles or signs or visible representations, within the meaning of the law in all cases of forfeiture and the second part required a modification of the section 22 of the Press Act so as to give real and definite powers to the High Court in dealing with forfeiture proceedings. Though certain sections of the Act provided in the earlier stages of forfeiture and before the application to the High Court that the Government would state or describe the offending words or signs or representations, one of the most important section, namely section 12, did not contain such a provision. In the absence of a statement or description of the offending words and even of a statement of the grounds that led to an action of forfeiture, no judicial authority however high and competent it be, could pronounce a judgment. The public were entitled to know the exact nature of the offence when an order of forfeiture was made. Though section 12 provided that the Government should state the grounds of its opinion, it was rather unfortunate that in a recent well known cases, it had failed to do so. After the frank pronouncement by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in the "Comrade" case, need it be said that the Press Act should forthwith be modified so as to empower the High Court to deal with press prosecutions in an effective manner? But the Act as it stood at present was an instrument of unduly great power in the hands of the executive so much so that it made the highest judicial tribunal feel their utter helplessness in the matter. Hence such small modifications in the essential particulars as the Hon'ble Mr. Banerjee suggested would bring the Act in conformity with the liberal principles of the Government. The exciting and critical times that demanded a stringent law were happily gone by and the present peaceful times no longer required such a rigorous Press Act. It was perhaps not fully known how little was the operation of the present Act calculated to promote free growth of an independent public opinion.

Both Raja Kashal Pal Singh and Mr. V. R. Pandit supported the resolution. The latter deprecated the discussion of section 4 as being outside the scope of the resolution and dwelt at length upon clause 8 of the Act. He urged the Council to accept the resolution.

SIR REGINALD CRADDOCK'S REPLY.

The Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock in replying quoted clauses in the resolution which he said represented the desire of the Hon'ble Mover to some extent. Some previous speakers had explained matters in which the mover had not been quite clear. He (the mover) proposed to secure the renewal of a similarity of procedure under the different sections of the Act without actually specifying the section which would have to be regarded. In fact the Hon'ble Mover was urging that the procedure under section 12 should be assimilated to the wording of section 4, 6, 9 and 11, notwithstanding that section 12 was totally different from these sections and the language used was quite dissimilar.

Mr. Banerjee rose to a point of order. The president asked him to reserve his explanations till the time of reply.

Sir Reginald Craddock continuing said he was explaining what the effects were of the amendments proposed and the only way in which the object of the resolution could be carried out would be the amendment of Section 12 which was not specifically referred to. But the circumstances were different in case of a keeper of a press or a publisher of a newspaper. Where his property was to be forfeited? Another safe-guard alluded to had therefore, been provided. The disseminator or the writer of a proscribed book or pamphlet was generally an unknown person and the bulk of such literature was either printed secretly or abroad section 12 therefore, referred not to valuable property or security but to probably a few books or pamphlets of probably trivial value. The forfeiture is publicly notified in the Government Gazette to all concerned that such literature had been proscribed as a warning to the public. It was true that the section might be used in regard to literature possessed or printed by the owners of known presses but the forfeiture of the literature did not entail the forfeiture of the press or of any security. No person of ordinary prudence would urge that it was incumbent upon the Government to do the very thing which this section was designed to prevent and to publish abroad the very words or pictures to which exception was taken. In the case of literature produced outside India Government have long enjoyed the power of preventing its importation under the provisions of the Sea Customs Act or its seizure and forfeiture if it escaped detection at the sea ports. The bulk of the literature affected was violently revolutionary and in a few cases though such literature might not be violently prejudicial to the English readers it might nevertheless be highly undesirable to spread it broadcast amongst the Indians. It was not possible, therefore to amend Section 12 in the direction of bringing it into similarity of procedure with the sections dealing with the forfeiture of valuable property. A great deal had been made of the remarks on the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha but as the Hon'ble Mr. Pandit had pointed out those remarks referred to forfeiture of presses and securities the Home Member proceeded to quote Mr. Sinha on this point. He said the Press Act of 1910 was thoroughly examined at the time of its enactment both by the Council and by a select committee, the members of which give minute of dissent but neither in the amendments proposed in the Council nor in the minutes of dissent was any attempt made to amend the section 12. The Hon'ble Mover may suggest that this was mere inadvertence but Mr. Sinha was making his speech not on the introduction of the Bill but after it had been carefully examined and the select committee had presented its report. The Bill was not a long one and such a marked difference between the working of the sections could not have escaped notice by accident. As a matter of fact the difference of words was absolutely intentional. The Home member referring to the second recommendation made by Mr. Banerjee said that the power should not be exercised by any authority lower than a local Government. The statute book was full of powers reserved to local Government which were responsible bodies and which were not in danger of using their powers arbitrarily or without discretion. The only reason for providing a reference to judicial decision was to ensure whether the orders passed were within the terms of the section or not.

Sir Reginald Craddock went on to quote Sir Herbert Risley on this point. It was quite clear that it was never intended to give the High Courts any powers other than those contained in section 4. Very naturally Government would always desire to comply with the formalities prescribed by law. But the construction to be placed upon orders complained of was a vital issue. If a technical irregularity which of course be unintentional in the wording of the order were to be allowed to vitiate the order, the most revolutionary pamphlet might be scattered broadcast throughout India while points of law or procedure were being debated. The speaker next discussed the judgment of the Chief Justice in the "Comrade" case. As the mover had referred to judgment once or twice and it might affect the general attitude of the public towards the Act he wished to remove any misapprehension that might arise. It was quite true that the Chief Justice had complained that a mandatory portion under Section 12 had not been complied with in the Government notification but they could not find in his judgement any specific statement that he committed himself to any opinion that the interpretation placed upon the Macedonia pamphlet was far reaching or arbitrary and he stated his grounds, namely that it was no part of the High Courts' duty to pronounce on the wisdom or otherwise of Executive actions of Government and he stated his reasons in no uncertain terms. It had always been sufficient if Government stated which of the six clauses under Section 4 was held to be applicable to a case of forfeiture. Concluding Sir Reginald said:—"As for the future I have a lively faith in the independence of our High Court Judges and I feel no doubt that if at any time the Executive Government should exercise their powers under this Act rashly or oppressively that the Judges will find no difficulty in invalidating their illegal action." Sir Reginald Craddock opposed the resolution.

OTHER SPEAKERS.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, who followed Sir Reginald Craddock, said that the remarks of the Home Member had greatly simplified matters. There was no suggestion in the resolution that the Mover wanted a repeal of the Press Act. He drew special attention to section 12 and held that the stating of grounds under that Section would not disseminate the offending words which both the Home Member and the Advocate-General apprehended. He condemned the restricted power of the High Court in dealing with the Press Act and urged the Council to accept the resolution as a strong case had been made out for Government to examine the whole position.

Sir Ebrahim Rahmatoola in supporting referred to the Home Member's speech and dwelt upon the existing safe-guards which he held were illusory. He recalled cases when Government had come up before the Council to modify the act or acts to conform the original intention of the legislature. Similarly they had come up for the revision of the Press Act. He urged the Council to accept the resolution.

Mr. Chariar in supporting criticised the speeches of the Home Member and the Advocate-General and said the High Court of Bengal had found that there was considerable discrepancy in declaration and performance. The request was modest and he saw no reason why it should not be granted.

Sir G. M. Chitnavis supporting urged for the alteration in the wording of the law so as to make safe-guards more operative.

Mr. Banerjee summed up the debate and urged that safe-guards were unoperative. He regretted the disposition of the Home Member to go over the pledge given in the past and pointed out to almost unanimity among the non-official members for the revision of the law. He further said that whatever might be the decision to-day they would further deal with the question.

A division being called the resolution was rejected by 40 voting against and 17 for it.

The Council then adjourned to the 18th instant.

Our London Letter.

London, 26th December, 1913.

THE "TIMES" ON "THE INDIAN PERIL."

Indian affairs have been rather prominent this week in London, owing to the four "remarkable" articles, which have appeared in the "Times" on what the national journal of England is pleased to call "The Indian Peril." Had this paper to-day the same influence in moulding British public opinion, which it undoubtedly possessed in times fortunately gone by, the wicked and malignant campaign, which it has just started, would have naturally been viewed with no little alarm and anxiety by all those, who have the true interests of the British Empire in India at heart. Those, who are familiar with Indian matters and are in a position to understand the real situation in India, however, are not likely to allow their own mind to be in any way prejudiced or in the slightest degree influenced by the present series of articles in the "Times" on the "Indian Peril," which obviously exists only in its correspondent's imaginative mind. To studiously misrepresent the facts of the whole case, as is being done in certain quarters at the present moment, is considered as nothing less than criminal by all thinking men and to deliberately stigmatise the great bulk of the Indian population as revolutionaries and seditious, when they are trying to do nothing more than demand the fulfillment of the fundamental principles of British justice and fair-play is looked upon as a gross outrage on the undoubted loyalty and devotion of the Indian people to the British Crown.

On the whole, the "Times" articles have fortunately not created that universal sensation in England that was no doubt anticipated and even the Tory Press in general has treated the matter with extraordinary indifference. The Liberal Press, however, has risen to the occasion splendidly and has, at the outset, earnestly warned the Public to View these Stories with the utmost suspicion. The "Daily News and Leader" in a magnificent leading article on the subject, has thoroughly exposed the hollowness of all the arguments used in the "Times" in support of its doctrine and has thus undoubtedly rendered a truly Imperial Service. "All this" proceeds the "Daily News" "is preliminary to a demand for a revival of the deportations and for new restrictive measures. If this campaign in which we see the hand of the reactionary influences that played so evil a part in connection with the last period of unrest—is successful, there will be an "Indian Peril" indeed, and one from which we shall not emerge so fortunately as we did from the last."

There are of course, firebrands in India as elsewhere and their most useful agents are the reactionary Anglo Indians, who inspire the Press. But neither amongst the Hindus nor among the Mohaimmdans can there be found responsible leaders, who are disloyal to the British rule. They know that it is essential to the governance of India and that its withdrawal would be disastrous to their country. They are in a very real sense the bulwork of our policy there. If we lose their confidence in British justice, we shall lose the confidence of India. Now it is the chief vice of the policy that "The Times" represents that it drives these men into antagonism to the Government..... "The Westminster Gazette" speaks in the same view. "We have read these articles with some care," says the Gazette in a leader "and as members of the well meaning but misguided class appealed to, we feel impelled to say that, if they represent the last word of wisdom on the part of the administration, there is an Indian peril, and a very serious one..... We do not share the alarm of the "Times" correspondent. The problem is certainly more difficult than it was twenty years ago, and we must not expect dumb admiration and acquiescence from active and intelligent men to whom our rule is alien. We must make our rule as little alien as possible, and that primarily means breaking down the racial estrangement, which is the curse of India and a more fruitful cause of unrest than all other causes put together. The new India which is growing up will not submit to the hard line between the ruling caste and the ruled, which is insisted upon by so much Anglo-Indian opinion"..... It is indeed surprising that on an occasion, when great care and unusual delicacy are needed in handling question concerning India the "Times" has thought fit to open a crusade against all that is noble, progressive, loyal and self-respecting in that great Dependency of the Empire. No more mischievous motive could be considered than that underlying the recent articles in the "Times" and no more loyal section of His Majesty's subjects could be thus misrepresented than the vast millions of India, whose devotion and attachment to their Sovereign have been repeatedly and vividly demonstrated, even under the most trying circumstances.

EGYPTIAN PRINCESS WEDS AT WOKING.

On the afternoon of Sunday the 21st December, a numerous gathering was present at the mosque, Woking, at Khwaja Kamal-ud-din's invitation, to witness the Majlis-un-Nikah (Wedding ceremony) of Princess Saliah of Egypt with a Russian nobleman, who has recently embraced Islam, to which I made a brief reference in my letter of last week. Amongst those present were Mr. Abbas Ali Bai, Lord Headley, Colonel Bhola Nath, Miss Chatterjee, Mr. and Mrs. Ibrahim, Mr. H. Leitner (whose father had built the mosque), Mr. Abdul Haq, Mr. Khalid Sheldrake, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Mohamed Kassimoff, Mr. M. M. Shafi, Mr. Naimatullah Shah, Dr. Mohamed Deen of Bhowalpur, Mr. Zafar Ali Khan and Mr. Jial Shah. The Princess is a daughter of Prince Hilmi and a grand-daughter of the late Khedive Ismail of Egypt. She speaks, besides Arabic and Turkish, several European Languages, amongst them English and French fluently. The moslem name of the Russian nobleman is Ata-ul-Rahman Shaikh Jial-ud-din Mohamed.

Before the actual ceremony, Khwaja Kamal-ud-din delivered a very impressive sermon on the duties of "man and wife," after which the Khwaja Sahib conducted the Nikah in the mosque itself, thus giving the auspicious event a most inspiring atmosphere.

Subsequently, the party was treated to light refreshments, which were provided for the guests in the Memorial House, attached to the mosque, and after offering their hearty congratulations to the newly-married couple, the visitors gradually dispersed.

Reuter's message in this morning's paper, stating that an enthusiastic ovation has been accorded Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali, on their arrival at Delhi, has made a very favourable impression on the Indian Moslem Community in London.

The great problem before the Indian Moslems in London at present, which awaits solution, is that relating to Mr. Ameer Ali's withdrawal of his resignation. It will be, no doubt, of interest to see as to how the Right Hon. gentleman will render his office of President of the London Moslem League an essentially political Body, compatible with his position as a Privy Councillor. Perhaps, on this occasion, he will use his own discretion without in any way troubling the Lord Chancellor for advice or permission.

TETE À TETE

No one who is acquainted with the true state of the country can deny that so far as the Mussalmans of India are concerned the dawn of the year 1914 was far brighter than the dawn of 1912 or 1913. The evil fortune of the Moslem world which brought to them repeated afflictions during the last three years seemed to have exhausted itself, and the horizon was once more cloudless, even if the mist of suspicion still hung over the Community. With the New Year every public spirited Mussalman felt the necessity of taking stock of the communal situation and of re-arranging the programme of constructive work which had been at least partially arrested by the terrible visitations of the last few years. There was every hope that the energies hitherto absorbed in combating with repeated misfortunes would begin to be utilized for the purpose of self-improvement. It was at the same time believed that, in view of the universal dissatisfaction with the Press Act and with its administration during the period of the Cawnpore Mosque agitation, Government would now be pleased to modify the Act substantially, if not repeal it without further delay, and hopes were entertained that, apart from any considerations of justice, the Government of India would recommend to Local Governments the refund of all securities which they had declared forfeited with a view to inaugurate a new era of trust and confidence between Government and the public. The reply of Sir Reginald Craddock, however, to the recommendation of practically all non-official members of the Imperial Legislative Council for an absurdly small modification of the Press Act shattered the hope that Government would at least modify the Act without further agitation in the country. But a worse blow to the hopes of those who desired the restoration of the country to its normal condition is the order of H. H. the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab for the confiscation of the entire Press of the Zamindar, together with the enhanced security of Rs. 10,000, which the keeper of that Press had been called upon to furnish on the confiscation of the security of Rs. 2,000 previously deposited. It must be remembered that the articles which are declared to furnish the ground for the action of His Honour were published about two months ago, and it is a significant commentary on the declaration of the framers of the Act that it is a preventive and not a punitive measure which, unlike a prosecution causing endless excitement, provides a summary procedure. We fear this new prevention is worse than the old cure, and it is idle to talk of an appeal to the Punjab Chief Court when even the High Court of Calcutta has confessed itself to be helpless. Who can lightly undertake the "almost hopeless task" of proving the negative required by the Act when the words of Section 4 are all-comprehensive and nothing can escape the net of the Executive? It is merely throwing away good money after bad. But if a journalist who becomes a victim of the Act cannot obtain the redress of his grievances in a court of law, his only resort is the office chambers of the Executive, and that being the case, it is no use discussing the character of the publications on account of which such action is alleged to have been taken. Had the Press Act any reference to the intention of the publications we would have had no hesitation in attempting to prove the obvious fact that the Zamindar never harboured an unlawful intention. But it was found in our own case that the only thing with which that Act was concerned was the possibility, great or small, present or future, of exciting, somehow and somewhere, certain feelings in one or more human beings. We are, therefore, compelled to ask whether those objectionable feelings are more likely to be caused to-day by a perusal of three more or less obscure back numbers of the Zamindar or by the drastic action of the Punjab Government. Our own answer to this question can be given unhesitatingly, and it is this. The action of the Punjab Government is likely to disturb the sea's surface once more at a time when there was no sign of the rough weather through which the Mussalmans had recently passed. We want the calm and not the storm, and confine our remarks on the occasion to the earnest prayer to His Honour Sir Michael O'Dwyer himself to prefer expediency even to justice, and his own forgiveness to the vengeance of those who are exulting at the troubles of one of their own kith and kin. We feel certain that the Mussalmans, who cannot afford to do without a strong and independent Vernacular Press, would revive the Zamindar without much delay. But before they do it, will not the Punjab Government itself give back the life that it has taken, and teach the Moslem community a lesson in moderation and self-control, in dignity and even charity which it could remember far longer than lessons taught by confiscations and even bayonets? Many things can be repressed, but it is impossible to repress bitterness of feeling. H. E. Lord Hardinge realised this when he made the Cawnpore settlement. It would have been still better if Sir James Meston had realised it earlier. But the time for its realization by Sir Michael O'Dwyer has not yet gone, and we appeal to him to capture Moslem imagination and Moslem feeling by an act of grace. We feel certain that His Honour's example would not be lost on other Local Governments and his lead would be readily followed. We must continue to do our duty by the people and by the Government according to our lights regardless of possible consequences, to ourselves and the recent orders of the Punjab Government cannot affect him who is moved by the powerful impulse of a patriot's duty. But it is not inconsistent with that duty to appeal, nay implore Government to do nothing which may cause more excitement than that which already prevails. In voicing this appeal we feel certain that our views are shared even by those who were occasionally dissatisfied with the conduct of our ill-fated contemporary, for the appeal is made not in the interest of the Zamindar, nor that of the Press generally, nor even in the interest of the Moslem community, but first and foremost in the interests of peace and good government, and we are equally certain that our appeal cannot be unwelcome to the statesman who has repeatedly acted on similar impulses in the three years of his Viceroyalty.

Our readers must by now be quite familiar with the conspiracy that has been hatched in this country and in England of frightening the British public into a policy of repression to be pursued in India against Indians in general and the Mussalmans in particular, the policy of suppression of newspapers and wholesale prosecution and deportations. It is not difficult to guess who are the chief conspirators in this country and who are their Indian accomplices. Were it not for the wise statesmanship of H. E. the Viceroy, who looks upon Indian questions from a detached point of view, and the support he gets from some of the Heads of Provincial Governments such as H. E. Lord Carmichael and from some of his colleagues, it would have become impossible for any public man in India to do his duty by his own people and by Government. Very few people realise what India owes to Lord Hardinge at this crisis; but when the historian of the future lifts the veil, the whole country would recognise the full measure of its obligation to the present Viceroy. In England, the Times is the arch-conspirator, but most Tory papers have lent themselves to create the "Indian Peril." The Round Table, which is edited by a young Tory not a minute older than some of the "hot-headed youngster" of the Moslem community, joins hands with the Pall Mall where Mr. Garvin displays every evening the awful signs of Tory dotage. But India is kept studiously outside Party politics, so that, like "everybody's child" who is nobody's child, India is bound to suffer for want of an advocate. The Liberals are willing to do her justice but they know little of India, and where a Moslem is concerned, and where Turkey is even indirectly in question, prejudice comes to the rescue of ignorance against the onslaughts of the Liberal political conscience. Add to it the tremendous disadvantage that all Indian news reaches England through tainted Anglo-Indian and Tory sources and that her cabled to England have more lives than the proverbial cat, as the references to Cawnpore incidents in English papers even to-day amply testify, and you get some idea of the almost hopeless situation. Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali found several occasions on which to counteract the false charge levelled against Indian Mussalmans of trying to dictate the British policy, and the Liberal papers do not believe it any longer, though significantly enough some Tory papers still repeat the lie. But in the earlier stages of their mission these gentlemen did not publish a word about the Cawnpore incidents in order that Ministers may not complain that they had come to embarrass the Government, and after the settlement by H. E. the Viceroy they were most anxious to bury the hatchet and consider those awful happenings as a mere nightmare. A few editors of Liberal papers were, however, privately told the facts of the case and were informed that apprehensions existed in India that those who were opposed to Lord Hardinge's settlement would try to take every opportunity of wreaking their vengeance on the Moslem Press that had recently done its duty by the community. Even this has been productive of some results, and we are glad to note that at least an important portion of the Liberal Press is now no more labouring under the delusions which "news" manufactured in India was bound to create. The first-fruits of the Moslem Mission in England are the leading articles which the Daily News and Leader and the Westminster Gazette have published on the subject of the "Indian Peril" of the Times. The Daily News characteristically nipped the latest mischievous of the Times in the bud, and the Westminster

Gazette has given the Thunder its coup de grace. We invite the attention of our readers to these articles which are reproduced elsewhere. After the Edinburgh Review article of His Highness the Aga Khan—to whom the Mussalmans owe as much gratitude as the Pioneer and His Highness's once perfectly disinterested admirer, the Times of India, owe him a grudge—we hope all croakers in England and India will be silenced, and the "Indian Peril" would be as dead as Queen Anne. May it also be beyond resurrection is the prayer of every true well-wisher of Government and of India.

We cordially invite the attention of our readers to the appeal of the London Islamic Society published elsewhere. This is, perhaps, the oldest Moslem institution in London, and we believe Mr. Justice Abdul Rahim, now Member of the Royal Commission on Public Services, was one of its founders. Major Syed Hasan Bilgrami was its last President and can corroborate our statement that the Society has every claim on the support of the Mussalmans of the world. The Moslem population of London is largely of the student class, and the activities of societies with such a floating membership are naturally unequal. But the present generation of its members, and particularly its present office-bearers deserve every assistance. The main difficulty is the absence of a permanent habitation, and this can be removed by hiring a commodious house in a central place where prayers can be offered, and the meetings of the Society held at regular intervals. A reading room and a library would provide enough attraction for the members who are scattered all over a vast area called London and swallowed up among the seven millions that constitute the population of London. Egyptians, Turks, Persians, and Indians could thus meet together and exchange ideas about the causes of Moslem decadence and the methods of Moslem regeneration. In this connection we may mention that Ali Hikiniet Nalid Bey, one of the Vice-Presidents of the Society who has signed its appeal for funds, is a young Turkish gentleman engaged in banking business to which the Turks are now fortunately taking. We trust the generosity of Indian Mussalmans will come to the assistance of a Society which has done not a little to enlighten English people on the subject of Islam and Moslem ideals, and to remove those absurd prejudices among which an English child generally grows up into boyhood and manhood. It must be in the recollection of our readers that the Islamic Society entertained Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali at a Banquet held at Hotel Cecil at which the Hon. Aubrey Herbert, M. P., presided, and at which besides the exposition of Moslem views about Indian and Islamic politics by these two speakers, Sir Henry Cotton spoke on Indian unity and Mr. John Dillon, M. P., denounced the Press Act of which he had had considerable experience in Ireland.

We are informed on wholly unreliable authority that the following letter is lying undelivered in the Dead Letter Office at Delhi for want of sufficient address. It, however, bears the world famous name of "Gur" at the foot of it, and the police are investigating the matter with a view to make certain whether the document is a clumsy forgery, or has some connection with the Hon. Mr. Gur whose disappearance from the world of journalism may be as deceptive as most appearances are believed to be. It runs as follows:—

"DEAR WORSHIPFUL BROTHER,
"I gladly responded to your invitation to dine with you and your brother Masons, and you now expect me to respond to your invitation to become a Mason. Under ordinary circumstances conductors of newspapers have a ready reply for all offers. But such a "contribution" as a dinner could not have been rejected on the ground of "pressure on our space." However, I much regret to have to say that, in spite of the obvious temptation to embrace the opportunity of fraternizing with my pursuers, I am unable to respond to your invitation to be a Mason.

"It is not always wise to give reasons for one's views, and often enough a most excellent judgment is upset in appeal because the judge has taken the risky course of offering reasons of doubtful excellence in support of it. Nevertheless you are quite welcome to such reasons as I have to offer. In the first place, my becoming a Mason is not likely to benefit Masonry. I have noticed the sad absence of ladies in Masonic brotherhoods, and probably this is not sufficiently accounted for by the obvious fact that all "brotherhood" would disappear with the disturbing appearance of "Adorable Sisters" among the "Worshipful Brothers." Is it not a fact that you have a secret to keep, and what woman could be trusted with one? Now the weakness of a woman is the pride of a journalist. Think of the "copy" he could secure by becoming a Mason! Imagine the glaring headlines the Daily Mail would give when Isis is unveiled! Believe me every journalist has the soul of a Delilah, and it is not a small matter that I am laying it bare for your benefit. After this confession, do you think you would like me to be initiated into your mysteries?

"I have two other reasons also, but they will not take long in the telling thereof. With the Press Act hanging over it, journalism is by no means a bed of roses. Add to it the "Indian Peril" of the Times and the C. I. D., and then ask yourself whether a journalist outside the Lunatic Asylum can join a secret society. No, non am, no Masonry for my money!

"Thirdly, and lastly, I admit I know the full enormity of the sin of 'destructive criticism,' particularly after the political obiter dicta of a Judge lecturing on Education. But what of the greater sin of 'constructive' Masonry? Didn't some 'hot-headed youngsters,' and still more hot-headed octogenarians, try their hand as constructive masons in a certain city in a certain province and come to a sad end? No thanks, not if I know it. Yours Never, 'Gur.'

MISS MAUD ALLAN was coming to Delhi and all well-wishers of this country became preternaturally uneasy about the safety of Prestige. Would the dacoit still feel himself compelled to take his pursuers into partnership, or would he henceforward dispense with this necessary measure of precaution and pursue his calling as openly as, shall we say, the Police? Would the debtor, unwilling to meet his creditors, merely continue to rely on the laws' delays and the eternity that separates decree from execution, or, disdaining these Fabian tactics, would he henceforth defy the red-turbaned Chaprasai that only wants his signature on the summons, failing a small silver coin? Would the journalist continue to live in terror of the Press Act, or would he begin to suspect that High Courts and Special Tribunals are not incredible myths but have some substance and reality? Would the Indian still believe that in the warrant of official precedence the British Chancellor of the Exchequer comes much after a Chief Commissioner's head Chaprasai, or would it suddenly dawn on him that British Ministers must be respected alike by non-official journalists and official oratory? These were the grave questions that haunted loyal breasts when the placards began to announce "Maud Allan is coming." Miss Maud Allan came, danced and departed, and let it be proclaimed from the top of the Kutub Minar that Prestige was not only not shattered but has remained wholly undamaged. The dacoit's peculiar notions of safety and methods of company promotion and the red-turbaned Chaprasai's small silver coin; the terrors of the Press Act and the latest warrant of precedence are all safe and untouched. Naked and naughty feet no doubt trampled over them, but they survived the delightful shock of such delicate hammering just as easily as a dowager duchess's wrinkles survive repeated vibratory massage. Not even to a perverted and prurient mind could the classic, if also somewhat needlessly entailed, draperies of Miss Maud Allan suggest thoughts that are not infrequently the outcome of the spectacle of a ballet dancer dressed in pink tights of the most approved pattern sanctioned by the Lord Chamberlain. Titian would have failed in his art if one could distinguish his "Profane Love" from his "Sacred Love" merely by the dimensions and weight of the draperies. So would Miss Maud Allan have failed in her art if one could measure one's pleasure only according to the scantiness of her attire. But we could honestly say that she did not fail, and that at times she gripped the thoughts of the spectators so fast that they forgot the entire controversy which had heralded her to India. In fact they felt a rude shock of surprise when after the fall of the curtain the lights in the hall were turned on, and they could note that the worshippers of Prestige had boycotted her because of her bare feet. Looking at the matter merely from the oriental point of view, her art appeared less like a dance in the ordinary sense and more like the posturing with which a decorous and often dull mujra is commenced, or the gestures known as nirat that accompany a love lyric. Hers was a more perfectly developed and more natural art, and could therefore be enjoyed by a staid Oriental no less than by a lively Westerner, and he who does not object to the art of an Indian danceuse could have no objection to the art of Miss Maud Allan. No one is called upon to bestow his approval on that lady's choice of this art in preference to any other; but no one has a right to trumpet forth his disapproval if he does not denounce in far more emphatic terms the very common art that is exhibited on the stage of advertising physical charms often only enhanced by what covers, though it does not conceal, them. The puritan,--and we have a sneaking admiration for him--would find more to object in many a swaying motion of the Tango even if danced in the costume of a nun than in the performance we saw at Delhi. Having said this, we may perhaps venture now to address a remark or two to Miss Maud Allan. We ask if she really thinks that the lightness of her draperies is necessary for the display of her art? Could she not in any case choose more secretive colours than she occasionally uses? No doubt her translation of Chopin's sounds into her own motion in the first item of this evening's programme was exquisite: her rendering of Mendelssohn's Spring Song was dainty and delightful, and her Blue Danube Valse was also highly artistic. But that which kept the spectators spell-bound was her rendering of Chopin's Funeral March in which she was almost as closely draped as a nun. We acknowledge that scantier clothing suited the Spring Song better. But it did not appear to us to be absolutely indispensable, and Art and Virtue may well make a concession to Philistinism and Vice occasionally, just as bureaucracy can afford to throw a crumb or two to democracy and discontent. In conclusion, we may admit that after all we have seen little of Miss Maud Allan in the performance she gave at Delhi, and had she given us the Salome dance we too may have felt inclined to side with the Police Commissioner of Bombay. But in that case we would have sought the assistance of the Bishop of Kensington in England also, even at the risk of having had to witness hostile Mr. Bernard Shaw's flashes

Saved!

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

THE agitation which followed the Partition of Bengal in 1905 was unparalleled both in intensity and magnitude. It is, however, of so recent a date that it is wholly unnecessary to go into any details concerning the manifestations of the excitement of a large section of the Hindu community at the time. We have never disguised our own views about the character of that agitation, and it is, therefore, equally needless to re-state them. No one who went through that period of intense excitement could forget it, and no one could honestly say that such an agitation has ever been repeated in India since those days. The worst feature of that agitation was the sudden appearance of newspapers and leaflets openly preaching violence, assassination and revolt and the equally sudden occurrence of political crimes such as shooting, bomb-throwing, and dacoities.

This led the Government of India, after careful and anxious consideration which clearly showed the influence of two such statesmen and friends of India as Lord Morley and Lord Minto, to issue on the 3rd June, 1907 a Resolution which referred to "the recent outbreaks of lawlessness in the Punjab and Eastern Bengal" and to the attendant circumstance of a number of newspapers encouraging such lawlessness. It went on to say that--

The Governor-General has no desire whatever to restrict the legitimate liberty of the Press to criticise the action of the Government and he would be reluctant to curtail the freedom of the many well-conducted papers because of the misbehaviour of a few disloyal journals.

But in view of the Governments' responsibility for the maintenance of law and order, it could not tolerate the publication of seditious matter, and was determined to repress the dissemination of sedition and the promotion of ill-will between classes by firm and sustained action "under the penal law." Accordingly, His Excellency the Viceroy empowered Local Governments to institute prosecutions in all cases where the law had been wilfully infringed. In consequence of this, 47 prosecutions had been undertaken up to the end of 1909, not one of which had failed. In the words of the late Sir Herbert Risley, then Home Member, it was proved "that the law as it stands is sufficient to enable convictions for sedition to be obtained." In 1908, however, the Newspapers (Incitement to offences) Act was passed in order to add another weapon to the armoury of the State, and the combined effect of this judicial and legislative action was that the Samitha, the Jugantar and the Bande Mataram and other newspapers of a similar character ceased to exist.

This was what repression could do. But the wisdom of Lord Morley and Lord Minto had foreseen that repression had its limits, and could not work the miracles which a policy of reconciliation alone could accomplish. Without justifying the seditious newspapers in the least, one could yet explain their existence and their potency for evil, and it was such an explanation alone that could give a clue to the root-evil from which was springing up in the land the spirit of anarchy and lawlessness. The parasite in the blood was reached through the adoption of the well-known Reform Scheme, and no one who was old enough and able to judge the state of the country could fail to note the marvellous change that this measure of liberal statesmanship produced in India. Speaking from his place in the Imperial Legislative Council, the Hon. Mr. Gokhale said that "there is no doubt whatever that the Reform Scheme . . . has largely eased the tension of the situation, and has brought over to the side of the administration factors that might otherwise have remained sullenly or helplessly aloof." The Viceroy himself felt justified in saying on the same day that "we are at the commencement of that new political era of which I have so often spoken." What is more, he signalled the commencement of that era of new hope by releasing the State prisoners who had been fourteen months previously deported under Regulation III of 1818. "Our justification for their release," said Lord Minto, "is based upon the belief that the political position has entirely changed."

It was, then, nothing short of "a cruel irony of fate," as Mr. Gokhale called it, that this bright prospect should have been dimmed by the appearance of a dark cloud partially concealing the sun so soon after the dawn; that the Press Act should have been the first statute to be enacted by the Reformed Council. No profound student of government can say that, taking detached periods of history, greater progress has been made by any country or people, and in a shorter space of time, under any other form of government than the rule of a dictator or autocrat. This can be readily confessed, without prejudicing in the least the claims of democracy to be the most satisfying and on the whole a very satisfactory system of government. Now, if Lord Morley had been in the fullest sense the Dictator of India for a decade after Lord Curzon's restless Viceroyalty, we feel certain that the bright prospect of 1910 would not have been clouded by a piece of legislation to which his whole nature must have been averse and which was entirely out of keeping with his entire political career. But the author of "Compromise" knew only too well that life was one long second best, and that he must allow himself to be saddled with the blame for inconsistency in order to be able to induce those whose cooperation was essential for the success them. Just as the deportations were the price which his liberal statesmanship had to pay to "Anglo-India" for the Reform Scheme, the Press Act was no doubt the price which it had to pay for the release of the deportees.

Only a year before Lord Morley speaking in the House of Lords, dealt with the suggestion that we ought to have "some very strong machinery for putting down a free Press" in the following characteristically effective manner:—

A long time ago a great Indian authority, Sir Thomas Munro, used language which I will venture to quote, not merely for the purpose of this afternoon's exposition, but in order that everybody who listens and reads may feel the formidable difficulties that our predecessors have overcome, and that we in our turn mean to try to overcome. Sir Thomas Munro said:— "We are trying an experiment never yet tried in the world—maintaining a foreign dominion by means of a native army; and teaching that army through a free Press, that they ought to expel us and deliver their country." He went on to say:— "A tremendous revolution may overtake us, originating in a free Press." I recognise to the full the enormous force of a declaration of that kind. But let us look at it as practical men, who have got to deal with the government of the country. Supposing you abolish freedom of the Press or suspend it, that will not end the business. You will have to shut up schools and colleges, for what would be the use of suppressing newspapers, if you do not shut the schools and colleges? Nor will that be all. You will have to stop the printing of undiscussed books. The possession of a copy of Milton, or Burke, or Macaulay, or of Bright's speeches and all that flashing array of writers and orators who are the glory of our grand, our noble English tongue—the possession of one of these books will, on this peculiar and perilous notion of government, be like the possession of a bomb, and we shall have to direct the passing of an Explosive Books Act. All this and its various sequels and complements make a policy if you please. But after such a policy had produced a mute, sullen, muzzled lifeless India, we could hardly call it, as we do now, the brightest jewel in the Imperial Crown. No English Parliament will ever permit such a thing.

It is true that "no English Parliament will ever permit such a thing;" but it is also true that the greater expediency of carrying the Reforms through an uncontrolled Tory Second Chamber, urged by the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy, and led by several ex-Viceroy of the same Party, reconciled Lord Morley after a year to that measure of repression, the Press Act of 1910. Nevertheless, we feel certain that Lord Morley, who was not unaware of the dire consequences of such muzzling in Ireland, would not have consented to it in India if he were not assured of the provision of what the late Sir Herbert Risley called a very complete judicial check upon any hasty or improper action by the executive. This consisted of "an appeal to a special tribunal of three Judges of the High Court against any order of forfeiture passed by the Government."

Be that as it may, the people who were to be thus muzzled would have under ordinary circumstances certainly opposed the measure, although even members of the first Reformed Council knew that not even the united opposition of all Indian members could bring about the alteration of a word of the Bill without official concurrence. But what did the Indian Councillors do? On the 4th of February, 1910, Sir Herbert Risley moved for leave to introduce the Bill. No member opposed the motion which was and put unanimously agreed to. The Bill was then introduced, and Sir Herbert Risley moved that the Rules of Business be suspended, as if the safety of the Indian Empire hung on the immediate passage of a Bill which Lord Morley had fought against for years. The Viceroy declared the Rules suspended, and thus, without publishing the Bill in the official Gazette for public information and criticism, the Home Member moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report on the 8th February, that is, after an interval of no more than three days. This motion too was put and agreed to without any dissent. On the 8th February the Report of the Select Committee was presented by the Home Member, who did not feel inclined to say a word in explanation of the Report, for the Bill emerged from the Select Committee practically as it had entered it. Once more Sir Herbert applied for the suspension of the Rules of Business to admit of the Report being taken into consideration immediately, and once more they were suspended. It was only when the Report was taken into consideration that the Hon. Mr. Gokhale explained the surprising silence and ultimate acquiescence of the non-official Members of the Council. After justifying in a semi-apologetic manner the minute of dissent which he and the Hon. Mr. Madhokar had appended to the Report of the Select Committee, Mr. Gokhale said:

My Lord, in ordinary times I should have deemed it my duty to resist such proposals to the utmost of my power. The risks involved in them are grave and obvious. But in view of the situation that exists in several parts of the country to-day, I have reluctantly come, after a careful and anxious consideration, to the conclusion that I should not be justified in opposing the principle of this Bill. It is not merely the assassinations that have taken place, or the conspiracies that have come to light, or the political atrocities that are being committed that fill me with anxiety. The air in many places is still thick with ideas that are undoubtedly antagonistic to the unquestioned continuance of British rule with which our hopes of a peaceful evolution are bound up; and this is a feature of the situation quite as serious as anything else. There is no doubt that even if the powers conferred by the Bill are exercised judiciously, some inconvenience and even hardship is inevitable to well-intentioned concerns. And if the powers are not exercised with care, great harm is bound to follow. Moreover, as long as the law continues in force, even the best Indian concerns must work in an atmosphere of uncertainty and apprehension. But all these risks may be temporarily borne if they help in some measure to free the air of ideas of which I have spoken.

Even in a country in which true patriotism has to appear before the bureaucracy with bowed head and humble mien, while lip-loyalty stalks proudly to the accompaniment of a beat of drums and a flourish of trumpets, every subsequent speaker who could be expected to have the courage of his convictions offered the same explanation of his support of the Bill. As the concluding speech of the Viceroy clearly shows, the support of the Bill was understood by Government to "furnish the proof . . . that increased representation of Indian interests and communities would not weaken, but would vastly strengthen British administration." Such a criterion of loyalty deprives voting of much of its significance. But partly through our national timidity, and partly through the intensity of our desire to convince Englishmen of our loyalty, we submit to this unfair test and vote for measures in the efficacy of which we have no faith. It is now well known that the murder of Deputy Superintendent Shams-ul-Alam in the High Court of Calcutta in broad day-light induced the then Law Member, Mr. S. P. Sinha to continue in office, although it is an open secret that he did not favour the Bill. We have a recent instance of the same political gaucherie of our Councillors in their reluctant acquiescence in the Conspiracy Bill introduced in the Session following the foul tragedy of the 23rd December, 1912, when the life of His Excellency Lord Hardinge was attempted on the occasion of his State Entry into this historic capital of India.

We must not, however, wander any further from our subject. It is no longer a matter of speculation, as it was to Mr. Gokhale on the 8th of February, whether the extraordinary powers conferred by the Press Bill would be exercised judiciously, entailing only "some inevitable inconvenience and even hardship to well-intentioned concerns," or would be exercised without care and would thereby result in "great harm." It is now possible to give not only an exposition of the expectations held out by the absence of some ugly features of repressive Press legislation and the provision in the Act of judicial checks upon hasty or improper executive action, but also to discuss the way in which those expectations have been proved by experience to have been vain and the manner in which the judiciary has declared the safe-guards to be illusory and incapable of being enforced.

To begin at the very beginning, it was proudly claimed by Sir Herbert Risley that the Bill, in the first place, did not create a Censorship. "It imposes no antecedent restraint on the Press: a man may publish what he pleases; he has the widest range for every form of intellectual activity within the limits laid down by the law." Secondly, it was claimed that it was not, like the Press Act of 1878, "a purely executive measure." "The initiative," said Sir Herbert, "indeed, rests with the Executive Government, but ample security against hasty or arbitrary action is provided in the form of what is virtually an appeal to a highly competent judicial authority." Thirdly, it was declared with much show of pride, the Bill was not "a measure of universal licensing with power to the Government to withdraw or refuse a license at discretion." "The liberty of unlicensed printing," said self-conscious virtue, "for which Milton pleaded three centuries and a half ago, and at the time pleaded in vain, is untouched by this Bill." All that the Bill did, according to its author, was to demand security from the journalist or printer "in the interests of the community in order to guarantee that those who undertake for the first time the important task of instructing the people regarding public affairs shall at any rate be fully aware of the responsibility they incur."

Now, as regards the absence of a Censorship, it is true that the Act of 1910 is an improvement on its short-lived predecessor of 1878; but it is just as well to remember that in this there was less virtue than necessity. In according his sanction to the Vernacular Press Bill, the Secretary of State had expressed an opinion that the clauses providing for Censorship were liable to abuse, and although the Government of India had sinned in a hurry in retaining those clauses while passing the Bill in one sitting, they repented at leisure, and on the 16th October, 1878, brought in and passed an amending Bill for removing all provisions relating to Censorship. In this connection, Sir Herbert Risley himself referred to the provision of Censorship as "impracticable," and thus reduced the boast to the more modest dimensions of a confession.

We shall deal later with the question whether "the limits laid down by the law" did or did not confine Sir Herbert Risley's "widest range for every form of intellectual activity" within the exceedingly narrow compass of eternally praising the acts and policies of all officials. But we think it is in public interest to give some idea of the absence of "antecedent restraints on the Press" when translated into the daily life of a journalist in these days. He writes a restrained and remarkably respectful critique on the work of a Provincial satrap and a high Police dignitary which rouses gubernatorial gorge and offends the highly developed susceptibilities of the Police official. A co-religionist of the editor in the C. I. D. comes to him the next day in the unquestionable shape of a sympathiser and a friend in need. What has the Editor done? How does he propose to escape? Done? Escape? What does the man mean? Why, does not the Editor know that there is such a thing as the Press Act which empowers Government to demand a heavy security without any time limit for the bond, without recourse to a law court—where lawyers could be engaged, evidence heard on both sides, cross-examination and arguments indulged in to one's heart's content—and without appeal to any tribunal? Does he not know that the journalist is in this matter in a worse position than a confirmed criminal? Caste? Of course, he would lose caste, and naturally his movements henceforward would acquire a new interest for the C. I. D. What else did he think? Had he been living in a fool's paradise all this time? What to do now? Well, it was a very difficult and a very delicate matter. As a co-religionist and friend the visitor would do what he could in the matter. On the whole—and this comes after a judicious pause to show the extempore character of the suggestion—it would be just as well if the Editor called on the Police dignitary, sought his advice and offered to keep out such matter from his paper in the future. In the meantime the visitor would try to appease his superior. The unsuspecting Editor calls on the Police dignitary the very next day. He basks in the sunshine of the office verandah for an hour or more and is then admitted into the presence of an officer who is as frigid as an iceberg, and as rigid as if he had swallowed a poker at breakfast. The Editor mumbles and mutters his regrets to begin with, then plucks up courage to ask the dignitary's advice, and ends with an abject promise never to do it again. The Police dignitary puts on an extra shade of seriousness on the situation, accepts the apology with evident reluctance, and finally warns the Editor in pulpit accents. The Editor returns home a wiser, if also a sadder man, and ruminates over the assurance of Sir Herbert Risley that he is as free as the air and "has the widest range for every form of intellectual activity." Oh, no, we have no Censorship in these days. The provisions of the Act of 1878 were "impracticable," and—present day administrators are practical men.

The Indian Moslem's Tasks.

III.

A few months ago we had undertaken a brief survey of Moslem affairs in India with a view to indicate the directions in which the united efforts and energy of the community should be applied. Certain events, however, of more immediate concern, which happened in quick succession, obliged us to defer till now the detailed consideration of the problems arising out of the subject. In the first article some considerations were set forth which emphasised the need of such a survey. We said that the Mussalmans of India were just emerging from a period of stress and storm and that the future was full of uncertainties, if not of perils. In the plastic state of mood and feelings in which the Mussalmans find themselves prompt and well-directed efforts have got to be made to create a new unity of purpose and to clear the path ahead. As we said, the past has been crowded with events, and the experiences of the Mussalmans are, if they only knew, a powerful challenge. They have to take stock of the present situation, and restate their purpose and brace themselves up for a long spell of sustained endeavour. We indicated in bare outline the character and range of the great tasks which awaited them. The first great task for them is unquestionably to provide themselves with adequate intellectual and moral equipment to preserve their status and individuality amongst the progressive races of India. In this connection we made some general observations in the second article and briefly outlined the position of the Mussalmans in the matter of communal education. The question, however, is of such fundamental importance that we cannot leave it without further examination.

The first thing that should strike the educational reformer amongst the Mussalmans is the attitude of the bulk of the community towards education generally. No doubt a considerable demand for modern education has grown up amongst the Mussalmans in recent years. Economic causes are ruthless in their operation, and the Indian Moslems, in spite of their proud and sullen temper of some decades ago, have been driven to recognise that they will have to adapt themselves to modern conditions if they want to live. The desire for education as it exists amongst the Mussalmans to-day is, therefore, no more than a concession to the grim forces which embody the physical appetites of mankind. The desire is right and irreproachable so far as it goes; but it does not afford much help in evolving general standards for the organisation of Moslem education. It breeds no ideal and indicates no direction along which the whole community should move. Communities cannot live by bread alone any more than individuals. They must have some great fertilising purpose to make their lives worth living. The satisfaction of physical appetites is not achieved through a high purpose worthy of the higher man, but through an imperious, animal instinct. If Moslem education is to remain a merely bread-winning device, its organisation on communal lines would be an expensive futility. There are, we allow, enough men amongst the Mussalmans who talk frequently of types and ideals in regard to Moslem education. Most of them are men who had burnt their rush-lights at the lamp lit by the late Sir Syed Ahmad in the seventies. Their talk is usually brave and pleasing; but when they come to formulate their ideals in definite terms they break down in confusion in the majority of cases. The fact is, though a right instinct early saved the Mussalmans from accepting the gross material values which modern secular teaching of the West tends to place on life, they have evolved no values of their own. They have yet a hazy sense of something they need. Their ideals have not yet taken shape and emerged from the cloudland.

Most of the existing vagueness and confusion is no doubt due to the conditions obtaining in this country. The Moslem educational problem is in one essential respect part of the larger problem of Indian education. Its main difficulties arise from the circumstance that the Indian society has to take its new life and vigour in an atmosphere of alien culture and through the inspiration of an alien civilisation. Those who describe this as an experiment, give but an imperfect idea of their sense of risk and adventure. Western education in India is, as a matter of fact, an experiment only in the sense that its result are not yet definite and assured. Its full significance, however, can be grasped only when we try to know what it really is—a fixed, arbitrary, irrevocable mould through which the growing mind of India has to pass. The evil effects of this artificial process have not become so glaring because the Indian mind, thanks to its innate vitality and nimbleness, has escaped without much violence through the iron standardising of mind that is going on in Indian schools and colleges. All the thoughtful Indian observers are becoming increasingly conscious of the waste, the injury and the make-believe that this process perpetuates. The Government is also beginning to perceive in its own way that the ideals and methods of Indian education are not what they ought to be. The true solution of the problem would be reached when the process named above comes finally and absolutely to an end. To state it more plainly, education in India can be a real and vitalising thing only by its becoming national.

All education in its essence aims at the equipment of the rising generation with the full experience of the race. The people of India will have to assimilate accumulated human experience and make it a part of their consciousness if they aspire to become great, free and powerful. But the process of assimilation will never effectively set in as long as the direction of Indian education remains a jealous concern of the State. What makes the Indian problem an almost unique phenomenon in the history of the world is that the State is not the natural expression of the will of the people. It enjoys a measure of confidence and a larger measure of acquiescence of the governed; but it has nevertheless no roots in the soil. Through an accident of history, or what may be more aptly called a dispensation of Providence, the British have come to govern India with the great ideals of the West. They have given peace and enlightenment to the land and have ensured the essential conditions of progress and material well-being. The Indian people have found in the new environment their main chance for self-development. They have now reached a stage when they keenly feel that their further intellectual and social development depends on the degree of control they are allowed to exercise in the direction of Indian education. If the ideas of the West are to become not a dead-weight but an inspiration to the Indian mind, the education of the coming generations should be allowed to develop on national lines. The experiences of the West would sink into a mere mimicry if the people of India are not permitted to develop any intellectual initiative. They alone know their needs, and now, two generations after the foundation of the first University in India for imparting instruction in European literature, philosophy and science, Indians are to a great extent in a position to adapt the Western teaching to their own conditions. They have to recover their genius and the faculty of self-adjustment, and this they can never do unless they are free to build up a thoroughly national system of education.

These observations apply with equal force to all the different communities of India. The Mussalmans should evolve a system of communal education based on their distinctive needs. The proposed Moslem University is an attempt to solve only a part of the problem of Moslem education. The need for the organisation of primary and secondary education is even more insistent. And then there is the growing necessity of making provision for technical and industrial training which should equip a large number of Moslem youths annually to take part in the economic development of the country. But the most important and insistent need is the elaboration of ways and means for the education of Moslem girls. This is a problem to which little attention commensurate with its urgency has been directed. Those, however, who have any insight into the condition of modern progress may realise how far the problem of Moslem advancement as a whole depends on the organisation of women's education. In itself it is a vast subject, but the peculiarities of the Moslem social system render it an anxious problem. We shall discuss the subject, with reference to the facts of the situation in our next, and consider the lines along which progress appears to be possible.

Return of the Moslem Mission.

I.

It was expected that Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali would land at Bombay on the 19th December, and had received at Aden a request from the Anjuman-i-Zia-ul-Islam of Bombay to address a public meeting on the subject of their work in England on the evening of the 19th. But owing to delays on the way due to the heavy Christmas Mail which that boat was carrying she could not land her passengers before the morning of 20th December. When the delegates reached the Pier their numerous friends and a large number of other Mussalmans welcomed them and placed garlands round their necks. They called the same morning on the Hon. Mr. Claude Hill, Member of the Executive Council of the Governor of Bombay by invitation, a visit which they repeated the next day. In the afternoon they went to meet the Hon. Mr. Gokhale at a meeting of the Bombay Presidency Association where the situation in South Africa was discussed. In the evening they addressed a crowded public meeting convened by no less than a score of the leading Mussalmans of Bombay and presided over by Mr. Jinnah, formerly Member of the Imperial Legislative Council. The proceedings of this meeting are reproduced from the Bombay Chronicle, of which the Editor, Mr. Harman, formerly of the Calcutta Statesman expressed regrets at his inability to attend the meeting in the course of a letter welcoming the delegates and complimenting them on their work both in India and England. Next day after their second visit to the Hon. Mr. Claude Hill the delegates were entertained at luncheon at the Orient Club by the Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah, Kt., President-elect of the All-India Muslim League, at which every prominent Bombay Mussalman was present.

ARRIVAL AT DELHI

After meeting a number of their friends at Agra, including Mr. Alay Nabi, President of the United Provinces Muslim League, the delegates travelled on to Delhi where they reached on the afternoon of the 23rd December. Their many friends and other representatives of the Mussalmans of Delhi met them at different stations on the way to Delhi and garlanded them and filled their carriage with flowers. At Delhi, however, nobody was permitted to receive them on the platform by order, as the Railway Officials stated, of the local authorities of Delhi, and even those who travelled with them in the same train were locked in by the police so that the delegates met the large crowd of the inhabitants of Delhi that had come to welcome them outside the Railway station premises. Once outside, however, they were swallowed up in the enormous crowd that was impatiently waiting on the road and in the Queen's Garden. A procession was formed and great efforts were made to take off the horses and let the men pull the carriage of the delegates, but the latter after a time persuaded the people to allow the procession to proceed without unhorsing their carriage. Another extraordinary feature of the arrangements made at Delhi was the order of the police prohibiting the procession from going through the town. It, therefore, proceeded from the station to the Jame' Masjid without entering the town, but in spite of these prohibitions the crowd numbered no less than ten to fifteen thousands. In the mosque they joined the sunset service after which the Shahi Imam, Shams-ul-Ulama Maulvi Syed Ahmed Saheb made a stirring speech welcoming the delegates back to Delhi and strongly repudiating the unfounded contention of some people that they were not the true representatives of Indian Mussalmans in their mission to England. He thanked them for their services in the cause of the Moslem Community and Islam and offered a fervent prayer for the success of their work and their own safety from all kinds of perils. News was brought that the Sangam Theatre, which is the largest hall in Delhi, and had been selected as the place of meeting where the delegates were to address the people of Delhi, was already overcrowded and no room could be found for a much larger gathering that was still in the mosque. On this the assembly in the mosque desired Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali to address them on the spot, an invitation which they declined in view of the arrangements previously advertised. They then proceeded to the Sangam Theatre in company with a number of leading Mussalmans of Delhi headed by the Shahi Imam who was elected to the chair. He recited verses from the Koran and once more welcomed the delegates back to Delhi, after which an address was read by Mr. Abdul Aziz and presented in silver caskets to the two delegates by Dr. Ansari and Dr. Abdur Rahman respectively. They also received silk scarfs from the guild of butchers of Delhi who had closed all the shops for the day in honour of their return. The address was as follows:—

"Our honoured delegates,

"We, the Mussalmans of Delhi, heartily congratulate you on your safe return home, and acknowledge those pure and true services which in this short space of time you have rendered with courage and persistence in spite of various difficulties."

"When you left India the time was one of considerable anxiety, and we the Mussalmans were looked upon with suspicion and misunderstood in a number of ways. It was necessary at the time that our true point of view should be explained and our real feelings interpreted to a people who are entitled to rule over us as a nation. We admire your courage in realizing your duty at such a critical juncture, in ignoring those dangers by which every independent Mussalman seemed to be surrounded, and in giving precedence to the real and true needs of the Community before personal consideration.

"We are sufficiently acquainted with the difficulties and perplexities which beset you in the earlier days of your Mission, but we heartily appreciate the patience, dignity, independence and courage with which you struggled with them, and we congratulate you on the success which you achieved in obtaining the ear of the British public. It is only due to your efforts that people in England have turned their attention towards the intolerable rigours of the Press Act and the necessity of its repeal, and that they have felt the difficulties and afflictions on account of which our Press is now so weak and helpless. The importance and urgency of the work of which you have laid the foundation is now being felt by the entire country and we trust that through its united efforts this intolerable repression will cease for ever.

"We consider the views that you have from time to time expressed on the subject of the mutually tolerant and fraternal relations of Hindus and Mussalmans to be an excellent instance of your appreciation of the needs of the time and of your political astuteness and sagacity, and we believe that the proper appreciation of the principle which you have enunciated will react favourably on the future relations of the two communities. We take this opportunity of acknowledging the loving regard you have shown towards your afflicted brethren in South Africa and your intrepid advocacy of their cause.

"Among all this worry and work, however, the most important and most deserving of appreciation of your successes is that which you have achieved in fully impressing upon the minds of the British people the idea of Moslem brotherhood and that everlasting feeling of oneness which the Mussalmans of one country entertain towards Mussalmans of another. And you have also proved that our Islamic sympathy and our religious sentiment are not inconsistent with our loyalty, and that it is the duty of those responsible for the government of Great Britain to give them due consideration.

"In conclusion, we offer thanks to Him who unites the separated, who has once more brought you among us, and we pray to God to keep you firmly on the path of truth, righteousness, independence and integrity. May you be the pride of your country and your community, and may you have occasions of rendering still greater public services."

BOMBAY MEETING.

We give below the proceedings of the meeting held under the auspices of the Anjuman-i-Zia-ul-Islam of Bombay and reserve for a subsequent issue the speeches made by the delegates at Delhi, Lucknow and Cawnpore and an account of the enthusiastic reception accorded to them by thousands of people who filled the Railway Stations, lined public roads and crowded the Shamiana and the Hall where they addressed the people.

At Bombay, the proceedings began with a recital of a passage from the Koran invoking blessings, and various telegrams and letters sympathising with the meeting and welcoming the delegates were read. The chairman then addressed the meeting.

THE CHAIRMAN'S SPEECH.

He said: Gentlemen,—I thank you and the Zia-ul-Islam for the honour you have done to me in asking me to take the presidential chair this evening. This meeting is called with the object of receiving Messrs. Wazir Hassan and Mahomed Ali, who are well known to you, on their return from England, and to give them an opportunity to place before us and the public, the report of their work in England in connection with their recent mission to England. Before I call upon them to address you I should like to say a few words.

We all know that the immediate issue for their departure to England was the Cawnpore Mosque Case which had assumed a very serious aspect indeed; but which, thanks to the high statesmanship and great foresight of our Viceroy Lord Hardinge, was grappled by him without any loss of time and settled in a most satisfactory manner. I think I am only echoing the feelings of every Mussalman from one end of the country to the other when I say that we are sincerely grateful to him and it is most fortunate that we have the Viceroy like Lord Hardinge at the head of the Government of India. His policy and attitude on most important questions has been such that he has won the hearts of the people of the country, Hindus and Mahomedans alike, and that seems to me to be the right key to the good Government of any country. I hope I am not transgressing from the purpose of the meeting in expressing our most heart-felt and sincere thanks to H. E. the Viceroy for his most sympathetic and wise pronouncement on the South African Indian question recently at Madras. I will only say this that by this he has rendered not only the greatest service to us in our struggle for justice and humanity there but to the whole of the British Empire at large.

GROUNDLESS MISLEADING AND FALSE REPORTS.

Now coming to the object of this meeting, I would like to say that at the present moment the political atmosphere with regard to the Mussalmans of India in our own country as well as in England is surcharged with groundless, misleading and false reports. Let me at once say that Mussalmans have the same respect for and confidence in the Government as they ever had, and nothing is further from their mind that is to embarrass the Government, much less to undermine the Government as is declared and repeatedly alleged in certain quarters falsely. It is a base vilification and slander upon the fair name of Aligarh to say that the young men of Aligarh are disloyal. It is a libel upon the most cultured and educated class amongst the Mussalmans who are true and loyal subjects of H. M. the King-Emperor.

NO LONGER A DICTATORIAL POLICY.

The fact is that the Mahomedans have passed the stage of political infancy and have grown up to the stage of manhood and therefore can no longer be controlled by dictatorial policy from without or within. They will not obey even the semi-dictatorial policy of a few individual leaders as they did a few years ago.

NOT BLIND SUBMISSION, BUT INTELLIGENT AGREEMENT.

There comes a stage in the development of people when the Government has to consult the people and to take them into their confidence before they adopt a particular measure or policy, and in India that stage has been reached. The Government of India can be carried on successfully now on the lines of partnership between the English and the Indians as was explained by Mr. Montagu, the Under Secretary of State for India in the House of Commons at this Budget debate this year and not on the old lines of command and order by the English and mute obedience by the Indians. In other words not blind submission to, but what is required is intelligent agreement of the people with the Government.

A MISCHIEVOUS GAME

The necessary corollary of this situation is that you must respect and consider the opinion of the people of India and tolerate their criticisms. It is no use turning this legitimate frame of mind of the people, which is the outcome of education and enlightenment into sedition and disloyalty when no such thing really exists. It is no use deriding at the opinions and criticisms of the people or treating them with contempt. It is no use saying that it is only the opinions of young and hot-headed and then trying to minimise the weight of it. These are false methods and will not stand long. Because in the end truth and reason must prevail. Let it be realised that among the Mahomedans there is no such thing as "split." There is no such thing as two parties—the young and old. I know that some people would like very much to see that there were such a thing as "split" but let us hope that Providence will disappoint them. I make bold to say that the Mussalman community was never more united or at one on all the fundamental questions of policy and principle than it is to-day. Differences of details there are and will be, as you find all over the world amongst the most highly organised nations. Besides, it will be a very unique community indeed, consisting of 70 millions of people, if there were no such differences. I would therefore appeal to those people who do and will try to make out that there are two parties or that there is a split not to indulge in this game. It is most mischievous and fraught with most serious consequences.

THE LONDON BRANCH AND THE CENTRAL LEAGUE

There are two incidents worthy of notice which took place in England while Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mahomed Ali were there. One was the controversy between them and the Right Honourable Mr. Ameer Ali. I do not wish to revive the matter as it is closed now, but it has raised a question of the greatest importance to us, viz., whether the London League is to be subordinate to the Central League or co-ordinate with, or independent of it. This question no doubt will be considered at Agra shortly when the All-India Moslem League will meet on the 30th of December 1918.

DENIAL OF MOST ELEMENTARY RIGHT.

The other is the refusal of the Secretary of State for India to grant private interview to Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mahomed Ali. With the greatest respect for Lord Crewe, it seems a denial of a most elementary right of representative men to whom the Secretary of State should always be accessible. But perhaps it was due to some under-current which His Lordship did not quite realise at the time. Let us hope that this will not form a precedent.

THE PRESS ACT

It must be remembered that Messrs. Mahomed Ali and Wazir Hasan went to England at a time when Northern India particularly was electrified by the situation in Europe, viz., Turco-Balkan War. On the top of that came the Cawnpore Mosque case and the treatment of some section of the Mussalman press by the Government in demanding securities and forfeiting them under the Press Act, and the general attitude of the Government for the moment in that part was such that the most conservative and orthodox man in the community was roused to a sense of indignation that knew no bound. But we are all very happy indeed to find that the situation has now changed. The war is fortunately ended. The Cawnpore Mosque matter was so unguaranteedly settled by H. E. the Viceroy. But there still remains the question of the Press Act. If it can be worked as oppressively as it was during the recent events I have referred to, and the power of the High Court under the Act when put to the test of a judicial decision has proved futile, as it was so laid down by the Judges of the Calcutta High Court, is it not the duty of the Government and the people alike to consider how this Act can be put right in the light of what has happened in the past? No doubt this question of the Press Act will be taken up by the Indian National Congress at Karachi and the All-India Moslem League at Agra, this month, and will be considered by these two, the most representative organizations in the country. I would however like to point out to our people that moderation and sobriety should be the guiding principles to our public utterances whether in speech or print. It lends dignity and adds strength to a good cause; too strong a language and rashness spoils a really good cause. But this must be observed by all sides equally. At the same time I have always maintained that it is the duty of every honest citizen to fearlessly and independently point out to the Government what our complaints are and appeal for redress. It is the duty of every right-minded citizen to criticise and oppose a measure of the Government if he is so convinced.

APPEAL FOR UNITY.

In conclusion, gentlemen let me tell you that the present situation is most critical. All the Mahomedan forces should be brought together and firmly united. Let not differences appear on the surface where no differences really exist. Let us not think so much of the past or live on the past history and glory. Realize the present and prepare to improve the future. Salvation of India lies in the true union of the people, and her onward march of progress depends upon constitutional and constructive methods. When England and America think of the Union of the Anglo-Saxon race all over the world—when you find the "Entente Cordiale" between England and France an accomplished fact—when you find that Europe consisting of different nationalities and powers can maintain what was known as the "Concert of Powers" during the recent war, is it too much to ask and appeal to Hindus and Mahomedans, the two great communities in India, to combine in one harmonious union for the common good where we have to live together in every district, town and hamlet, where our daily life is interwoven with each other in every square mile of one common country? This is the problem of all problems that India wants a statesman to solve, and when that is solved, true advance and real progress can be achieved.

I now call upon Mr. Wazir Hasan and Mr. Mohamed Ali to give an account of their mission to England.

Mr. Wazir Hasan's Criticisms.

WORK OF THE MISSION.

Mr. Wazir Hasan, who received quite an ovation on rising to speak, made a very stirring speech in Urdu, which was most remarkable alike for its lucidity and its scathing comments and which was very often greeted with cheers. He prefaced his remarks by outlining the recent events that had stirred the Mussalmans of India.

namely, the reversal of the partition of Bengal, which, partly because it appeared a sister community, and partly because it held out a pledge of provincial autonomy, the Mahomedans acquiesced in without much complaint; the Italian raid on Tripoli; the Russian advance in Persia with its attendant horrors such as the bombardment of the Mausoleum of the Holy Imam at Meshed; the French activity in Morocco; the outbreak of the Balkan war, which the Turks were promised would not break out; the atrocities perpetrated by the Balkan allies which were allowed to continue unchecked; and finally the deplorable and distressing events at Cawnpore; and remarked that all these made the Mahomedans of India miserable, and when their position became critical, it was the inspiration of Mr. Mohamed Ali which led to their decision to proceed to England for the solution of their difficulties.

The speaker then proceeded to give a brief account of the steps which they had taken in England with a view to solve these difficulties and observed that fresh difficulties were placed there in their way. He referred to what he called a malicious libel against the younger Mahomedans which appeared in the London Times a fortnight after their arrival in England and which, he said, was intended to prejudice the British public against them. He also referred to the desire of His Highness the Aga Khan, of whose disinterested zeal for the community he spoke in most eulogistic terms, to find an occasion for the removal of the misunderstanding sedulously sought to be created by the Times by means of false charges made by its correspondents.

THE HISTORY OF THE DINNER.

This introduced the subject of the projected dinner which His Highness the Aga Khan himself suggested to give to the speaker and Mr. Mohamed Ali, and he pointed out how, at first, want of sympathy, then procrastination, and, finally, the publication of the garbled version of the correspondence on the part of Mr. Ameer Ali, accompanied by his uncalled-for resignation upset their programme of work. In this connection he made scathing remarks about the comments of some of the Anglo-Indian papers and particularly the Times of India, whom he reminded that after all the animals of the Zoo, which according to that journal had wanted to be publicly fed, were lions, and that it must not be too sure of its own safety behind the bars, for if somehow these lions managed to come out of the cage, the question would be who should form their first tasty morsel, and he thought that it was not unlikely that the Times of India would prove sufficiently tender and succulent.

THEIR MOTIVES QUESTIONED.

The speaker then proceeded to discuss the question whether there was a young party of extremists among the Mohamedans, and he wanted its views to be pointed out to him in its own words so that he could find an indication where to draw a line between moderation and extremism, old Mohamedans and young Mohamedans. At present all that had happened, he said, was that all the Mohamedans felt equally miserable, and while one class among them who had understood the true nature of the British people, openly showed its misery, the other, suspecting the British, kept his grief to himself and only let it increase in the process of nursing it secretly. This was sometimes due to suspicious libellous to the British character, and sometimes due to a desire to gain the rewards of moderation in the shape of titles and similar other official recognitions. But he wanted to know how this class of people could be called by the British themselves more loyal than the others. In any case, he said, he was prepared to face calumny and suspicion on the part of others, but he wanted that if he had erred in carrying out the wishes of his community his punishment should be meted out to him by his own people and not through outsiders. He regarded his own people as the final judges from whose verdict he could never appeal.

As regards the success or want of success of the mission, he assured the meeting that they had done what they could under the circumstances that were created for them, and in the short time at their disposal, and he urged upon them that, even if there were seventy doors locked against them it was their duty to knock at each of them until they were opened, and he assured those who thought that they had succeeded in closing the official door against them that they must not believe that they were now left in peace for ever, for they were going to recommence their efforts as soon as possible, and he knew not any official door that could withstand their incessant knocking.

Mr. Mohamed Ali's Speech.

SIX OUTSTANDING QUESTIONS.

Mr. Mohamed Ali was then called upon to give a brief account and he too was accorded a similar welcome by the meeting. He started by apologising to the meeting for the lateness of the hour, for it was then already half past eleven o'clock, and continued his speech in Urdu. He said neither he nor Mr. Wazir Hussain had slept a wink on the preceding night for they were both watching with great eagerness the lights of Bombay. Although on the first occasion he had returned from England after an absence of three and a half years he did not watch for the first sight of Bombay with that feverish restlessness with which he sat on the deck on the previous night when he was returning after an absence of only three and a half months. This was not because he was any more anxious now to meet his own family, many of whom had learnt of his departure after he had gone, but because throughout their work in England, what troubled them most was not what the Times or its understudy in India, the Times of India published, but the fact that they could not see what effect these publications had on their own people. However, they would have no feverish anxiety now because, at the very gateway of India, this large and enthusiastic gathering made it clear to them what they thought of that mission, its motives and its work. He pointed out, among others, the six questions that were troubling Indian Mohamedans when they left for England. Out of these, the question of Adrianople was settled by the Turks for themselves and immediately on arriving at Paris they had heard the good news from H. M. the Sultan's representative H. E. Rifaat Pasha, Ambassador in Paris. But he wished to point out what very few knew in this country, namely, the assistance that their sympathetic and large-hearted Viceroy had given to them in the solution of this question. He said he was assured that H. E. Lord Hardinge had pointed out to the Secretary of State for India some of the unpleasant consequences of the British foreign policy in connection with Turkey, and it was this telegram which had the effect they all desired. The Cawnpore question again was settled within three weeks of their arrival in England, thanks to the courage and wisdom of the Viceroy, and he assured the meeting that they did not desire to claim the least credit in this matter, and remarked that whatever credit there was, was due to the Viceroy and his confidential advisers and the Cawnpore Mohamedans themselves.

QUESTIONS AFFECTING INDIAN MUSLIMS

The remaining questions were the repeal of the Press Act, of which he had been made a victim; the Muslim University; the separation of the judicial and executive functions; and the extension of Executive Council Government to the remaining provinces in India. On these questions they were invited during their stay in England to write to some of the most distinguished and influential Liberal papers in spite of the boycott in the Tory press which finally broke down; but they were unwilling to discuss these questions publicly unless and until they explained them in the first instance to the Ministers, or, as they found afterwards, the Ministers refused to give them a hearing. They knew what the effect of such a refusal would be in India, and they pointed it out to the Ministers and they were anxious that their request for an interview should not be rejected. They had approached the Ministers most cautiously, and through agencies which they hoped would prove most effective, but in spite of all this, the Ministers would not see them. This took considerable part of their time, over and above the month that was wasted over the controversy which the action of Mr. Ameer Ali and the Times forced upon them, and they had on that account to give up their projected visit to Turkey and Egypt on their return journey. It was only when every effort to place the true Muslim views before the Ministers had failed that they decided to explain them to the British public. Very little time was then left, but they found several opportunities for doing this, and he could say that a good many more people in Great Britain, now knew and felt that there were 70 millions of Muslims subject to His Majesty in India whose opinions really mattered than was the case before they had started on their mission.

As for the Ministers, he would not say much on the subject of their refusal to see them for that might embarrass them even more than the publication of their views in England. He was sorry that the Ministers did not see them, but this much he knew that before long they themselves or some others would return to England and press their suit again, and whatever might be their disappointments to-day, they felt certain that in the end there would be only one result and that a most hopeful one. Although the British press was too much occupied by British sport and the trivialities of British politics, it was not wholly unwilling to lend itself to the publication of genuine Indian and Muslim grievances, and as for the public, if it was ignorant, it was desirous of knowledge if they only assisted it in gaining that knowledge. He had met many people in England who knew nothing about the thousand and one things that agitated the public mind in India, but he had seldom met an Englishman or an Englishwoman who did not sympathise with them when once he or she was placed in possession of facts, and that being the case, if the Indians were not satisfied with making the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy the real sovereign of India, it would be a criminal neglect on their part if they did not adopt every legitimate measure in enlightening the real and ultimate rulers of the Indians on the subject of India.

GRATITUDE TO THE GUESTS.

A resolution was then passed expressing gratitude to the two guests for successfully carrying out the mission they had undertaken on behalf of the community, the chairman personally bearing testimony to the excellent work done by them during his stay in England for a fortnight.

A vote of thanks to the chair terminated the proceedings.

The Indian Peril.

Under this heading the "Times" has published a series of four long contributions dealing with what that journal calls, and would like people in Great Britain to believe to be, "the present situation in India." We regret we are this week unable to reproduce these articles themselves owing to unusual pressure on our space, although they are already in type. But we publish the "Times'" own comments thereon, and the comments of two Liberal Dailies, "the Daily News and Leader" and the "Westminster Gazette." The original series will be published next week. We, however, reproduce the article of "Asiaticus" in the "National Review"—to which we referred in a previous issue—as it is correlated to the "Times" series and evidently has the same object in view.

The Danger in India.

We begin to-day the publication of a short series of articles on the present situation in India, from the pen of one well qualified to discuss the subject in the light of intimate knowledge. Again and again in recent years we have reluctantly felt it our duty to call attention to the dangers which increasingly threaten the security of British rule in India. The series of articles we have from time to time published have been from the pens of various writers, and it may save unprofitable speculation if we say at once that the present series is the work of another but thoroughly experienced hand. We may be asked why we think it necessary continually to revert to the problems of unrest in India. The answer is that though the outward manifestations of unrest are intermittent, yet it is always there, it grows more difficult to deal with as the years pass, and it should steadily be taken into account in any consideration of the future of the British Empire. There was one conspicuous lull in the activities of those in India who are hostile to British rule. They remained comparatively quiet during the year which preceded the visit of the King Emperor and in the year which followed it. The extraordinary and unquestionably sincere expressions of loyalty which attended His Majesty's visit proved that our difficulties in India are not insoluble, and that the strongest link which binds India to Great Britain is the devotion which the people are still willing to accord to a just and beneficent hereditary ruler. Nevertheless we said at the time, and again urge, that the demonstrations which marked His Majesty's visit should not be taken to indicate that unrest is at an end. We predicted that it would again be revealed, and the present series is designed to show the degree to which it has recurred. The first article follows an unusual but appropriate course, for, instead of plunging into the menacing aspects of the situation, it recites very vividly the remarkable accomplishments of British rule. It discloses the steady development period of prosperity, happiness, and peace such as India has never known before. It may truly be said that the people of India were never so well off, never wisely cared for, never so secure, as they are to-day. They are more lightly taxed than any people in the world; they have never until now had such facilities for education; they are the recipients of more benefits from the State at a low cost to themselves than any other Oriental country. Why, then, does discontent among them remain so potent a factor?

The writer of these articles does not attempt to analyse in detail the origins of unrest, about which there has perhaps been much inquiry. The immediate impulses are sufficiently well known, and the underlying fundamental objection to alien control cannot be recognized or admitted while the British Empire in India endures. The purpose of the articles is twofold. The later sections will describe the present character of the movement against British control, and they will discuss the extent to which it is supported. The writer will endeavour to show that the revolutionary agitation—for it is nothing less—is confined to a limited number of literate malcontents, who constitute only a very small proportion of the people of India. They typify the results of a system of Western education crudely absorbed without any of the correctives which operate effectively in the Western world. We are not fully in accord with the conclusions of the writer on this particular point. The kind of criticism which is based upon a counting of heads can very easily be pushed too far. All revolutionary movements have originated among comparatively small groups, and the Indian movement is not less dangerous because the bulk of the people are still outside it, and are likely to remain so. What the writer has to say about the character of the movement is specially interesting. Its propaganda has become intentional in form, the centres from which it is controlled are established in foreign countries, and it seems to command considerable resources. Its outcome is seen, not only in the deeds of violence which have repeatedly startled India, but still more in the insidious attempts to tamper with the faithfulness of the Native Army and to turn schools and colleges into nests of sedition.

After the attempts on the lives of two Viceroy, and the double murder in the heart of London, it ought to be unnecessary to dwell upon the realities of the movement. Yet while these successive outrages were soon forgotten in this country, the slow but steady trickle of news relating to other murders and plots and conspiracies is almost entirely disregarded. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that there are influences now at work in India which may at any time produce the most startling results in a land specially liable to waves of excitement which spread like wildfire.

The writer will deal, further, with other factors now operative in India unconnected with the revolutionary movement, which are producing change not dreamed of five years ago. One of the most remarkable characteristics of modern India is the rapidity with which new situations are created. India is no longer stagnant, no longer a country where conclusions formed ten or twenty years back are necessarily applicable to day. There was very little variation in India during a period of thirty or forty years; but nowadays those who return after an absence of only two or three years sometimes find the situation in many respects almost unrecognizable. The swift alteration in the attitude of the Mahomedans may be noted as an example. Five years ago no one would have considered possible the present combative demeanour of many of the younger Mahomedans, or their new friendship with the Hindu National Congress. There are signs that the hostile elements among Indian Moslems are at last receiving a check, but tendencies have been meanwhile displayed which must henceforth be reckoned with. The excitement about the treatment of Indians in South Africa is more widespread and more formidable. It embraces all classes and communities, and though it implies no disloyalty, it raises issues about the future status of Indians in the Empire which must in time be far more a cause for anxiety to British statesmen than all the bombs ever made and all the plots ever concocted by Indian Anarchists. We wish the Commission, which General Botha has very properly appointed to consider the grievances of Indians in South Africa had included men more widely known throughout the Empire. The stories of ill-treatment are unquestionably exaggerated, but it was very desirable that they should be investigated by Commission whose findings would have been accepted without question in India. The recent financial crisis in Western India and the Punjab will, we fear, add to the complications of a situation already full of troubles. Its consequences are not yet generally discerned. The total losses to investors are believed to amount to many millions. The check to the industrial development of India will be regrettable enough, but the vague discontent likely to be engendered will be of more immediate importance. The writer of the articles reaches certain conclusions which he believes will be useful for future guidance in dealing with Indian affairs, but the most notable piece of advice which he gives is that "you cannot safely think of India in terms of Western conditions." Many of our mistakes in India arise through a failure to observe this wise and salutary admonition.—The Times.

India and South Africa.

We conclude to-day a short series of articles on the perils of the present situation in India. In his final contribution our Correspondent, whose competence and authority are self-evident, draws home the lessons he has throughout endeavoured to teach. "A small section of the population is working, strenuously and successfully, to bring about the alienation of vast, unwieldy masses." That, he says, "is 'the Indian peril,' and if it is not understood in time, there will be a rude awakening." "If these masses are allowed to be alienated, India, he declares, will become ungovernable, and nothing is so certain as that any visible weakening of the British Raj will bring about alienation on a large scale." "It is strength in government which alone attracts support in the East." Our Correspondent appeals to the well-meaning but misguided politicians and publicists at home to do justice to the fellow-countrymen in India and to remember that the great question to be resolved is, "Can a democracy govern a vast Eastern Empire?" In common with most Englishmen who have direct knowledge of the problems of government in the East, we believe that a British democracy can govern our Eastern Empire—on one condition. The condition is that our democracy shall exhibit qualities hitherto inherent in the British character and in harmony with British political ideals. These qualities are fearlessness and justice. India was not won by fear, and cannot be held or ruled pusillanimously. Justice to India implies justice towards 300,000,000 of people "split not only vertically into discordant elements deeply permeated by traditional enmity, but horizontally into thousands of castes, and quickly roused to violent fanaticism"—not merely justice towards a clamorous and superficial minority, whose audacity grows with every sign of administrative weakness. Such justice can only proceed from an India Office and an Indian Government thoroughly British in tradition and instinct. The Indian mind is not to be won nor its allegiance assured by timid attempts to approximate the standards of government to the nostrums of "litterates" who have acquired a veneer of Western civilization. Even the thorny question of the treatment of Indians in South Africa, to which our Correspondent alluded yesterday, can best be handled by a Government which represents the rights and interests of India as a whole, and is not open to suspicion in our self-governing Colonies of being in any way amenable to pressure.

South Africa has still to deal with the problem of her Indian population in its full perplexity. This would seem to be the meaning of the telegrams which we publish to-day as to the expressed intentions of Mr. Gandhi and the other Indian leaders. There had been hopes that the appointment by the South African Government of a Commission to enquire into the recent disturbances in Natal would have convinced the Indian leaders that their best course was to lay their case before the Commission and to await its findings with such confidence as their belief in the justice of their claims inspired. Instead of doing this, they have from the first taken up a position of extreme hostility to the whole enquiry. They question the impartiality of two of the members of the Commission—Mr. Baselen and Mr. Wylie—both distinguished King's Counsel and both unquestionably competent to exercise, as Commissioners, judicial functions irrespective of their personal opinions. They demand that the numbers of the Commissioners shall be increased to five by the addition of Sir James Rose-Innes and Mr. W. P. Schreiner, whom they believe to be favourable to their cause. As far as this demand is concerned, it is probable that the two gentlemen named—whatever their private opinions may be—would not accept appointment as additional members of the Commission. If they did so, they would tacitly endorse the reflections which have been cast upon the impartiality of Mr. Wylie and Mr. Baselen. But the demands of the Indian leaders do not end there. They are said to have declared that— if the Commission is reconstituted as they have suggested—they are prepared to accept its findings as to the allegations of ill-treatment of Indians during the strike; but that they will not allow the recommendations of the Commission—however it may be constituted—to affect their attitude towards the Government. They also claim the immediate release of all Indians who are now in prison for passive resistance. Further if the totality of these demands is not instantly conceded by the Union Government, the Indian leaders threaten an immediate renewal of the passive resistance movement. They have, in fact, issued an ultimatum couched in extreme language—an ultimatum, it may be added, issued in reply to the effort of the people and Government of South Africa to devise by means of a semi-judicial Commission some fair settlement of their grievances. It is clear that the Indians of South Africa have grievances. The tale of them need hardly be recapitulated at this stage. Enlightened public opinion in South Africa has frankly admitted them. The appointment of the Commission was in itself a formal recognition of their existence. But it was much more than this. It showed that General Botha and his colleagues recognized the embarrassing effect of the agitation in South Africa upon the Government of India.

The Commission has already held its first sitting. An announcement then made by the chairman shows that the Commissioners themselves fully recognize the right of the Indian Government to be represented at the enquiry. It is also evident that the Commission is preparing to carry out its duties in a thoroughly judicial spirit. Every facility is to be afforded to the Indian leaders for the preparation of their case. With this object the Commission has recommended the immediate release of those leaders who had been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment for their part in the late disturbances. This recommendation has been accepted by the Government. The leaders concerned have been set free. The enquiry is to be conducted with open doors, and the Chairman has declared that he and his colleagues are ready to receive, through counsel, the representations of the Union Government, the Natal Indian Association, and all other interested public bodies. The work of the Commission, in fact, is already well in train. It is obviously desirable that its findings should be issued as soon as possible. Meanwhile, as we announced yesterday, Sir Benjamin Robinson, a highly-placed official of the Indian Government, is leaving for Durban immediately. It may be conjectured with some confidence that his reception by the South African Commissioners will not be merely that of one who states a case. His knowledge of Indian conditions will make his advice and opinions welcome. Though he has no formal position as a member of the Commission, his actual standing with the Commissioners will be scarcely less important than it would be if he was one of their colleagues. All these facts go to show that there is among the white population of South Africa a genuine desire to compose the Indian grievances. But our Cape Town Correspondent probably does not overstate the facts when he declares that Mr. Gandhi's ultimatum makes it most difficult for any self-respecting Government like that of the Union to treat his demands as a basis for future negotiation.—The Times.

'The Indian Peril.'

John Bright's maxim about "The Times"—that he was never quite sure he was right until that journal said he was wrong—has not lost its value in these days. Indeed, we doubt whether there was ever a period when it was more relevant than it is to-day. Putting aside its monotonous frenzy on the Ulster issue, there have been its curious Mexican campaign with its steady bias against the policy of President Wilson and the United States, and its apologia for the Russian Government published in its recent Russian supplement. Yesterday it started a new crusade of a particularly mischievous kind. It published the first of a series of articles entitled "The Indian Peril" and in its leader columns it was good enough to tell us the purpose of these articles. It is to expose a revolutionary movement in India, to alarm public opinion by re-capitulating "the deeds of violence which have repeatedly startled India" and to show that the movement at present "is confined to a limited number of literate malcontents." All this, we take it, is preliminary to a demand for a revival of the deportations and for new restrictive measures. If this campaign—in which we see the hand of the reactionary influences that played so evil a part in connection with the last period of unrest—is successful there will be an "Indian Peril" indeed, and one from which we shall not emerge so fortunately as we did from the last.

We caution the public to view with the utmost suspicion these stories of a revolutionary movement and these records of violence. There are, of course, fire-brands in India as elsewhere and their most useful agents are the reactionary Anglo-Indians who inspire the Press. But neither among the Hindus nor among the Mohammedans can there be found responsible leaders who are disloyal to the British rule. They know that it is essential to the governance of India and that its withdrawal would be disastrous to their country. They are in a very real sense the bulwark of our policy there. If we lose their confidence in British justice we shall lose the confidence of India. Now it is the chief vice of the policy that "The Times" represents that it drives these men into antagonism to the Government. It was so in the case of the partition of Bengal. Lord Curzon, wittingly or unwittingly, gave the impression that the dismemberment of Bengal was directed against the Hindus, and that his idea was to favour the Mohammedans. Whatever his intention the result was disastrous. The country was swept by a great wave of indignation. The deepest feelings of the people had been outraged, and the measures of repression which the reactionaries here and there urged upon the Government had no effect. A most oppressive Press law was enacted and men were deported without trial and without a fragment of evidence being produced against them. Then, as now, the Tory Press talked of a revolution and ignorantly treated agitation as the work of a few "literate malcontents." Fortunately wiser counsels prevailed. The partition of Bengal was modified, the Morley reforms were granted, and the King paid a memorable and triumphant visit to India. The effect was instant. The agitation was killed by the removal of the grievance and the "Indian peril" subsided through an act of wisdom that restored confidence in British rule.

It might have been supposed that this lesson would have had some effect upon those who are so ready to see in every movement of Indian opinion a new campaign of sedition and revolution. Not so. Having done their best to detach Hindu sympathies, their attention is now turned to the Mohammedans. There has developed in the last two or three years a Mohammedan vernacular Press, which a wise policy would encourage. But the reactionary sympathy with the Mohammedans was subject to the condition that they should not imitate the Hindus by cultivating a public opinion of their own. The emergence of this Press was regarded as a bad sign. Then came the Cawnpore episode and again we heard of the "Indian peril" and of the need of strong measures. But again it was realised that the officials and not the people were in the wrong. The mosque that had been desecrated was restored—after a score of people had been shot dead in the street—and the danger of a grave Mohammedan revolt passed away. But the Mohammedan Press which had voiced the feelings of the people was brought under the penalties of the Press Law. Several of the papers were confiscated and the "good conduct" money they have to deposit was impounded. The incident has left behind a feeling of bitterness, which centres in the reasonable demand that the Press shall not be subject to the petty oppression of an official. In this connection there is the other grave and long standing grievance as to the associations of the executive and the judiciary. The point, however, to remember is this, that in the present case, as in that in Bergal, the agitation is not the outcome of any sympathy with revolution, nor is it the work of those who are disloyal to the British rule. It is the out-come of serious mistakes by the officials, which have had to be publicly repudiated. If we want to avoid an "Indian Peril" we must take care that these mistakes are not made. If we want a real "Indian Peril" we shall treat every protest against injustice as an evidence of sedition and every leader of the people as a "literate malcontent" who must be deported.—The Daily News and Leader.

The Indian Problem.

The Times yesterday concluded a series of articles on what it describes as "The Indian Peril," which wound up with an appeal to "well-meaning but misguided politicians" and "publicists at home" to give over all criticism of administration in India and leave the men on the spot to deal in their own way with agitators and disturbers of the peace. We have read these articles with some care, and as members of the well-meaning but misguided class appealed to, we feel impelled to say that, if they represent the last word of wisdom on the part of the administration, there is an Indian peril, and a very serious one. No Service has had on the whole a freer hand than the Indian Civil Service, and none for a long period of the nineteenth century better justified itself by results. But when this same Service itself tells us that India under its rule is in an alarming state of unrest, we are not only entitled but compelled to seek for reasons, and we shall be very easily satisfied if we permit ourselves to be assured that it is all the fault of a handful of agitators, and that all will be well if we shut our eyes and instruct the Government of India to administer strong doses of press-laws and other resolute specifics suited to a turbulent and ungrateful people. To do the Government of India justice, that is not the opinion of its most enlightened members. There are many men in the Government, and among them some of the most experienced administrators and most careful students of Indian character, who see that conditions in India are changing rapidly, who deplore the estrangement between the Government and the literate Indians, and who believe that it can and must be cured by a constructive and sympathetic policy. These are not mere idealogues who ignore the distinction between East and West, or who fail to see that the numerically small class of educated Indians are not the millions of India. But they do see that in India, as elsewhere, the educated class is a very important class, and that it is immensely desirable for the Government to get and keep in touch with the considerable number of educated men who are or would be well-disposed, if they are treated as friends and not as enemies.

The writer of the Times articles is aware that the literate Indians are a power for mischief. He knows that, though only a small fraction of the three hundred and fifteen millions of India, they can work powerfully on the inarticulate millions, when these are disturbed by famine or plague, by fears about their property or religion. That, indeed, is a basic fact about India. But the idea that it is to be cured by snubbing or repressing the literates is quite futile. Immense mischief has been done by the harsh and contemptuous language which is commonly used both in this country and in India about the Babus, by the habit of treating them as upstarts and interlopers, who have no concern with the dealing of the Raj with the millions of India. After all, they are in a special sense our product, and their education is the education which we have introduced into India. Their failure, if it is a failure, is our failure, and it is our duty to repair it. Many of them are men of great intellectual ability and genuine patriotism; and if the new wine of western culture has gone to the heads of some of them, that is no peculiarity of India. The same may be said of the young Japanese, whom we treat with such respect, and young Chinaman. Young India, in this sense, may be a small minority as compared with the millions of peasants, but it is far too big to be suppressed, and any anti-literate policy, such as this correspondent seems to recommend, will merely result in driving the mischief beneath the surface. The young men will pass from the moderate party to the anarchist; more bombs will be thrown; unrest among the peasantry, so far from being cured, will increase mysteriously, and in ways which the Government will be unable to check.

It is related that when the Chinese mandarins met at Peking after the disastrous war with Japan, they said to one another, "This is what comes of using modern weapons." We are quite aware that there are Indian civilians of the old school who hold exactly this language about India. "If only," they say, "we had been allowed to go our own way, without any of this infernal dictation from Westminster, if only Lord Morley had never existed, and the "Radical Party could be abolished, how different it would have been." And yet the same people will tell us that the worst year of unrest was the year which followed the long Conservative regime, the year before Lord Morely had introduced his reforms. We can imagine nothing more dangerous in the present state of India than a reversion to what are called the old ways. India, by the admission of those who know it best, is changing so rapidly that men who have been a few years away from the scene scarcely know it when they return. There can be no safety in such circumstances for any Government which is not flexible, youthful, and hopeful. The task is immensely complicated, but also of fascinating interest. The old formulas which applied to the period of conquest and settlement will not serve for the period of development under modern conditions. Benevolent autocrats ruling over children must give way to sympathetic guardians who will take the growing sons into partnership. The problem must be solved that way or not at all. We may anathematise the young Indians, wish them differently made or at the bottom of the sea, but they are there and will be there in increasing numbers. If we cannot conciliate them, they will sooner or later raise the millions against us.

We do not share the alarms of the Times correspondent. The problem is certainly more difficult than it was twenty years ago, and we must not expect dumb admiration and acquiescence from active and intelligent men to whom our rule is alien. We must make our rule as little alien as possible, and that primarily means breaking down the racial estrangement which is the curse of India and a more fruitful cause of unrest than all other causes put together. The new India which is growing up will not submit to the hard line between the ruling caste and the ruled which is insisted upon by much Anglo-Indian opinion. Old observers tell us that this has increased rather than diminished in recent years. The Indian civilian of modern times is more than his predecessor a sojourner in a strange land instead of a resident and a neighbour. We must alter that if we can, and refresh the Service with a more flexible type of men who will see the Indian problem as constructive and progressive and cut themselves loose from outworn traditions which have come down from the period of conquest.—The Westminster Gazette.

The Mohamedan Danger.

Less than ten years ago we were accustomed to think of the Mohamedans of India as the most loyal and peaceful community in the Dependency. They had their little outbursts sometimes, but always during their religious festivals, when they came into conflict with Hindus. There were on such occasions a few broken heads, a few repressive movements by the local police, and perhaps a minor trial ending in a few mild sentences. The quarrels of Mohamedans with the Hindus revealed no symptom of antagonism to British rule. So settled became the belief in Moslem docility that British administrators forgot the experiences of their predecessors. They never quite realised that confidence in Mohamedan tendencies was of comparatively modern growth. Yet in 1871 so competent an observer of the late Sir William Hunter wrote a book entitled The Indian Mussalmans, which contained in its opening pages these words:

The Mussalmans of India are, and have been for many years, a source of chronic danger to the British power in India. For some reason or other they hold aloof from our system, and the changes in which the more flexible Hindus have cheerfully acquiesced, are regarded by them as deep personal wrongs.

In the past eighteen months the faith of the Government of India in the tractability of the Mohamedans has been very rudely shaken. We have seen the Moslem League joining in the agitation for self-government, and openly associating itself with the propaganda of the Hindu Congress. We have seen Mussalman speakers making very foolish and inflammatory speeches about the Balkan War, and apparently expecting Great Britain to crusade in behalf of Turkey. We have seen a little dispute about the out-buildings of a Mosque at Cawnpore develop into a grave riot, in which many were killed and injured, while the whole of Moslem India waxed excited about a trivial controversy which would have attracted no attention whatever half a dozen years ago. Finally, we have seen the Aga Khan resign the presidency of the Moslem League, and Mr. Ameer Ali retire from the London branch, leaving the Mussalman movement in both countries to the guidance of less cautious and far more inexperienced hands. It is instructive to examine these occurrences and to endeavour to ascertain their origin.

In the March number of the National Review I discussed at length the new unrest among Indian Mohamedans, and when thus dealing with its earlier phases had no conception that it would so soon require further discussion. For an explanation of the closer relations now subsisting between the Hindu and Mohamedan political movements my readers may be referred to my previous article. It is convenient to take up the story afresh with the Cawnpore riots, which have an interest far exceeding their immediate magnitude. The Cawnpore disturbances repay close study, for they show exactly how grave trouble will arise in India if it ever comes. I once asked a very great and experienced soldier what his views were about the possibility of a rising in India. He said: "If we ever have one again, I am quite sure it will begin from some totally unforeseen and probably entirely trivial cause. It will be produced by some silly story which we cannot stop, or by some paltry occurrence to which we shall attach no importance. Such a rumour or incident would not be the real cause of the rising, but it will serve to start it." The Cawnpore riots sprang from just such a source. They began in connection with the tiny washing-place of an obscure mosque, and the story of that washing-place reverberated throughout India until it inflamed millions of Mohamedans and produced dozens of truculent mass meetings.

The blame for the Cawnpore trouble does not rest upon Moslems alone. It seems reasonably clear that the local authorities, and still more the United Provinces Government, were not entirely free from fault. So long ago as 1909 the Municipal Board of Cawnpore innocently decided to make a new road through the Machhli Bazaar quarter of the city. Its plans included the demolition of many buildings, and it is said that the original scheme would have involved the removal of three Mohamedan mosques and two Hindu temples. The scheme was afterwards modified, and it was proposed to acquire for the purposes of the road only a small portion of the courtyard of the Machhli Bazaar mosque, together with a little washing-place or bath-room which did not form part of the main building. The mosque authorities were duly notified, and at first made no objection. It is a very open question whether this wash-house was technically a sacred place or not. As a layman, with some experience of mosques, I should say that it had no genuine sanctity whatever. Various Mohamedans of high position who were consulted at a later period by Sir James Meston, the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces, advised him that it "had not the same sanctity as the place of worship proper." Eminent interpreters of Moslem law and custom have since invested this trivial wash-house with the most sacred character; yet it was a spot where shoes might be worn, and all familiar with Moslem places of worship will know the distinction thereby implied. The fact is that the law-givers of Islam are sometimes very ready to frame rulings to suit their own requirements.

For three years the matter seems to have attracted little public attention, but towards the end of 1912 many Hindus of Cawnpore protested against a proposal, which formed part of the road-making scheme, to remove one of their temples. Sir James Meston went to Cawnpore in November, discussed the question with prominent Hindus, and agreed that the temple should not be disturbed. His visit seems to have caused the Mohamedans of the city to turn their attention to the Machhli Bazaar mosque. The Mohamedan representatives on the Municipal Board brought the question before that body in March, and at their instance the Board sent to the provincial Government a recommendation "that no portion of the mosque be acquired, in defence to the wishes of the Mohamedan community." The Government declined to accept the recommendation. A further attempt in May to pass a resolution asking the Government to reconsider its decision was defeated by the casting vote of the chairman of the Board. An amendment accepting the Government's decision as final was carried by the same single vote. A deputation of Mohamedans waited on the Collector of Cawnpore, but without result. Two memorials were submitted to the Lieutenant-Governor, and backed by Mohamedans notables, but they were both rejected. On July 1 the wash-house was demolished by the local authorities, and then the trouble began.

As to this portion of the narrative, it must be said that the provincial Government and the local authorities were both to blame because they did not set about their undertaking in the right way. There are diplomatic methods of adjusting such little difficulties which are well understood in India. A conciliatory official would assuredly have managed to build a new wash-house first, and then, after a suitable interval, would have obtained the consent of the users of the mosque to the removal of the old one. The Government was wrong because it did not perceive how easily this small grievance might be magnified. It should have paid more heed to the Mohamedan protests, however trifling the matter seemed. Sir James Meston has explained that he was influenced by the opinions of the Mussalmans he consulted, who doubted whether the wash-house was part of the sacred buildings; and he was still more influenced by the fact that similar alterations had recently been made in mosques at Lucknow with the consent of the local Moslems and without complaint. These are reasonable grounds to advance, but they do not remove the impression that between March and July the Cawnpore case was not very judiciously handled.

After the wash-house was demolished excitement quickly grew. Mohamedan newspapers published in other parts of India called attention to the behaviour of the Cawnpore authorities, and made vigorous protests. It is quite certain that the Cawnpore Mohamedans would never have resorted to violence had they not been subjected to inflammatory incitements from without. The Mussalman agitators who are so new and sinister a feature of the Indian landscape, were looking for a fresh pretext to stir up strife, and they found it at Cawnpore. The Hindu newspapers of Calcutta and elsewhere, which in the past have shown small consideration for the sanctity of Moslem mosques, joined in the outburst of manufactured indignation. The agitation came to a head on August 3, when thousands of Mohamedans met at Cawnpore to protest against the destruction of the wash-house. The day was a Sunday, and the bulk of the mob was composed of mill-hands, for Cawnpore is a great manufacturing centre. It is worth while noting that the industrial development of India is providing new fields for agitators. The task of sowing sedition among the peasantry is tedious and often unprofitable, but the ignorant and excitable mill-hands in the great cities are soon roused into violence, as Bombay has found to its cost. On this occasion a crowd, which is said to have numbered 10,000, swarmed down to the Machhli Bazaar mosque and began rebuilding the wash-house. It was confronted by the Collector, the Superintendent of Police, and two European sergeants, together with a small force of native armed police. There were only four Englishmen against a dense mob which had got completely out of control, and was beside itself with passion. The evidence of eye-witnesses is that the shouting and the din were terrific. The Collector, with great intrepidity, rode forward and urged the rioters to disperse, but was assailed with volleys of stones and bricks. The police then fired on the rioters, and nineteen were killed, including one Hindu and one plain-clothes constable. The wounded numbered nearly fifty. Such is the history of the Cawnpore riots, which collapsed very quickly.

A large number of arrests were made, and eventually 120 persons were placed on trial on charges of rioting and causing grievous hurt. The principal of the local Mohamedan Theological College was charged with sedition, the accusation being based upon a speech he delivered at the meeting which preceded the riots. A fund was raised for the defence of the accused persons, and over £4000 was quickly subscribed. It is significant that the Mohamedans of the Bombay Presidency made very little response to the appeal. A curious thing was that a separate fund for the relief of the families and dependents of the rioters slain by the police was headed by a subscription from the Viceroy. On August 16 Sir James Meston received a deputation of influential Mohamedans who asked that the demolished portion of the mosque might be restored. He declined to consent, stating that it was his clear duty "to proceed on the principle that the Government cannot accept or appear to accept the dictation of force." On September 20 Sir James Meston left for England to give evidence before the Indian Finance Commission, and Mr. Baillie was appointed to officiate as Lieutenant-Governor during his absence.

On October 13 the Viceroy paid a special visit to Cawnpore, and inspected the Machhli Bazaar mosque. Within two hours of his arrival Lord Hardinge announced to a gathering of Mohamedans that he came to bring them peace. His decision was that an arcade should be built eight feet above the surface of the road, on which the mosque authorities might reconstruct their wash-house. The pavement below the arcade was to be used as a footpath, as proposed in the scheme for the new road. Lord Hardinge added that, having brought peace, he wished also to show mercy. He therefore "invited" the local Government to withdraw the charges against the arrested rioters, and to order their release. The 101 persons still in custody were set free within an hour. Lord Hardinge left Cawnpore later in the day. He had brought peace, but he had also produced in the minds of Indian Mohamedans a feeling that they had triumphed over the Government of India. When Mr. Tilak was convicted Bombay rioted for a week. One wonders what would have been the state of Western India to-day if, at the close of seven days of uproar, Lord Minto had taken a special train to Bombay and "invited" Lord Sydenham to release Mr. Tilak. The Pioneer summed up the impression left upon most thoughtful men when it wrote:

The Mohamedan community throughout these provinces was determined to utilise the incident for a trial of their strength in their recent attitude of combination against the Government. They have joined issue, they have maintained a united front, and they have prevailed. There can be no doubt about this point.

One cannot take the responsibility of condemning Lord Hardinge's action. He must have known the requirements of the situation, and his decision was assuredly not a mere impulse. Those who know him are well aware that the ignoble motive of seeking popularity with the crowd must have been equally far from his thoughts. All that will be said here is that if his action was a necessity, it was a very regrettable necessity, for it has made Indian Mohamedans feel that they can upon occasion dominate the Government. It placated the Moslems of Cawnpore, but it only spurred the followers of Islam in Calcutta to renewed clamour. Within a week a mass meeting had been held in Calcutta at which the Viceroy was called upon to order the restoration of the demolished wash-house "in its original shape." The Calcutta malecontents passed a further resolution of a singularly impertinent character, calling upon the Mohamedan leaders of the United Provinces "to explain to the Moslems immediately under what religious authority they consented to His Excellency's settlement of the mosque problem." They have since held a far larger gathering at which they have renewed the same preposterous demands. There is good reason to believe that the Cawnpore outbreak was really fomented from Calcutta, where many Mohamedans are now in close alliance with Hindu agitators. The Mohamedans of Bengal are of a very different stamp from their co-religionists in the United Provinces. They have less restraint and respond far more readily to incitements; and their emissaries find pliable material in the mill-hands of Cawnpore, who are not typical of the true Moslem stock of the United Provinces.

I very rarely devote these notes to a narrative of such length, but the Cawnpore episode has not been closely followed in this country, and its significance ought to be more widely understood. Its net result has been that the younger Moslems, who are active apostles of discontent, claim that they have won a "victory," which they are exploiting to the utmost. Their achievement is recorded at a time when many other symptoms of Mohamedan unrest have become visible. At Aligarh College, where the late Sir Syed Ahmed dreamed such glowing dreams of the future of Indian Moslems, respectable Mohamedans of moderate tendencies were recently howled down and refused a hearing, although some of them had been working for the Mohamedan cause when their assailants were still unborn. The young men who rejected their counsel were for the most part products of Aligarh, whose education has given them the power of expression without any accompanying restraint. A sinister feature of the new Moslem movement in India is that Aligarh graduates are in the van. They are thrusting aside the older men, joining hands with the Hindus, and openly preaching hostility to British rule. They have seized upon the Balkan War as a pretext for incendiary oratory. They pretend that the Powers of Europe are conspiring to seize the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, and they are obtaining large sums from ignorant Mussalmans for the alleged purpose of preserving the Sacred Places from desilement by Christians. The old Indian game of spreading excitement by unfounded rumours is being steadily pursued. Moslems are told, and are being persuaded to believe, that hundreds of innocent devotees of the faith were shot down at Cawnpore by the brutal minions of the Government. There is much wild talk of risings. Attempts are being made to tamper with the loyalty of the Mohamedan troops. Foolish efforts, which meet with little response, have been made to get into touch with Moslem Governments of other countries. The Mohamedan population in the larger centres of India is getting thoroughly out of hand, and that is a development far more dangerous and menacing than all the Hindu plots and outrages of the last six years. When the Moslems of India grow disloyal, we are very near grave trouble.

For an analysis of the earlier causes which have led to this deplorable situation, I must again refer my readers to my article in the National Review for March. It remains to record its most serious result up to the present. His Highness the Aga Khan has notified his intention to relinquish the presidency of the All-India Moslem League, and Mr. Ameer Ali has withdrawn from the affiliated organisation of Moslems in London. The Aga Khan has long been the recognised leader of nearly seventy millions of Indian Mohamedans. He is a prince of cosmopolitan experience, of great intellectual attainments, wielding in this and other countries an influence which no other Indian Mohamedan can hope to rival. His skill as a writer on Eastern questions has been repeatedly shown in the pages of this Review. That he has long wanted to withdraw from the presidency of the League, for purely personal reasons, is well known. Despite his guarded and careful explanations, which show complete devotion to the Moslem cause, it is difficult not to feel that his resignation at this juncture is really due to the new tendencies now visible among Indian Mussalmans. They have got beyond his control, and it must be assumed that he is no longer willing to bear a responsibility which he cannot exercise. Mr. Ameer Ali's published reason for his resignation are evidently marked by similar reservations. Had he felt able to say all that was in his mind, he would doubtless have made it clear that a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council could not be associated with the new and reckless activities of the League. The "Young Moslems" have in short, captured the organisation, and are starting Islam in India on fresh and dangerous paths. The old leaders are dropping away, and the new men who are taking their place mean mischief. No more sinister tendency has been revealed in India during the last half-century.

ASIATICS in the "National Review."

CORRESPONDENCE

The London Islamic Society's Appeal.

TO THE EDITOR, "COMRADE."

SIR,—May we crave the hospitality of your columns in order to draw attention, on the part of your numerous readers, to a cause which must be held sacred by all those who have the true interest of Islam at heart?

The Islamic Society, founded in 1886, is the only Moslem institution in London which has as one of its objects the promotion of brotherly feelings between Moslems from all parts of the world. It thus acts as a social Union in this great metropolis for the followers of the holy Prophet and facilitates intercourse between them. The Society also tries, as far as possible, to remove misconceptions prevailing amongst non-Moslems regarding Islam and Moslems, and likewise attempts to promote the religious, moral, social and intellectual advancement of the Moslem world. As a matter of immediate urgency, we may add that the extension of the burial-ground for the Moslems in London is also amongst its objects.

To enable the Society to satisfactorily carry out its aims and objects, it is obviously necessary that it should be financially supported by all Moslems. Though it has so far certainly discharged its duties creditably and usefully, in spite of a not too prosperous exchequer, it is now felt that the time has arrived when the Islamic Society should take a more active part in the Moslem world of London, so that it may be able to exercise its healthy and invigorating influence amongst the Moslems to the required degree.

As soon as our funds permit we hope to secure permanent offices on a moderate scale in a central locality in London, which may serve the double purpose of offering suitable accommodation for the Society's periodical meetings and lectures as well as the weekly prayers on Fridays and other special occasions, such as the Id-ul-Fitr, Id-ul-Zoha. The Society cannot be reasonably expected to establish itself firmly until it has secured its permanent head-quarters, and it is the solemn duty of every Moslem and well-wisher of Islam to help it at this moment.

Apart from the Ordinary and Life membership of the Society, open exclusively to Moslems, our non-Moslem sympathisers are welcome as Associates of the Society, particulars of which can be had from the Hon. Secretary at the address mentioned below.

In earnestly appealing to the generosity of your readers to help us in this sacred and noble cause, we feel confident that our humble appeal will be heard in that true spirit of Islam which the occasion undoubtedly demands.

Donations may be sent to the Hon. Treasurer at the address mentioned below or to the Society's Bankers, Messrs Williams Deacon's, Ltd., Marylebone Road, London, N. W., and will be gratefully acknowledged.

We are, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

ALI HIKMET NAHID (Vice-President).
SYED ABDUL MAJID (Vice-President).
JEDAL SHAH (Hon. Treasurer).
ABDUL HAQ (Hon. Secretary).

The Islamic Society,
46, Great Russell Street,
London, W. C.

THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF AL-BAYANFIULUM-UL-QURAN

HELD AS AN
INTRODUCTION TO THE COMMENTARY
OF THE

HOLY QURAN

CALLED TAFSIR-I-HAQQANI.

The original book was written by M. Abu Muhammad Abdul Haqq Haqqani of Delhi in the Indo-Arabic language. The learned author has left nothing untouched concerning what is required for a valuable book of this nature. The unfair objections raised against Islam by its enemies, through their ignorance or injustice, have been treated and refuted at full length. The existence of God through reasonable arguments, the refutation of suspicions and doubts raised by Agnostics and Atheists, the discussions on the nature and attributes of God, filled with deep learning and logical reasoning, together with refutations of the false and absurd assertions of the opponents are subjects worthy of appreciation by lovers of truth. The nature of angels, their existence as independent beings, their transformation into any shape they like : the thorough investigation of the statements of the rationalists and philosophers on the subject : the debates on the mission of the true Prophets ; the different aspects of inspiration ; and revelation, the proof of the miracles performed by the Prophets and Saints ; the just answers to the plausible statements of the disbelievers in the Prophets and their miracles ; the soul and the next world ; the transference of man to it ; the reward and punishment of good and evil deeds ; the refutations of spurious religions and of Atheists by their insufficient and false teachings ; together with reasonable answers to the suspicions cast by the malignant spirit of the enemies of Islam and the false imputations charged by them against the holy person of the Prophet, together with the testimonies borne in favor of him by the critics of Europe, have been fully described in this translation.

An abstract of review by the Comrade :—The translation in English is quite good. The printing and get-up is excellent ; Messrs. Thacker, Spink & Co., being responsible for it. The book has about 750 pages, but from beginning to end besides being learned and instructive is very interesting reading for a Moslem, and more so for a non-Moslem in search for truth about Islam. The book for the sake of convenience is divided into three chapters, and has an Introduction which deals with knowledge gained by External Senses, Internal Senses, by Revelations and by means of Signs and Emblems. The first chapter deals with the last and the greatest of all the Prophets of God, Mohamed, the attributes of God—the creator of the universe, Sanctification, Angels, Genii, Soul Resurrection, and the next world, with objections raised by opponents of Islam and answers to them. The second chapter is the most important as it deals with the early history of Islam, gives a brief sketch of the life of the Prophet, and discusses fully all about crusades, polygamy and inspiration of the Holy Quran, Judaism, Christianity, Vedas, Buddhism, Jainism, etc. It explains the Divine Science in the Quran, explaining the prayers, Zakat, Fasting, Haj and Jihad. In the last chapter, a great deal is explained about the Old and the New Testaments and the portions thereof which have been lost. Very useful information is given about the Christian and the Hindu sects, and closes with an account of Zoroastrians. It is a book which will be most useful for the English educated Moslems, as it would give them a very clear insight into their faith, and prepare them to defend it easily against the attacks of the Christian and other Missionaries. Books like this dealing with the modern علم الکلام were badly needed and we strongly recommend all to purchase and study it carefully."

FATEHPURI, Delhi, 22nd September, 1913.

The English translation of "Al-Bayan," the famous book written by Maulana Abdul Haq has been given to me for reading and reviewing by Hajee Muhammad Ishaq.

The book is so well translated that the beauties of the author's style and diction have been amply preserved. This treatise would be a most valuable addition to the Islamic literature in the English language. It expounds in a most lucid and logical manner the teaching of the Great Prophet, and gives a rational and logical refutation of all the attacks on Islam.

This book would be useful both to the Mohamedan readers and those Europeans who want to learn the truth about Islam.

(Sd.) M. A. ANSARI, B.A., M.B., M.D., M.R.C.S., I.R.C.P.

This book will be a best companion to the Moslems and non-Moslems in India and Foreign Countries and the members of the New All-India Mohamedan Religious Association. Price has been reduced from Rs. 15 to Rs. 10/8 so that learners of truth about Islam may easily purchase it.

APPLY TO—THE MANAGER,

The General Newspaper Agency

and Islamia Book Depot, Delhi.

Or Haji Mohamed Ishaq, Merchant, Sadar Bazar, Delhi.

Madrasah-ul-Islam, Larkana, Sind.

Applications are invited for the post of Principal and Superintendent of the Boarding House. Applicants must be Mohammadan Graduates with some teaching experience. Pay Rs. 150—10—200, and free quarters. Applications, with copies of testimonials should reach the undersigned before the 1st February 1914.

(Sd.) J. E. B. HOTSON,

President, Madrasah Board, Larkana.

پروہی منت منالیجی

اعجاز نما چاول

گذشتہ اشاعت میں اعجاز نما چاول کی مفصل کیفیت ملاحظہ فرما چکی ہیں۔ اعلیٰ دوبارہ تعریف کرنیکی ضرورت نہیں ہے۔ چونکہ اس عرصہ میں بہت سی خطوط پیگم صاحبہ کی پاس اس مضمون کی پہنچی ہیں کہ اعجاز نما چاول کا رعایتی اعلان ایک مرتبہ اور شایع کرا جائے تاکہ جو اصحاب اس تعجب خیز چاول کی زیارت سے محروم رہ گئے ہیں مستفیض ہو جائیں *

لہذا بحکم جناب عائشہ بیگم صاحبہ یہ رعایتی اشتہار فہام کیفرض سے پھر شایع کیا جاتا ہے۔ یعنی جس قدر درخواستیں ۳۰ جنوری تک دفتر میں موصول ہونگی انکی خدمت میں اعجاز نما چاول بالکل مفت بھیجا جاویگا۔ بعض ایک چاندی کی ڈبہ، ایک خوردبین، دو عدد تین کی منقش ڈیوان وغیرہ (جو چاول مذکور کی ہمراہ دیجاتی ہیں) ان سب چیزوں کی قیمت وہ نہایت رعایتی یعنی صرف ایک روپیہ پانچ آنہ بذریعہ وی بی لٹی جاون گی۔ اخبار "زمیندار" لاہور اس چاول کی نسبت حسب ذیل خیالات کا اظہار کرتا ہے۔

ریویو "زمیندار"۔ عائشہ بیگم صاحبہ فی حال میں ایک چاول جسپر ہوی سورہ اخلاص نہایت خوشخط حروف میں لکھی ہے۔ ہمارے پاس ریویو کیفرض سے روانہ کیا ہے۔ اگر کسی کی قدرتی بنا فی اعلیٰ درجہ کی ہوتو وہ خالی آنکھ سے ایک ایک حرف پڑھتی پر بغیر قادر ہوسکتا ہے ضعف النظر اصحاب خوردبین کی مدد سے جو چاول کی ساتھ دیجاتی ہیں ایک ایک حرف بلکہ ایک ایک لفظ کو صفائی کی ساتھ دیکھ سکتی ہیں۔ عائشہ بیگم صاحبہ کا کمال تعریف و قدر دانی کا مستحق ہے اسکی اصلی قیمت گیارہ روپیہ پانچ آنہ ہے۔ اخبار "وطن" کی ایڈیٹر صاحبہ ریویو میں چاول کی کمال تعریف کرتی ہوئے فرماتی ہیں کہ اسکی قیمت ۱۰ روپیہ ۱۰ آنہ دیا وغیرہ گیارہ روپیہ پانچ آنہ کچھ ہی نہیں ہے *

نوٹ۔ درخواستیں ۳۰ جنوری تک آجانی چاہئیں ورنہ عدم تصمیل کی

شکایت معاف *

ملی کا پتہ۔ منیجر کارخانہ عائشہ بیگم فاضی اسٹریٹ امر وہ

ضلع مراد آباد *

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HERKE, CONSTANTINOPLE.Turkish Fezes made in Turkey.

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpacks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

11-5-14

Sole-Agents for Indiafor Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople.*SHaida & KHURSHED,*COMMERCIALISTS, BADAUN.

- (1) CIGAR and CHEROOTS.
- (2) CIGARETTES:—Turkish and Egyptian (by direct Importation) and others.
- (3) TOBACCOS:—All the best known British, American and Turkish.
- (4) Towels, Banyans, Stockings and Handkerchiefs Embroidered.

KHUDAM-I-KAABA ON IT.

- (5) Cooking Stoves, Soaps, Powders, Lavenders, etc.
- (6) Stationary. (7) Fancy Articles.

“KHATOONI”

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! The Latest Invention !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! Quite Up-to-date. !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! Most Comfortable !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! Very Handsome !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! The Best Pardah Keeper !!!! THAT IT IS !!*!! The New Burqa !!*OBTAINABLE FROM*The Khatoon Stores, Delhi.*(Khatooni) The “Code Word” mentioning one Burqa.*Illustrated Price List free on Application.REDUCED PRICES.*To clear the debt and to save the property of a Mussalman.

* * *

STUDENTS ARE REQUESTED TO ORDER AT ONCE.

* * *

			Original Price.	Reduced Price.
			Rs. A.	Rs. A.
Quran, with English Translation, 1st quality	...		20 0	9 0
Ditto Ditto 2nd	10 0	4 8
Ditto Ditto 3rd	5 0	2 4
Selections from the Quran, 1st	5 0	2 0
Ditto Ditto 2nd	2 8	1 0
Life of Mohamed (may peace be upon him)	...		1 8	0 12
Karima, with English Translation	...		1 0	0 6
Trilingual Dictionary, English-Urdu-Hindi	...		5 0	2 0
Urdu-English Dictionary	...		2 8	1 0
Ditto Ditto	...		1 4	0 8
English-Urdu Ditto	...		2 8	1 0
Persian-English-Urdu Dictionary	...		3 0	1 4
Roman-English Ditto	...		1 8	0 10
English-Roman Ditto	...		1 8	0 10

Other useful notes, &c. of Matriculation are available at Reduced Prices.

APPLY SHARP TO—O. M. CHIENE,Receiver appointed by the Court,ELGIN ROAD, ALLAHABAD.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the “Akhbar i-Islam,” the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1918, writes: “The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to naughty diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive inasmuch as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility.”

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

THIS YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the virile power and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it so say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that must be not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER RECEIVED FROM THE
BOMBAY MUNICIPALITY PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

ESANOFELE and MALARIA.

" Treatment with ESANOFELE controlled with quinine in most cases was recently given a fair trial. The majority of the cases belonged to the Parel Hindu Orphanage, where MALARIA OF A PARTICULARLY SEVERE TYPE raged this year. 43 cases of Malaria were treated of which FIVE WERE CHRONIC, with considerable enlargement of spleen and General Malaria Cachexia." Result : -

REDUCTION IN THE SIZE OF THE SPLEEN	+	+
DISAPPEARANCE OF PARASITES	+	+
INCREASE IN THE HAEMOGLOBIN VALUE	+	+
GENERAL CONDITION OF PATIENTS VERY SATISFACTORY.

Writing on the result of chronic cases the report states :— " Quinine would not have worked equally well in these cases and one is especially emboldened to give this opinion from the case of a Sukharam Jivaji, who was a chronic sufferer and ALWAYS TOOK QUININE OR QUININE AND ARSENIC MIXTURES WITHOUT MUCH BENEFIT.

" On the whole, ESANOFELE appears to have VERY GOOD EFFECT ON CHRONIC CASES.

ESANOFELE is obtainable from all Chemists and Dealers throughout BRITISH INDIA, BURMA AND CEYLON.

General Agents:—

Messrs. B. G. GORIO & Co.,
3, Wallace Street, BOMBAY.

FOR INFANTS
"ERANOPELINA."
AFTER MALARIA.
FERRO CHINA WINE.

MANUFACTURERS:—

FELICE BISLERI & Co., MILAN, ITALY.

WANTED.

A trained B. Sc., salary Rs. 70 rising to 100 per mensem, and a trained B.A. with Mathematical qualifications, pay Rs. 50 rising to 80 per mensem. Experienced men those who have special qualifications in Mathematics may also apply.

The Manager,
FAIZ-I-AM HIGH SCHOOL,
Meerut.

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper, Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-19-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

Don't shout but ring.
The Standard Electric
Bell sets, mounted on polished stand. 20 yds.
wire and 6 months
battery ... Rs. 7-6
25 yds. 1 year Rs. 11-0
Claxon Bell Set Rs. 5-0

EAST-WEST CO.

Chandni Chowk,
DELHI.

EVERY KIND OF
PRINTING DONE
IN THE "COMRADE"
PRESS, DELHI.

For Stationery write to—

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

DO YOU WANT

TO EARN ANOTHER

Rs. 3 A DAY?

Reliable persons can add another Rs. 3 a day to their present income by making hosiery on the celebrated "Durbar Auto-Knitter" at home. Previous experience not necessary. Distance no drawback. Work simple.

Our Proposition Briefly Explained.

Purchase one or more Auto-Knitters from us, according to the number of members in your household who are ambitious to increase their earnings, and we guarantee thereafter to purchase work turned out by you with yarn supplied by us. Our profits do not come through the sale of the machines, but through the success of the operators.

Remittances are forwarded the very day that the finished work is received. The markets of the world are clamouring for hosiery made on the "Durbar Auto-Knitter." We are unable to keep pace with the ever-growing demand. We want more earnest workers—we want you. Write to us now for full particulars.

Genz, Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS,

Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay Street, Chowringhee Road, CALCUTTA.

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FULL DETAILS.

FILL IT IN, DETACH ALONG DOTTED LINES, AND SEND TO-DAY.

Gentlemen,

Date

I wish to take advantage of your offer. Please send me immediately full particulars, whereby I can earn Rs. 3 a day. Enclosed please find Anna Stamp to help to pay postages.

Name

Address

GENZ, WHEELER & CO., Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay St., Chowringhee Rd., CALCUTTA.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share.
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere.
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 7.
No. 4.

Single Copy
Annas 4.

Delhi: Saturday, January 24, 1914.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page		Page
WEEK	65	LEADING ARTICLES—
OUR LONDON LETTER	66	The Press Act.—II.	70
THE A TATE—		The Indian Moslems' Task—IV	71
"The Indian Peril"	67	CORRESPONDENCE—
✓ The Moslem Press and Govern-	67	The Criminal Settlement at ment	67	Aligarh	73
✓ Mr. Ramsay Macdonald on	67	Return of the Moslem Mis-
India	67	sion—II	74
A Patch-work without Plan	67	A VISION OF INDIA—
Sober Criticism or Insolent	68	The Last Viceroy	77
Conceit?	68	THE INDIAN PERIL—
Indians and the Edinburgh	68	I.—Gathering Forces	79
Universality	68	II.—Causes and Consequences of
Aligarh Cricket	68	Unrest	80
"Wild Dreams"	69	III.—Nationalism and its Fur-
"A Vision of India"	69	rows	81
		IV.—Duty and Policy of the
		Government	82
		Moslem India and British
		Foreign Policy	83
		ADVERTISEMENTS	87-88

opposing Mr. Churchill's estimates. The personal relations between the Chancellor and the First Lord are extremely strained, says the journal, and the resignation of one or other of the two in the next few days is regarded as possible. Moreover, if Mr. Churchill's proposals are defeated in the Cabinet the whole Board of Admiralty will resign. The Cabinet will discuss the subject on Thursday.

London, Jan. 20.

Mr. Winston Churchill has issued a statement declaring that all newspaper statements about cabinet proceedings are based on surmise and gossip and should be uniformly distrusted. The statement that the Admiralty has expressed its intention of resigning is untrue.

When Mr. Churchill made his statement with regard to the rumoured resignation of the Board of Admiralty, he and the other members of the Admiralty were discussing the estimates. 'It is regarded as practically certain that the statement was made on the authority of the whole Board as well as of Mr. Churchill. With regard to Mr. Lloyd George, it is stated on his behalf that he will most certainly not resign. In view of the interview with Mr. Lloyd George published in the Daily Chronicle on the January 1st, gossip has been busy ascribing to the Chancellor the determination to curtail the naval estimates. It has become generally accepted that such a situation exists. The Daily Telegraph reflects this prevailing supposition. It is understood that Mr. Churchill will provide four dreadnoughts.

Turkey

Constantinople, Jan. 19.

It is stated that Bulgaria has sold 200,000 rifles captured from the Turks at thirty francs each. It is believed that they are being acquired for the Turkish Government.

Turkey

Constantinople Jan. 20.

The boycott of native christian places of business especially Greek continues. The windows of a Greek confectioner were smashed on Sunday and customers insulted for purchasing goods from non-Moslems. The propaganda in favour of dealing only with Moslem shops continues as active as ever.

Turko Persian Frontier.

Karachi, Jan. 17.

The Sind Gazette's Mahomerah correspondent writes on January 9th, in connection with the Anglo-Russian delimitation of the Perso-Turkish Frontier:—"The survey work in connection with the Frontier appears to be making headway as both the British officers employed on the work are at present away from the station on duty connected with the survey. The Turkish delegates to the Commission have, it is stated, broken their journey at Baghdad in order to make the pilgrimage to Kerbela, and may therefore be expected here when their religious duties permit. One Indian khallasi of the survey party had succumbed to pneumonia, probably contracted on the voyage, otherwise the health of the British camp is very good.

The Week.

Aegean Problem.

London, Jan. 18.

Replying to the Turkish criticisms of the decision of the Powers in the question of the Aegean islands, the Neuzeitliche Allgemeine Zeitung says that the Great Powers are unanimous in acknowledging the principle already recognized when the Turks re-captured Adrianople, namely, that it is incompatible with the policy of peace to maintain a situation the result obtained by force of arms.

Athens, Jan. 18.

It is officially stated that about two thousand Albanians from Durut made a furious attack on Greek troops at Tepelini. The Greeks counter-attacked all along the line. The Albanians offered a brave resistance, and retreated in disorder, leaving scores of dead. They were pursued a long distance by the Greeks, who had thirty wounded. The prisoners state that the object of the attack was pillage, and also to test the strength of the Greeks.

Naval Crisis.

London, Jan. 20.

The Daily Telegraph states on what it describes as the highest authority that the Cabinet is undergoing a grave crisis with regard to the naval policy, the majority agreeing with Mr. Lloyd George in Persian Parcel Post.

London, Jan. 19.

The Kosinische Zeitung regards decision of Russia to discontinue parcel-post from Julfa and Ashkabad to Tabriz and Meshed as a clear breach of the International Parcel-post agreement. The journal says that Germany energetically remonstrated at St. Petersburg and adds that the restriction does not affect the Russian parcel-post into Persia. Russia, it says, is attempting to the interest of her own trade to exclude from the districts in question German and the other non-Russian wares passing through Russia.

Salvation Army.

At a meeting of the U P Legislative Council at Lucknow on 20th January the Excise Amendment Bill, penalising cocaine-smuggling was introduced and passed. The punishment for smuggling is increased to one year. In reply to a resolution regarding the removal of the Salvation Army Settlement from Aligarh, on the ground that it was not conducive to the morality of the Aligarh College boys, it was announced that the Army had already proposed to Government to remove the Settlement to the Dehra Dun district and the Government had accepted the proposal. The Council adjourned till March.

Khost outlaws.

Men guilty of the last kidnapping raid between Kohat and Bannu were Khost and not Kohat outlaws. A Position seem likely to arise on the Derajat Frontier which will compel special measures against murderers and thieves who are enjoying an asylum in the Khost Valley.

Frontier Raids.

Peshawar, Jan. 20.

Mr. Pears, the Political Agent of the Khyber, and his assistant, Sahibzada Abdul Quyum have traced the murderers of the European Guard and engine driver, who were shot when in charge of the Calcutta Mail on the 20th December. The leader is Zar Shah, who is known to be implicated in many cases of robbery. He and the men are Shinwaris of Mingrahar in Afghan territory. Mr. Pears and his assistant, an experienced Frontier soldier, noticed the similarity of the raids of the station Jhangira and Khairabad when the police were held up and all the rifles taken, so suspecting, Zar Shah, as the man who took away Lachmin Chand the Babu station master, rode out to the neighbourhood of his home and sent messengers to find if he was away. The news brought back that the chief of the raiders was away on a looting expedition with party of a dozen men. On New Year's Day, the Khyber Rifles, under Mr. Pears, came in touch with Zar Shah, and in the Khyber Pass itself exchanged shots. A long and patient hunt followed and the raiders were finally traced to their actual hiding place. The Political Officers sent messengers out who met Afghan go-betweens, and finally the assistant station master was liberated and brought over the Border handed to the British officials who got back to Peshawar yesterday. The station master was well treated, and given what he wanted to eat. As the women of the raiders' clan do not observe parda, conversation was openly held daily. They told the Babu that Zar Shah was away on decoity bandobast. The station master saw much loot lying about the caves and recognised the uniform of the Guard killed. All the raiders held martini rifles and there was plenty of ammunition in their possession and also revolvers. Zar Shah speaks Hindustani a little. The women said he had often been down country by train to Delhi, Lucknow, and Lahore, and Ajmer and is the author of the following notable cases of decoity. He raided Peshawar Cantonment Station cutting off the ears of the Babu station master's wife to obtain some valuable rings she wore. He raided the Peshawar city station a year ago, and seven months after disarmed the police and took away their rifles. He attacked Pabni station twice and the Khairabad station last March, taking away cash and clothes. He held up the Calcutta mail train at Jhangira. I am informed that the result of the diplomatic work between Afghan go-betweens and the Political Agent was that thirteen hundred rupees ransom was paid for the station master's release. Much enthusiasm prevails here at Mr. Pears success.

The Balkans.

London, Jan. 22.

Constantinople: The Ottoman Minister in Sofia has arrived here on leave. Importance is however attached to the visit at the present juncture, especially in view of the pessimism prevailing owing to the decision of the powers regarding the Aegean Islands. It is confirmed that Turkey is the purchaser of the 2000,000 rifles which Bulgaria captured from the Turks.

Our London Letter.

2nd January, 14.

THE MOSLEM LEAGUE.

Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah's presidential address at Agra, on the occasion of the Annual Sessions of the All-India Moslem League a telegraphic summary of which appeared in the Times of last Wednesday, is very favourably received by the Indian Moslems here. It is generally felt that Sir Ibrahim has exhibited that sound and wise statesmanship, which the occasion undoubtedly demanded. His happy and diplomatic reference to the recent disagreement in the League and his genuine expression of relief and pleasure at the welcome healing of that disagreement have made a good impression in London amongst the Indian Moslems, who, as a body, are at one with Sir Ibrahim, when he said, in the course of his address, that the policy of the League must be laid down in India. I have yet to come across a thinking Moslem from India, who honestly believes that the London League is an absolutely independent organisation in itself in its connections with the Central League in India. It is, no doubt, quite clearly understood that the League here holds an exceptional position from various points of view, unlike, perhaps the various Provincial Leagues in India. It is also plain that, situated as it is, in the very heart of the British Empire, if conducted wisely and conscientiously, it cannot but wield that influence and weight in the Councils of the All-India Moslem League to which it is certainly entitled, and which, as far as one can realise, has never been disputed. But to claim for the London League a position of absolute independence and freedom and to thereby ignore the parental and fundamental character of the Central League at Lucknow is a doctrine, which will never appeal to the bulk of the Indian Moslems in London. The members of the London League rightly consider themselves as units of that great organisation, known as the All-India Moslem League, and it will be doing them very little justice to presume that such members belong only to the London League and thus are not in any way associated with the Central League, of which the London organisation is essentially a Branch. Another happy feature of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah's speech is his emphatic denial that there was a shadow of disloyalty or sedition amongst the Indian Moslems. Those who are in close touch with the Moslems of India are well aware that, in spite of the deliberate misrepresentations and gross and wicked attacks on their policy, loyalty to the British Crown is the very key-note of their political propaganda even on the part of the more progressive section of the community, whom the Times delights to describe as the "advanced wing."

There is some disappointment felt here that His Highness the Aga Khan has refused to withdraw his resignation of the Presidency of the Central League, in spite of the strong pressure brought upon him by the League at Agra. His Highness has, however, made it abundantly clear in his recent correspondence with Mr. Wazir Hasan and Mr. Mohamed Ali that his services, as a member of the Council of the League, will be unhesitatingly placed at the disposal of the Community. As a matter of fact, it is anticipated here that, as the Aga Khan has himself said, he will be in future able, as a private member, to advocate the policy of the League much more strenuously and vigorously than he could do in his official capacity of President. His Highness' declarations that in future the League ought to be conducted on more democratic lines instead of working on the hitherto semi-dictatorial methods are very much appreciated here, particularly by the younger generation of Moslems. The All-India Moslem League enters upon its new career in the present year with all good wishes.

NEW YEARS' HONOURS.

The distinctions conferred by His Majesty on Mr. Syed Ali Imam and Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson are universally welcome here. Both these gentlemen have earned their recognition of devoted and unselfish service to India and His Majesty's advisers could not have made a better choice amongst the large body of Indians and Englishmen, who have spent their lives in the service of the King-Emperor in India. Sir Syed Ali Imam's integrity of character and honesty of purpose will no doubt serve as a noble example for the younger Moslems to follow, who wish him a still more successful career in the service of India. The Right Hon. Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson's genuine sympathy with Indian progress and Indian sentiments is well-known and his exhilarating message to "Young India," on the occasion of the Islamic Society's Banquet in honour of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali in November last at the Hotel Cecil will be ever ringing in the ears of those who heard it. This is the type of Englishmen that cannot fail to impress the millions of India with those noble qualities and sporting instincts, for which the British race is famous. Alas! for the great lack of such genuine Englishmen in India.

PRAYERS FOR THE SULTAN'S RECOVERY.

At the Friday Namaz in Lindsay Hall, Kensington, to-day arranged by the Islamic Society, special prayers were offered for the rapid and complete recovery of H. I. M. the Sultan of Turkey. This morning's bulletin happily report an improvement in His Majesty's condition and it is hoped that the improvement will continue.

TETE À TETE

TO-DAY we reproduce the famous—or rather infamous—articles of the Times on the subject of its creation, "The Indian Peril." Our readers will judge the views expressed for themselves, but we would like to lift the veil a little from the face of this latest Prophet of Khorassan who is the author of these articles. Let us ask him if he is not the same person as contributed to the Times from India the article which appeared in its issue of the 7th October last, or to be more precise, exactly a fortnight after the arrival of the Moslem Mission in London. It is to this that H. H. the Aga Khan refers in his Edinburgh Review article, and it was with a view to "counteract the false charges" of this correspondent of the Times that the Aga Khan invited Mr. Ameer Ali to join him as host at a dinner to be given nominally to Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali; but in reality to influential men in English politics. Many young Mussalmans who have been in England know the bearer of an extremely commonplace English surname who is the fidus Achates of the Right Honourable Syed Ameer Ali and a very useful person in certain oft-recurring journalistic contingencies. Mr. Mohamed Ali made his acquaintance in the India Office soon after the publication of the Times' article of the 7th October, and astonished him with the success of his powers of conjecture by naming the author of that article. Now comes our second question. Is not the author of the article the author of the "Indian Peril" also? Let him deny it if he dare. We congratulate the Hon. Syed Riza Ali on his success in dislodging the Beriah Criminal Colony from its site on the north of the Aligarh College even at the cost of having awakened the Hon. Mr. Sapru's peculiar sense of orderliness in a Council meeting. That indeed was the "Aligarh Peril" and we shall be well rid of it. But let him now turn his attention to the south of the Aligarh College also and dislodge the greater "Indian Peril." Our only fear is that a mere transfer to Rajpur in the Dehra Dun district will not do. The "Indian Peril" must be deported to New Zealand at the very least. We wonder whether the Government of India know the name of the author of these articles, for had they been aware of it, we feel sure they would have recommended the creation of a new title of "C. I. P.", short for "Creator of Indian Peril," for the writer. In the course of his speech on the Press Bill in February, 1919, the Hon. Mr. Gokhale said: "I have already said that several causes have combined to bring about the present state of things. It is of course impossible to go into all of them, but one of them may be mentioned—it is the writings in a section of the Anglo-Indian Press. My Lord, I doubt, if many Englishmen realise how large a share these writings have had in turning so many of my countrymen against British rule."

Many of my countrymen imagine that every Anglo-Indian pen that writes in the Press is dipped in Government ink." Let Mr. Gokhale rest assured that there is sometimes no reason to "imagine" only, for occasionally people believe that even the Anglo-Indian pen that writes for the Times its most mischievous articles is dipped in Government ink or Ses-o-i-co. Now guess the name of the Creator of the "Indian Peril," says the Modern Sphinx, and we shall pay a worn-out half penny for the correct guess.

CONSIDERABLE apprehension has been felt by Mussalmans for the last four months about the action which Government was supposed to be contemplating about the Moslem Press. In this connection it would not be unprofitable if we reproduced a passage from a letter written by one of the Moslem delegates during their stay in England to a high official in England anxious to restore mutual confidence between the Mussalmans and Government. "The more important thing," he wrote, "is the apprehensions which are universal in India, namely, that the Government would do justice to the Mussalmans of Cawnpore, but would pursue a policy of repression recently started in dealing with Moslem Press. I hope this is absolutely baseless, but the rumour itself is sufficiently productive of mischief, and should be contradicted. I am certain that if these are the views of Government, they are based on a wrong estimate of the situation, for the Moslem public will not be weaned off from the Moslem Press, particularly after the satisfactory result to which the action of the Moslem Press has brought the Cawnpore issue. What an effort of this character will succeed in doing will be that Lord Hardinge's action will be entirely thrown away on the people, and its good results nullified by a policy of vindictiveness pursued against the Press. I have myself no sympathy with sensationalism, and I have no hesitation in saying that there are some Moslem papers which have occasionally been extremely unwise in their conduct; but my fear is that any hurried action taken even against them would result very differently from the consummation devoutly to be wished. . . . This would create a fresh "regrettable incident," and would have to be dealt with all over again. My own opinion is that even the misguided journalists should be left to us to be dealt with, for nothing kills a rabid paper so well as the strengthening of the more reasonable journals, and even the Mussalmans are not so ignorant as to be unable to discriminate between what is good and what is bad, if the good is allowed to exist side by side with the bad. . . . I will also add that if all independent Moslem journals are crushed, even that would give no circulation to the sycophants that may be allowed to survive them. These parasites would only feed upon the Government trunk instead of providing any nourishment for that round which they intertwine themselves." This letter was dated 18th October, 1918, and was written shortly after the Cawnpore settlement. The considerations then suggested have no less force to-day and we earnestly beg Government not to ignore them or minimise their value.

THE Leicester Pioneer published last month an interesting letter written by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald from India in which he said:—"India itself, both as a spirit and as a political problem grows upon me. Things are very far from being well here, and I do not think they are improving. Sometimes when I think over the events and the evidence of the day before turning in at night, I feel that the greatest pessimist may prove to be the truest prophet. The anarchist and political criminal do dramatic things and get into the newspapers and everybody talks of them and their evil works. In India they are really insignificant. They kill and others step into the empty shoes. That is all, and that is not much. For as they themselves truly say:—'A dead man is often more powerful for good than a living one.' It is the great structure of our government here that is so weak. The mind of India is chaos. No people can be governed, or govern themselves except upon the social norms of a culture and a civilisation. These conditions do not exist here, and I do not find that 'the man on the spot' sees that as he should. We are patching without plan, yielding without forethought, changing without insight. India demands qualities which we are not giving to her. I felt that vaguely four years ago; now that the veil has been lifted and I have seen behind it, I know it. When my present work is over and I am free to write again I may add another book to my list, but I am still learning and, therefore, can only hold provisional opinions. As I sit writing this, the position comes into me dramatically. I am staying for the week-end with my friend the Rev. C. F. Andrews, of the Cambridge Mission; over the wall come the chants and the music of Indian worship. I am close to the Fort from the marble palaces of which the Moghls ruled in their brilliant noonday; from the discharge come the sounds of the brass bands and the spaces of the thousand workers clearing foundations for the new Imperial City which we are to build like a Western garden suburb. It is all very pathetic. For such vanities was the Book of Ecclesiastes written."

It is clear from the extract we have given that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has understood at least the character of the patch-work which constitutes the sum total of India's political concessions.

A Patch-work without Plan.

Let us hope he will soon be able to understand the causes also which make the patch-work one without a plan. This is partly due to the English character itself, if we may say so without offence. There is little imagination in an average English politician, and it does not appear to us that any one on the Front Benches in either House of the English Parliament has permitted himself to conceive of India as it should be or may be a hundred years hence. Even Lord Morley was too much engrossed in the details of India's daily life to enjoy the luxury of a dream, though it must be confessed that he is the one British politician of our times who took up the subject of India as a student in search of knowledge. The English love to "muddle through," and they have not done badly from their own point of view. But a little theory would do the great "practical" men responsible for the progress of India no harm, and violence are not without their value. The worst of it is that nobody in England has the to take up the subject of India and make it his own. The fact of it frightens them and even Mr. Lloyd George has perhaps as much as he can chew. Apart from the general character of the British race, there is the difficulty of an absence of continuity of policy in the Government of India. Every incoming Viceroy starts practically with a new policy, though it may not always be his own. Then, even in the five years of his Viceroyalty the wind of political influence blowing on him may not always blow from one direction. There are some Indians who honestly believe that all political concessions are maya, and England does not desire any real progress in India for India's sake, but desires her to remain for ever a milch-cow of England. These pessimists sometimes become active extremists in their Nationalism and degenerate into terrorists. Now, if only they knew the English character better they would be convinced that England could not possibly have formed a general plan of any sort for the Government of India, much less a Machiavellian plan. But that is not all. They do great injustice to a number of great and good Englishmen who have done greater service to India than even some of her best sons. Such men are not confined to politicians in England but include a host of Anglo-Indian administrators who in their time worked strenuously not merely to make India materially prosperous as the majority of Anglo-Indian officials do even to-day, but also to improve her moral fibre and make her more and more self-reliant and independent. We fear the present generation of Englishmen has set too high a value on material comfort, and it is difficult to imagine that any living Englishman would grow to the stature of a Macaulay or Bright. But in India the difficulty is different. Apart from the pseudo-scientific theory of the inferiority of coloured races which is a deplorable concomitant of British Imperialism, and as such common to Englishmen in England and in India, the Anglo-Indian official has come to realise what the best of his predecessors had hoped for in the matter of an India rejuvenated through British influences. Poor, frail human nature cannot always bear the shock of reality even with composure. Anticipation is proved by experience in this case also to have been pleasanter than realization. But there are Anglo-Indian officials, even if their number is not legion, who accept the reality with altruistic satisfaction and rejoice at the success of their work. There are many more who accept it with the dignity of a great race as inevitable and bow before it. There are, however, many others—and this is not in the least unnatural—who do not like to lose the power and the profits to which they have so long been used, and are determined to fight to the last. Sometimes they deceive others, but very often they also deceive themselves with the thought that India is not ripe for a concession for which she may be clamouring. They, too, however, have to bow on occasions before the inevitable and yield. On other occasions they carry the Government with them, and the ripe fruit is allowed to rot instead of being allowed to be eaten by those who hunger for it. There is thus a sort of eternal tug of war going on between partisans of reform and partisans of inactivity and the result depends on the relative strength of the parties. It is this that gives us a patch-work without a plan, for the Anglo-Indian often yields, as Mr. Ramsay MacDonald says, "without forethought" and sooner still on a sort of compulsion. Even if this was not the case, the change would still be "without insight" so long as the Anglo-Indian remained an alien in India. Unless that is changed, the only remedy for this state of affairs is a larger admixture of Indians in Executive Government and a greater reliance on the advice of the real representatives of the people instead of an unintelligent and interested police and the pets and proteges of officialdom.

The Saturday Review's comments on Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's views are significant. It writes:—Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's inclusion in the Commission on the Indian Public Services was utterly perverse. Surely he himself should have some doubts as to his usefulness. Does he not feel baffled and out of place? Is he not overwhelmed into decent silence by the enormity of his incapacity to understand the question with which he has, with authority, been asked to deal? Mr. Ramsay MacDonald feels nothing of this. He jauntily takes his place in the unending rank of half-educated, scribbling trippers to India. He will not even wait till the Report of his Commission is out ere he rushes into the Leicester Pioneer with impression and ideas. The complacency of these trotting Labour men is amazing. Mr. MacDonald threatens us with the usual book of half-baked theories and impressions: "When my present work is over, and I am free to write again, I may add another book to my list." It is a comfort to know that Mr. MacDonald, embarked on the foolish pilgrimage which it seems every English Labour leader must take, preserves even a shred of sense and humour. At least he has the grace to admit he is "still learning, and therefore can only hold provisional opinions." This, apparently, is only for a time. A few more weeks in India, and all will be clear! India will then be understood; her problem explained in a pamphlet; and the Indian Civil servant denounced for not at once introducing heaven upon earth into the Five Provinces. If the Indian problem were less grave—if no mischief could be done by men like Mr. Hardie and Mr. MacDonald in a country like India—we could laugh heartily at the insolent conceit of these Indian tourists." We presume some Anglo-Indian bureaucrats would call this sort of writing "sober criticism." If such indeed is their conception of "grasping the responsibilities of journalism", we may live in hopes that the Press Act would become a dead letter. But if any Indian journalist wrote in this style of the pettiest official's vagaries we have no doubt that he would instantly lose his security. Even "sober criticism" directed against an official becomes "sedition" in this country, but we have to see whether such "insolent conceit" as the Saturday Review has indulged in would also be dignified with the name of "sober criticism."

Sober Criticism or Insolent Conceit?

We have received the following interesting and informing communication from Mr. M. D. Thakore, Honorary Secretary of the Edinburgh Indian Association, a body of the efficiency and prosperity of which we can speak from personal knowledge. Mr. Thakore writes:—

"In view of the difficulties which the Students in India have hitherto encountered in obtaining accurate information regarding the courses of instruction given in the University of Edinburgh, the Edinburgh Indian Association has for some time past considered it advisable to take the responsibility of affording such information; and is now in a position to do so to anyone that may be willing to apply to it. The object of the Association in doing this is not only to supply the fullest information, regarding the courses of study, the nature of the climate, the conditions of life and the extent of annual expense, but also to advise in each individual case as to the desirability or otherwise of coming to Edinburgh, in preference to other centres of education where the standard of instruction in certain branches of science is the same as, or in some respects better than, in the Edinburgh University. Of late it has become a settled practice among the Indian Students to flock to the Edinburgh University for every conceivable subject, and though in doing so they are only prompted by the well-established practice of the past, yet it is becoming clear every day that the steady and increasing aggregation of Students in Edinburgh is leading to the derivation of less benefit and more harm than was the case hitherto. It is, therefore, eminently necessary that the Student who desires to come to Edinburgh should obtain the fullest information regarding the educational facilities here, and in view of the great congestion here, consider the advisability of going to other centres should these be in no way inferior to Edinburgh. And the Indian Association here is willing to afford all this advice. It must be clearly understood here that, in undertaking this work, the Association is not setting itself as a rival body to the Advisory Committees which have been recently instituted in some parts of India. Indeed, such work was done by individual members in the past, and the collective official action now is only due to the new conditions that are arising, in view of the increasing number of students that are coming to Edinburgh every year. And it is hardly necessary to mention that the Indians resident here are best suited for this task, as they alone can estimate correctly the requirements of the Indian Students and their expectations." All communications should be addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Edinburgh Indian Association, 11, George Square, Edinburgh.

It is a relief to know that there is at least one subject connected with Aligarh on which one is not afraid to write. That is Aligarh cricket. Until very recently one used to recall with pain the earlier glories of Aligarh in the days of the brothers Siddique and Mahmud of Shaikat and Hamid, of Abdul Wahab, Mughni and Abul Hasan and latterly of Ahsan and Ali Hasan. Those seemed to be the days of giants, but the exploits of Shaikat and Salamuddin to a great extent reconciled one to the present. It was recognised that even if the standard of cricket in India had, however, generally risen, the standard of Aligarh cricket had not risen in the same proportion. Fears were, therefore, entertained that the pre-eminence which Aligarh enjoyed in the game might possibly be lost. No Captain had shown anything like the skill of that born organiser and amiable despot, the late Mr. Abdullah who succeeded in pushing the team up to a level which it had never reached before. Happily, however, our fears are vanishing, for Feroz Hanifullah Khan of Bhopal, whose popularity among the students is well deserved, is a keen sportsman and good many things more. His men are attached to him and to each other by the spirit of camaraderie which he has infused into the team. With his assistance the College has engaged Mr. Fairweather of Kent, last season's champion county, to coach the team and we trust Mr. Fairweather will soon lick them into shape. This year the Aligarh XI has played seven matches, winning nine and drawing two. This is exceedingly hopeful, and a unique feature of this success is that in many cases they have won through sheer grit and by the skin of their teeth. The team consists of such success was the one achieved last Thursday at Delhi. Delhi scored 120 in the 1st innings; to which Aligarh replied with 146. Out of this Mr. Salam-ud-din, who was very successful both with the bat and the ball in the All-India Team that played in England, made 44. But the tail wagged rather gaily when Mr. Masud made 26 and Mr. Mahmud 31, not out, thus giving the advantage of 26 runs to their side in the 1st innings. In the second innings Delhi made 187. Captain Tod played exceedingly fine cricket for his 43, and Mr. Campbell, who had made 27 in the 1st innings when he was run out, made 44 in the second. Other scorers on the Delhi side were Mr. Moore-Gwyn had made 34 in the 1st innings and Col. Theisger who made 33 in the second. Aligarh had now 162 runs to make and shaped so badly that five wickets were down for thirty odd runs. But once more the tail worked wonders. Mr. Masleh-ud-din made 52 and Mr. Masud 27, while Mr. Ashfaq carried his bat with 49 to his credit. These three plucky innings entirely turned the tables, and thanks to them Aligarh pulled the match out of the fire. There was no nervousness to the end and this is the most hopeful sign. We trust the Delhi match would become an annual fixture, and that Aligarh Cricket would be as much a glory of the College in the future as it has been in the past.

Aligarh Cricket.

The Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla, President of the last session of the All-India Moslem League, received a great ovation when he concluded his Presidential Address and from several outward indications, which we need not describe, we gathered that Sir Ibrahim's opinions gave no umbrage even to the few so-called moderates of the Punjab. If the Hon. Mr. Shafi would like to challenge our statement he would not have to travel very far from his own family circle to discover the gentleman we would then unhesitatingly place in the witness-box. But we must say that, in spite of Mr. Shafi's consistently supporting the ideal of self-government suited to India which he adopted three months after its birth in his own Presidential Address, we were far from easy in our mind about his attitude in the last session of the League, and it soon became evident that his deep sense of loyalty could not permit him to refrain from some expression at least of disagreement. In his own words, "it is impossible for one who presided over the Anniversary" at which the League's political creed was adopted to remain silent. This reminder of his having being President of the League in the previous session was hardly necessary except for self-aggrandisement for, having taken some pains to make his election acceptable to the community, we should think we knew something about the matter. When poor Mr. Balfour was compelled against his better judgment to "toe the line" at the dictation of his masterful colleague, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, in the matter of Tariff Reform, Mr. Lloyd George playfully referred to the situation by using an apt metaphor. He said that Mr. Balfour was hatching the cuckoo's egg all the time and calling it his own. Those few who are privileged to read Mr. Shafi's emphatic adherence to the ideal of self-government suited to India in the columns of the Observer are not unlikely to enquire about the paternity of the cuckoo hatched by the Hon. Mr. Shafi. But although Mr. Shafi has adopted the bird as his very own nobody is likely to wonder at the horror with which Mr. Shafi views the forecast of India's political future outlined in the Presidential Address of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla. Sir Ibrahim seems to have committed the heinous crime of casting the horoscope of India, and although no one in his senses could have been imagined to have mistaken the purpose of Sir Ibrahim, Mr. Shafi has seen fit to denounce his crime. Obviously the President of the Azra session desired to convince even the most ardent spirits among the Moslems that whatever their ideal "it depends entirely upon yourselves how early you will realize your proud destiny." "It will call," said Sir Ibrahim, "for the best in your nature; you will have to be patient and persevering; you will have to be prepared for all calls of self-sacrifice and devotion to your Motherland. . . . You will have always to bear prominently in mind that an early realization of your ultimate hopes and aspirations depends wholly upon retaining in the land the beneficent rule of the Crown of England. During the transition period the presence of the British in India is absolutely indispensable. You are bound to grow to a full manhood in time and come into your own inheritance, but you must in no way be impatient of your guardian. In trying to accelerate the pace do not retard your progress. We have to remember also that we shall not reach the goal by the use of physical force. Anarchism and bombs never have in the history of any nation ensured progress or helped in attaining their end. Believe me, gentlemen, that when the time arrives the force of moral pressure will be irresistible and it will absolutely ensure the realization of our proud destiny." In another place also Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla emphasised the need of caution. "Whatever the ideal," said he, "I should like to appeal to you to bear constantly in mind that nothing should be allowed to excite a feeling of impatience, a desire to reach it by short cuts, or a tendency to excite the passions of the people." After this who could misunderstand the meaning or the purpose of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla when he described to them his own vision of a self-governing India in the following words:—"I am one of those dreamers who firmly believe that, given a sufficiently long spell of British rule in India, we are bound to become united as a nation in the real sense of the term. When that time arrives (as it is sure to do), we shall have qualified to rule the country ourselves and self-government will be absolutely assured to us . . . No country such as India is can renounce for ever under foreign rule, however beneficent that rule may be, and though British rule is undoubtedly based on beneficence and righteousness, it cannot last for ever . . . India is our Motherland, our proud heritage, and must in the end be handed over to us by our guardians. I regard the connection of England with India in the nature of guardianship over minor children." The italics are Mr. Shafi's. It seems that Mr. Shafi's loyalty must always be displayed in the shop window to attract and he could not evidently afford to miss the opportunity when a rival in his estimation opened a more business-like concern on the other side of the street, even though it was done without any "booming." He describes Sir Ibrahim's perfectly simple remarks as "the wild dreams of a political visionary", while presumably his own Address was "practical statesmanship" and "wise guidance through the complicated web of modern political conditions." Had anybody responsible for the good government of India felt inclined to rely on his much "boomed" loyalty, we would have reminded such a person of the comment on the Player Queen's emphatic assertions as to her everlasting fidelity in Hamlet: "Methinks she protests too much."

"Wild Dreams."

ENGLISHMEN are not likely to be caught such chaff as Mr. Shafi can offer. But for Mr. Shafi's special edification we would refer to an article contributed by the famous author and dramatic critic, Mr. William Archer, under the heading of "A Vision of India" in which he gives the speech of "the Last Viceroy" delivered on the occasion of resigning his office into the hands of the Princes and Citizens of India on the 31st of December, 2000 A. D. Its political wisdom and literary grace stand in no need of any comments of our own and we are sure our readers will study it carefully. We would here reproduce only a short passage in which none other than an Englishman has given Mr. Shafi an effective reply by anticipation. "I could name to you" Mr. Archer makes the "Last Viceroy" say, "some of the greatest of British soldiers and administrators who saw and declared that British Rule could not be an end in itself, but only a means to an end, and that it must consciously, deliberately and sincerely address itself to the realization of that end—a self-governing, self-protecting, United India. But not many Englishmen were at that time—I speak of a century ago—able to take so large and clear a view. The prevailing tendency was to assume that the glory and prestige of England demanded the eternity of the British Raj, and to regard as disloyal the most reasonable and law-abiding aspiration towards self-Government. What is to us a truism was to that generation an inalienable paradox—namely, that England's mission was not to perpetuate her rule, but to render it as brief as was consistent with the safety and well-being of India. Few could then realize that the most glorious day in the annals of England would be that which has now arrived—the day on which, her great work accomplished, she could lay down her stewardship and say to a self-controlled, self-reliant India, 'Hail and farewell.' Mr. Archer's Last Viceroy truly gauges the present situation when he says: "So long as the superstition of sempiternity prevailed, it was inevitable that the relations between the governing power and the more intelligent among the governed should be strained to the point of hostility. Even the most necessary measures of external security were resented, for they seemed to mean primarily the security of foreign rule. Administrative efficiency awoke the reverse of gratitude, for it seemed to mean the condemnation of native-born India to perpetual inefficiency." Then he describes the change that came over the whole spirit of the scene when what he calls "the superstition of sempiternity" was abandoned and "gradually, imperceptibly, a new light stole into the official mind and a true ideal replaced the idol of an ever-enduring Raj." "With faith in the sincerity of the governing power there came a new willingness to realize and admit the amount of leeway that had to be made up before India could stand alone among the great powers of civilization. Energies once devoted to embittered political agitation were now concentrated on social reform. Political thought instead running off on purely critical, destructive lines turned to construction, to planning, to forecasting constitutional arrangements and administrative methods. The new orientation gave to Indians in the public service a new motive for developing the best that was in them, since their efficiency no longer went merely to the credit of foreign rule, but helped to curtail the term of tutelage." After this Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla can well afford to ignore the inanities of the Hon. Khan Bahadur Mian Mohamed Shafi.

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

II.

LAST week we described the circumstances in which the Press Act was enacted in February 1910 and stated the reasons that induced the non-official Members of the Council to support the Bill. We then showed how the assurance of the absence of Censorship was belied by the use made of the terrors of the Press Act as an "antecedent" restraint in practice if not in theory. We postpone for the present, the consideration of the second and most important assurance namely, the provision of ample security against hasty and arbitrary action. in the form of what is virtually an appeal to a highly competent judicial authority," and come to the third, namely the absence of universal licensing with power to the Government to withdraw or refuse a license at discretion. Let us see how far this has been realised in actual practice.

Now the deposit of security was objected to by non-official members on the ground that such a demand constituted a slur on a profession as noble as any other. The Hon. Sir Harold Stuart, then Home Secretary, disagreed with this, and after quoting from Professor Sidgwick and Professor Dicey against the alleged injustice and unreasonableness of the demand, he gave a number of precedents such as the Stock Exchange, the Inns of Court and the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge where security or "caution money" had to be deposited on entrance. Indian precedents such as that of the Broker's Association in Bombay and of cashiers and treasurers and other Government and private employees were also given. This naturally led the journalist to believe that every one would be required to deposit a security, and thus all would be equally honoured or dishonoured. The universality of the hump would have reconciled the hump-backed old woman in the fable to her own deformity, and the universality of the demand of a deposit might have reconciled journalists to its pressure. Government had opposed Mr. Gokhale's amendment that the Magistrate may demand security only in such cases in which he reasonably thought that the press was likely to be used for unlawful purposes, and the then Law Member, Mr. S. P. Sinha, had met this amendment by anticipation and had argued that the proposed discrimination of Mr. Gokhale, and not the Government's universality of demand, would cast a slur on the journalist. And yet, experience has shown that there has been the most invidious discrimination in demanding security. If a list was prepared of persons exempted and the grounds of exemption, written and unwritten, were mentioned therein, it would be apparent that what Mr. Sinha honestly wished to avoid, but what Mr. Gokhale felt was bound to happen in spite of all the honest intentions of the Government of India, has actually come to pass. In some cases security was not demanded at first, but some perfectly lawful criticism of local or provincial authorities roused the wrath of the District Magistrate, and the order of exemption was cancelled and security demanded in the most offensive manner. What consolation, then, can the stricken journalist find in the horror of Mr. Sinha at the mere possibility of what has been an ordinary experience in these days. "And, mind you," said our esteemed fellow-countrymen from his place in the Government of India, "there is no appeal against it; it is final, absolutely conclusive, if the Magistrate says 'give security, you are a seditious person, you ought not to be allowed to print anything; put down two hundred or five hundred rupees, as the case may be.' I say that is not an improvement on the Bill, and my hon. friends are not quite familiar with the provisions of the Bill."

In order to judge whether Mr. Sinha's assurance has or has not been belied, let us examine the way in which the apparently inelastic provisions for the demand of a security have been stretched and contracted, as if they were meant to establish in effect a system of universal licensing with powers to the Government to grant a license or withdraw it. Our own case is an instance in point. An application was made to the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta in December, 1910, for dispensing with the security that we were required to deposit under Section 8 (1) of the Press Act, and he referred it to the Police. The C. I. D. knew nothing against the publisher, but that was not considered sufficient; what induced the Calcutta C. I. D. in the end to recommend the exemption applied for was the fact that a former Director of Criminal Intelligence had at one time under his consideration the appointment of the publisher as his Assistant Director. That was enough. The security was dispensed with and for twenty months the Comrade was published from Calcutta without any difficulty. Once indeed our doors were darkened by the shadow of one of the stupidest of a not over intelligent fraternity of spies; but we took him over to the officer in-charge of the C. I. D. branch, who disowned the man, but nevertheless warned him not to trouble us in the future.

In September, 1912, we transferred our offices to Delhi, and as there was no printing press here capable of turning out the work of the Comrade, we were compelled to undertake the expense, trouble and worry of keeping a large printing press of our own. Coming events are believed to cast their shadows ahead, and our recent experience of the one that had darkened our door, coupled with the demand of security from our ill-fated contemporary, the Zamindar of Lahore, led us to suspect that the authorities at Delhi may not let slip such a golden opportunity as a new declaration without demanding security. This apprehension was strengthened by an interview of quite a novel character for us which we had had with the Delhi District Magistrate. We accordingly prepared for the worst and purchased Government Paper for the maximum amount for which security could have been demanded. But we still hoped for the best, and must gratefully acknowledge that we were assured by some of the highest officials concerned that no security would be demanded from us. After several appearances before more than one District Magistrate the question was finally settled, and the exemption applied for was granted. We pass over the conversation which we had on the subject with the District Magistrate as he desires to treat such matters as private. But let us glance at the order publicly passed. It says:—

The application is accepted in view of the fact that applicant has already passed through a trial of respectability extending over nearly two years in Calcutta.

The wording of the order is interesting and provides a certain amount of consolation that "respectability" according to the standard of Calcutta is acceptable even in Delhi. Not being overburdened with funds, we sold the Government Paper which we had purchased in anticipation, and busied ourselves with more pressing affairs than the Press Act and its administration. For nearly a year we came across nothing that reminded us of the Press Act's existence, and this covers the whole period during which the Balkan War with all its horrors and attendant excitement in India lasted. But towards the end of June last we were compelled to criticise the action of the Delhi Municipality, or rather the unreasonable proposals of its acting official Chairman, which had caused a strike among the butchers lasting for a month. The strike was happily settled by the permanent official Chairman on his return from leave on the very lines which we had suggested in vain to his locum tenens, and so far as the butchers were concerned the matter ended. But we were less fortunate and were drawn into correspondence with the Hon. the Chief Commissioner on the subject of some remarks of a highly offensive character alleged to have been made by the acting Official Chairman of the Municipal Board against our fellow-countrymen. Hardly had the matter come to an end—a rather abrupt and unexpected end—when the Government of India declared the forfeiture of the Turkish appeal to Englishmen and Christians, known as the "Come Over Into Macedonia and Help Us" Pamphlet, of which we had received some copies several months previously. We had reproduced this appeal as a supplement in four issues of the Comrade, and the Standard had published a translation of it in eighteen issues. The Government Notification said nothing about these issues, but the District Magistrate seized them just the same. On applying to him for a reconsideration of the matter, he acknowledged his mistake and returned them to us, although most of them were subsequently seized under a fresh notification. We may state in parenthesis that the powers conferred by the Press Act, which has always been declared to be a preventive rather than a punitive measure, were not exercised for two months after the commencement of the reproduction of matter which the Government considered worthy of being proscribed, while the reproductions and translations were not proscribed for another month. Against a declaration of forfeiture of the original pamphlet by the Government of Bengal, of precisely the same character as that of the Government of India for the Province of Delhi, and the seizure in pursuance of that declaration of a copy which luckily we then had at Calcutta, and offered to the Police Commissioner for confiscation, we presented an application to the Chief Justice of Bengal for the appointment of a Special Bench of three Judges of the High Court to hear our appeal. No sooner had this application been made than we were required by the District Magistrate of Delhi to deposit Rs. 2,000, the maximum amount of security that he could demand from the keeper of a printing press under Section 3 (1) of the Press Act. We reproduce the order passed on the occasion as it would show whether the demand of security by District Magistrates does or does not cast a slur on the person from whom it is demanded. In doing so we may explain the second occasion on which we lost grace, which furnished an excuse for the District Magistrate of Delhi for his demand. After suppressing for six whole weeks all accounts of the excitement prevalent at Lucknow over the contemplated demolition of part of a mosque, because we desired the matter to be amicably settled without recourse to agitation in the 24th January.

The Comrade.

71

Press at a time when there was already enough excitement among the afflicted Mussalmans, we reluctantly published on the demolition of the Machhli Bazar Mosque, the full correspondence on the subject which we had patiently and, as it turned out, fruitlessly, carried on with His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces. This we did with the entire concurrence of His Honour, and of the two articles which we published on the subject and to which the District Magistrate refers in his order, one at least drew from Sir James Meeson himself the meed of praise. The order runs as follows :—

On the 9th October 1912, Mohamed Ali son of Abdul Ali, made a declaration that he was the keeper of a Press called "The Comrade and Hamdard Press" situate in the Kucha-i-Chelan, Delhi. He applied to be excused from furnishing security under section 3 (1) Act of 1 of 1910, and on 9th October 1912, I passed an order accepting his application on the ground that he had passed through a trial of two years in Calcutta, during which he had kept out of trouble such as is indicated in the Press Act. This order was a distinct departure from my usual practice and there seemed no harm in reposing confidence in a man who had received a University training and advanced education such as the recipient of this favour has received.

Unfortunately Mohamed Ali has not justified this trust and has published in the two papers, which are printed at his Press, articles which are reprints and reproductions of a pamphlet which the Government of India and various Local Governments have had to proscribe under Section 12 (1) of Act 1 of 1910. The pamphlet in question, entitled "Come over into Macedonia and Help us," contains matter which any one knowing and wishing well of India should have refrained undoubtedly from publishing.

Furthermore the papers which have issued from this Press have contained articles referring to the demolition of a part of the Machhli Bazar Mosque at Cawnpore, which have not been entirely justified by the explanation in Section 4 (1) of the Act. It is assuredly this class of publication which has led to the sad loss of life which occurred in the recent riot.

I have quoted sufficient reasons to show that Mohamed Ali has not grasped the responsibilities of journalism. He is a man whom I am no longer justified in exempting from those provisions of the Press Act which deal with security. Accordingly I cancel my order of 9th October 1912 under Section 3 (1) of Act 1 of 1910, and require that the declared keeper of the "Comrade and Hamdard Press" furnish a security of Rs. 2,000.

The said keeper of the Press is not present as the summons has been returned signed by Manzur Ahmad, an employee of the Press, with the intimation that Mohamed Ali is absent in Calcutta. This order is accordingly pronounced to him and a notice will be sent at once to the Manager of the Press that security for Rs. 2,000 is required and is to be paid before any further use is made of the "Comrade and Hamdard Press."

In view of such practice it is little consolation to us to know that the theory of the Press Bill as framed by the then Law Member was quite different, and that it was against the possibility of such an action that Mr. S. P. Sinha had spoken when he had said : "And, mind you, there is no appeal against it; it is final, absolutely conclusive, if the Magistrate says 'give security; you are a seditious person, you ought not to be allowed to print anything!' Fortunately for us the Cawnpore settlement has left no doubt in the mind of any reasonable person as to the people really answerable for the guilt of the blood. As for the sin of rescuing the truth from the dark dungeons of the Balkans and appealing in the name of that humanity which characterised none more entirely than the great founder of Christianity, it is no small consolation to us that the words of Major Readon were buried deep in the dust of Delhi's official pigeonholes even before the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins made in his judgment the well-known declaration about our character and purpose. Having published in full the indictment of a Magistrate, and who we need offer no apology for reproducing a short passage from the memorable judgment of one who has been the Chief Justice of two High Courts and the right-hand man of Lord Morley as member of his India Council. He concluded his judgment as follows :—

The applicant, Mr. Mohamed Ali, is by no means unknown in India; he is a journalist of position and repute. Though he is not an accused, he tells us that he regards himself as under the stigma which (he declares) most attach to any journalist who has come under the operation of an Act directed, primarily at any rate, against a criminal movement marked by outrages which so shocked the public sentiment as to call for this drastic legislation. But even if he has not succeeded in proving the negative that fate and the law have thrown in his way, at least his application has not been wholly in vain. The Advocate-General, representing the Government, has publicly announced that Mr. Mohamed Ali's forfeited pamphlet is not, in his opinion, a seditious libel, and, indeed, that he attributes no criminal offence to Mr. Mohamed Ali; he was even willing to concede and believe he was acting in the highest interests of humanity and civilisation. In this, I think, the Advocate-General made no admission which it was not proper for him to make. Mr. Mohamed Ali then has lost his book, but he has retained his character; and he is free from the stigma that he apprehended. And this doubtless will be some consolation to him when we dismiss, as we must, his present application.

We have now seen how, in our own case, has been belied the assurance that no slur would be cast on anybody by the demand of security inasmuch as no discrimination would be exercised by the District Magistrate in his unappealable orders on the ground of the character of the person making a declaration before him. But this is not all. Another assurance was given by Mr. S. P. Sinha as regards the amount of security to be demanded. We were assured that in one particular the otherwise inelastic provisions about security were designedly made elastic. The amount of security to be deposited was to range between Rs. 500 and 2,000. "Unless we are to assume," said Mr. Sinha, "that the Magistrate is by design a malevolent creature, we may take it for certain that in ordinary cases he will not ask for more than Rs. 500, the minimum." To this Mr. Gokhale replied with the assurance characteristic of the practical man who is in touch with reality, and said : "Well, I am prepared to take a good many things from Mr. Sinha, but I am not prepared to take that from him, as that would depend on the Magistrate and not on the Law Member of this Council." And what has been our experience in this matter? We know nothing about the malevolence or benevolence of the Magistrates' designs, but if a detailed statement was furnished by Government it would be apparent to anybody that in the majority of cases in which small presses which published newspapers containing criticism of the United Provinces authorities during the Cawnpore Mosque agitation were required to furnish security, the amount of the security was not the minimum but the maximum. The Hon. Mr. Qamrul Huda worded the question which he asked in the Council on the 16th January somewhat unfortunately, for one of the two statements laid on the table by the Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock excluded the names of such newspapers as were printed at their own presses for which the proprietor had to give security as the keeper of the press and not as the publisher of the newspaper, while the other gives only the numbers of presses and neither shows what newspapers they printed nor gives the amount of security demanded from them. We trust he will now ask for these details and enable the public to know what a "slaughter of innocents" has taken place by depriving the provision about the amount of security to be demanded in each case of the elasticity which Mr. Sinha emphasised. Can the respective District Magistrates who demanded the maximum security from papers like Tauhid and Ahl-i-Hadis justify such use of their discretion? But the fact is that their orders are unappealable and by framing the law as he did the then Law Member uncorked the bottle that held its genie in thrall. The District Magistrates are now the despots that the law made of them, and even appeals to their executive superiors have every chance of being thrown into waste-paper baskets on the ground that, forsooth, executive officers cannot interfere with Magisterial discretion. To demand Rs. 2,000 and then Rs. 10,000 from keepers of lithograph presses whose entire stock-in-trade does not exceed a few hundred rupees in value is to establish a form of licensing as subversive of the freedom of the Press as that against which Milton pleaded three and a half centuries ago in his Areopagitica in vain. This should be a lesson to those who make laws which lock innocent enough on paper without taking the trouble to consider by what type of men they would be administered."

The Indian Moslems' Tasks.

IV.

European critics of Islam, while surveying its fortunes since the dawn of the 19th century, invariably trace the causes of its secular decline to the position of woman in Moslem society. Their arguments have been strongly reinforced by the vast development of the sociological thought in recent years; and it cannot be denied that the rapid advance of the science bearing on human society has led to the growth of a series of revolutionary doctrines in regard to sex relations. The modern economist and the eugenist between them are replanning a new Utopia, and the whole of Western Europe is living in a state of oppressive dread of the moral thunder that hangs in the air. When the storm bursts—and burst it surely will—and the tornado of elemental human passions sweeps on the complicated web of things that sum up the life of modern European society, an entirely new world will arise from the wreckage. But whether it will mark a further stage in the civilisation of Europe, or mean a repudiation and a new departure, it is not easy to guess. The weight of prophesy is, we may note in passing, towards dread and dire things. Almost every visionary of note, with a complete scheme of his Utopia in his pocket, would be nothing if not a creator of an entirely new world out of the void. He disdains to take into account any material but man, simple, stark and elemental, and would willingly pass a sponge over the past. Those whose visions of the future are of more modest range have reduced their social ideals to schemes of adaptations. The fundamental fact with which we are concerned at present is that

Both the visionary and the constructive reformer agree in thinking that the position of woman in the European society is not what it ought to be, and they trace all existing economic and social evils to the unsatisfactory relations between the sexes. They think it would be more natural and conducive to greater human felicity if woman were to participate freely with man in every sphere of human activity, if marriage were released from the tiresome restraints of custom and made the free expression of a willing partnership, and if the home were to be turned into a sort of agency for training children under the supreme responsibility of the State. Europe has not yet wholly lost its horror of nostrums such as these, and one need not pause to consider how the very thought of them would affect a Mussalman of India. From a pardah-nashin Moslem lady to a sufferer of Hyde Park is indeed a far cry, and yet one cannot enter into a discussion of the conditions that govern the lives of Moslem women without having Europe as a background. The world-thought possesses ethereal pulses to-day and radiates with incredible speed through space. Social institutions and sociological ideas and experiments of Europe have a disturbing influence in India, and unless a well-planned effort at social reconstruction proceeds from within, European influences will do their destructive work and sooner or later reduce the whole structure to ruin.

The Moslem society in India has, through causes that can be easily named, grown out of joint. This much is perceived even by those who deplore the present and yet shiver at the least suggestion of doing something to improve it. It may be accepted as an axiom that the reconstruction of Moslem society is not a question of imitating the most successful social experiment elsewhere. What is great for Europe may conceivably become poison for Moslem India. No community can divorce its present from its past or look forward to a future that has no relation with either. The Indian Mussalmans will have to frame their own point of view, their own line of work and their own particular plan for their social reconstruction. Other social systems are to them but facts of general human experience which they can turn profitably into account. The supreme question is to ascertain the need and devise the remedial measure. It is obviously beyond the scope of our present purpose to launch into an argument as to the best possible and complete social doctrine. After all, the tests of social efficiency are shifting and indeterminate, and all social idealism is but a reflex of certain needs which often cease to exist before a new generation has come to tread on the heels of the old. Philosophers tell us that a social system must possess the virtue of stability, and that it should give maximum satisfaction to all the units that compose it. History, however, has stamped these doubtful virtues as a sign of decay and death. The Chinese society had been till yesterday stable for centuries, and it may be presumed that it gave the maximum satisfaction to its members. And yet the threats of every jaded social reformer in the rest of the world have been adorned with the tale of China and its inevitable moral. Stability is frequently an outward symbol of inward death, and the satisfaction of individual members a helpless and unquestioning resignation to conditions of life that have become fixed and adamant. It is enough for our purpose to know that no society can be said to fulfill its functions which is not fully responsible to fresh needs and does not afford the utmost scope for the development of personality. Life is not being, but becoming, and society in its healthy state is a process of eternal readjustments. Apart from its fundamental beliefs about the nature and destiny of man, the first and last things of life, so to speak, it should have no convictions which are not temporary, no beliefs that cannot be parted with without a pang. For no society can save itself from an early dissolution which in the pursuit of ease and uniformity elaborates a series of deadening systems and places every detail of life under the grip of a dogma. Such an effort results in a flat, prescribed and graduated state of being in which every individual drives a dull and fruitless existence. Every child is forced to be born after the image of his parents, and end his life in a weary round of predestined activities. It was such efforts in history which gave birth to the monstrous developments known as the caste-system. The root-evil of these deformities is that they utterly suppress personality and cast it as a burnt offering at the altar of a system or a dogma. The first great truth to be remembered is that the individual does not exist for society, but that society is a contrivance for the free play of individual personality under certain well-defined limits. Personality is, therefore, the most important and most sacred thing. To try to reduce it to a cloud-level of sameness is to defy Nature and thwart the purposes of God. Every child that is born into the world is a new experiment in being, unique and wonderful. Society should be to it a free and intimate atmosphere for the unfolding of its personality. Every moment of its life should be to it not a prescription but a miracle. It should get stimulus for complete self-expression from other beings as unique as itself, and by its strivings and joyous activities grow up into efficient and purposeful method and become a living influence in social life as a whole.

These considerations should have the utmost weight in dealing with the question of social reconstruction amongst the Mussalmans. The supreme aim is the free development of personality. The conditions of Moslem society should, therefore, be such as would amply fulfill the purpose. Now the chief factor in human development is the home conditions and it is consequently the Moslem home on which the searchlight should be turned. European writers on Islam usually describe a Moslem home as a prison-house where women-slaves dwell and spend their lives in ministering to the wants and whims of their autocratic master. A Mussalman, however, knows that the description is as false as a caricature. Not only are there no slaves in Moslem homes, but the Moslem women are complete mistresses in their own spheres, enjoy their prerogatives as mothers and wives and exercise the influence that is their birth-right. Were it otherwise, the Mussalmans would not have been face to face with the problem of women's education to-day. It is because the authority and influence of woman is complete in the zenana, that the need has been felt to train and educate her and enlighten her mind. As the first and most effective teacher of children, as the partner of man in his life-struggles and hopes and triumphs, as the power mainly responsible for domestic efficiency and peace, woman is the key-stone of all social structures. Her training and intellectual and moral fitness is to be achieved before any efforts at reconstruction in Moslem society. As things are, the mental equipment and training of Moslem women is hopelessly inadequate. They are not only ignorant, but also carry a dead weight of prejudices and superstitions which has never formed a part of the mentality of their Moslem sisters in other lands. This, we are sorry to have to say, is a distinct gift of Hindu India. Ignorance is a paralysing handicap not so much because it leads to inefficiency, but because it produces a grey, flat, level ground from which personalities of almost similar character take their rise. A community of savages is efficient enough for the few purposes of its life; but it suffers from the blight of sameness. Every savage is like his brother savage in his mental features and outlook on life, and in the sum of their existence there is no variety, no richness, no stimulus of ambition, no provoking and fugitive suggestions of mystery which tempt a man ever and over on to new and higher stages of being and endeavour. If the women of a community are ignorant, and thus cramped and dwarfed in their mentality, the new generations grow up in the same deadening atmosphere, and the loss of personality in the individual is the inevitable result. It is a terrible price to pay and no community can bear the burden without self-stultification.

It would seem, therefore, that the most anxious and immediate concern of the Mussalmans ought to be to organise a thoroughly communal system of education for Moslem girls. The need is being felt but not with such keenness as would lead to the birth of the preacher and the fanatic of reform. Mild resolutions in favour of women's education in annual conferences yet mark the stage at which Moslem enthusiasm has reached. An attempt was made many years ago to focus the stray desires of a few intelligent Mussalmans into an organised movement with its centre at Alipur. What this movement has achieved is still a mystery. The gentleman who officially controls the movement is evidently so shy that he insists on keeping the results of his activities in strict pardah. Meetings of the Female Section of Moslem Educational Conferences are held every year, but the Secretary has not submitted his report for several years past. The force goes on and a proportionately huge expenditure is being incurred for the maintenance of an elementary school, without method, without ideal, without even the initial energy required for an experiment. Amongst educated Mussalmans the desire to educate their daughters is springing up, but no efficient schools exist to which they could send the girls with confidence. Schools are seldom available, still more seldom of a satisfactory type. The public schools or Christian missionary institutions, even where they are found, are not fit places for the training of Moslem girls. The difficulties are great and every year that they are left unsolved would add to the seriousness of the situation. Efforts should be made by every means by means of an independent organisation, if need be to draw up a complete programme and start a vigorous campaign for bringing light and emancipation to Moslem women. The task is the noblest and yet the hardest that the Mussalmans have yet to face. Will not some valiant spirit sound the call and rally other brave hearts for the fight? The hope is, not extravagant and Moslem courage and chivalry are not yet wholly defunct.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Criminal Settlement at Aligarh.

Sir,—In the Comrade of the 20th December 1913, I saw a letter written by Commissioner Booth-Tucker, Head of the Salvation Army in India, giving his version of the recent trouble in the Beriah settlement located in the Fort at Aligarh.

Before I write further, I would like to mention that personally I have the greatest respect and admiration for the Salvation Army and the grand work its officers are doing for their faith. When the late General Booth first started the Army with its Red Coats, military titles and brass bands, people in England laughed and ridiculed the idea by calling it a "tamasha", but that great and good Christian persevered; and with the help of devoted self-sacrificing workers lived down all the ridicule and difficulties which every great movement has to face in the beginning. I have not the pleasure of knowing Col. Booth-Tucker personally, but I have heard from friends a great deal about him. For the sake of his faith he threw up a brilliant career in India and resigning the Indian Civil Service joined the late General Booth. It was he who organised and started the Army Branch in India.

I mention all these facts to show that neither myself nor any other worker at Aligarh is prejudiced against the Salvation Army nor is any of us blinded by religious prejudices. We have no objection to the work of reclamation of criminal tribes; only we object and very strongly that it should be carried on as dangerously close to our nobler and greater work of Moslem regeneration in India. We have difficulties enough of our own to surmount and naturally would feel sore if any thing was done to add to them.

It was for this reason that Sahabzada Aftab Ahmed Khan had opposed the planting of this colony of the worst type of criminals so close to the College. In those days, because he had stood up for his College in the Archbold affair, he had incurred the displeasure of Sir John Hewitt, who refused to give his reasonable views that consideration which the importance and urgency of the subject deserved.

As regards the facts of the recent case, though I was not an actual eye-witness of the first scene, I was in Aligarh that day, and reached the spot barely an hour after the incident and learnt the facts from different sources. I was certainly nearer the spot than Commissioner Booth-Tucker who must have been in Simla.

As for the forbearance of the Beriahs and the language they used, every one should accept the words of a man of the position of Mr. Aftab Ahmed Khan, who was present and was besides the only person cool in all that crowd and thus saved the situation. Further, I know the Beriahs much better than most people, having seen them in their homes while camping as an officer in the three districts of Etawah, Mainpuri and Etah, where they mostly come from. Any Police officer who has served in the Agra Division would bear me out that the Beriahs were one of the most cruel and hard-hearted criminals. In India as in other countries, people felt a sneaking regard and admiration for the old-fashioned dacoit and outlaw, like the famous Tantia Dhol, who took freely from the rich and gave it back equally freely to the poor but Eida Beriah and Darab Shah formed the first gang that, besides robbing people, ravished women also, and I remember very well the satisfaction of the people when Eida was burnt down by his pursuers while hiding in a room full of straw. You yourself happened to be at Kannauj when this occurred and can testify to this.

I would like here to mention that our objection to this Beriah Settlement close to the College is not so much on account of the dacoits and other criminals as on account of the Beriah women. They belong to the "Tawail" class, i.e., prostitutes by caste. While wives and daughters-in-law amongst them are as honest and chaste as women in any country, their daughters and sisters are brought up by these very women for immoral purposes and openly ply their trade. Any Beriah man will offer his unmarried sister or daughter for prostitution without feeling any shame, but if his own wife or daughter-in-law was unfaithful (which was very very seldom) he would inflict the most severe punishment.

Even if Commissioner Booth-Tucker's version of the incident be accepted, it does not alter the real case. Our contention from the very beginning has been that here in Aligarh we have been carrying on with the support and the co-operation of some high-minded Englishmen one of the biggest and noblest works of which any Government and people may be proud, i.e., the regeneration of Mussalmans. We have surmounted many difficulties and have already achieved a great deal, but a great deal more remains. We have built a name and reputation for Aligarh, and the great founder had chosen this spot in preference to Delhi, his own home and birth-place, for the simple reason that he wanted a quiet place, where there would be no other attractions to distract the mind of the future students and where we could expand to our hearts' content. It was for this reason that the old deserted Cantonment of Aligarh, situated on a big bare unwar plain, and away from the Koil city, was chosen as the site of our College.

We, in spite of our poverty, have spent nearly 70 lakhs, on it and nearly 20 lakhs in buildings alone. To thousands of Old Boys and to lakhs of Mussalmans, Aligarh has become a sacred and loving spot. I am not exaggerating when I say, in fact I know what I am talking of, that Aligarh is the one place for which every Mussalman in India has an affection, and I have not the least doubt, that if we wanted more money to-day and put our case before our people plainly and squarely, it will pour in. Right in the middle of this little garden of Mussalmans, you go and locate a Segregation Camp for the benefit of the worst plague-stricken people. You may or may not save the afflicted, but you are sure to contaminate the healthy and strong in the neighbourhood, and thus, instead of checking, spread this dire disease in the length and breadth of the country. We have about 1,800 youths, healthy and strong, from amongst the best families in the country and outside it. We have located them at a safe distance from the city and its temptations. We feel naturally sore that next door to us and our charges, the worst kind of "Yoshiwara" is located. With the best of motives and intentions, it is true, but yet a "Yoshiwara".

I have not one word to say against the Salvation Army and its officers, but I can well understand that it is not the silk-weaving alone, however interesting it may be, that would attract the youths to their camp.

We know the Beriah men and women well and we know the youths well too. They are the same all the world over. No artificial bounds, no Salvation Army officers, no chowkidar, no amount of Proctors and Proctor's Bull-dogs could keep the two away from each other if they could possibly meet; then why put temptation within easy reach?

The only remedy is that the Criminal Settlement must be removed from the beautiful and picturesque mud Fort and the poor students should be given full room for their walks and recreation.

I have not been to the Fort lately but when I went there last, Ensign Mabe and Ensign Liari, his wife, were extremely good to me and took me round explaining everything. They were kind enough to give me some literature and plenty of very useful information about the internal organization of the Army, which I wanted for our Khoddan-i-Ka'ba Society. For the benefit of such of your readers as have visited the Fort before, especially the Old Boys of Aligarh, I give fuller information about this Settlement, as the name may suggest an array of imposing new buildings, etc. There is no such thing as a settlement. Everything appears to be temporary. Over the mound of earth on the picturesque gate was stretched a piece of white cloth with "Hewettpur Settlement" written on it. Inside, that ramshackle old Bungalow near the gate, has been repaired a little and made habitable. The Army officers Mr. and Mrs. Mabe lived in it. The other old building nearer the centre has also been repaired and in it have been put weaving and reeling machines. The only new additions that were then ready had made the place very ugly. They are temporary Kaccha dirty-looking mud huts for these criminals to live in. I doubt if the whole lot cost more than two or three thousand rupees. I think (I am not sure) the Government paid for these temporary sheds. The inmates, men and women, were either allowed to work in the day time, elsewhere, with the permission of the officer-in-charge, or earned their wages working for the Salvation Army.

This is all the settlement.

I am surprised and pained to see that for this, Commissioner Booth-Tucker suggests that the "future great Mohamedan University" may be removed from Aligarh to Delhi. Leave aside the palatial buildings erected at a great cost, he expects us to forget all the happy associations, all the memories which that one word "Aligarh" brings before us wheresoever we may be. Our children are there, imbibing strong and powerful traditions that have grown up. We are asked to give up all these for a well-intentioned but doubtful experiment.

Will the authorities at Oxford and Cambridge tolerate for one second the location in their midst of a settlement for the reclamation of the worst type of cut-throats and criminals from the Seven Dials and the street-walkers from Soho Square and Piccadilly. They would reject the assistance of this "moral stimulant", this "great philanthropic effort" towards the regeneration of their people.

I hope I have made clear that we in Aligarh have no objection to this settlement. We only desire that it should be located at a distance from the College towards the south, leaving the north to us to expand, and that we have nothing but admiration for the work of the Salvation Army at Aligarh and elsewhere, howsoever, we may differ in our faiths.

I hope not only Government but Commissioner Booth-Tucker would also help us in the interest both of his own and our work and remove this settlement to a more suitable locality.

ALMAH, 19th April 1914.

SHAUKAT ALI.

[We have just learnt that, thanks to the efforts of the Hon. Syed Riza Ali, Sir James Meston's Government has promised to remove the Settlement to Dehra Dun District. We expected this from His Honour and are sincerely grateful to him for not belying our expectations. We shall refer to the U. P. Council debate later.—Ed. Comrade.]

The Cawnpore Mosque Defence Fund.

SIR,—I have read in the papers the different suggestions made for the utilization of the Cawnpore fund, now that it is no longer required for the legal defence of the prisoners. To my mind money, coming out of the pockets of people who can ill-spare it, and who must have denied themselves many little comforts, nay even necessities, in order to help their brethren in need should be invested in some profitable concern which would bring them the largest possible returns. Now I cannot imagine a better investment for the money of Moslems than its utilization in helping Khwaja Kamaluddin Sahab.

His noble efforts if properly supported will lift the veil of prejudice cast over the eyes of Europe by centuries of misrepresentation and reveal the true simplicity and beauty of our religion.

I hear that Yahya Parkinson has written 5 books on Islam which are in manuscript and which for want of money have not yet seen the light. Would it not again be a splendid investment for part of the Cawnpore fund to furnish this gentleman with the wherewithal to publish his books?

Mr. Parkinson, from what I see of his writings in the Islamic Review, appears to be a man of high culture and wide attainments. I feel sure that his books if published would be a great acquisition to Islamic literature.

If you will be good enough to give publicity to this letter, I feel sure that the majority of the subscribers to the Fund will agree with me as to the best use to which it could be put.

Hyderabad

MRS. KHURDIJUNG.

Return of the Moslem Mission.

II

Delhi.

MR. WAZIR HASAN'S SPEECH.

In the course of his reply to the address of the Mussalmans of Delhi, Mr. Wazir Hasan invited those Anglo-Indian editors who in the darkness of their sanctums recklessly went on writing that the speaker and Mr. Mohamed Ali were not representatives of the Mussalmans to come and ask that large gathering and the still larger gathering outside the Hall whether they did or did not represent the political attitude and temper of the Moslem community. He then discussed the duties of the Mussalmans as British subjects, as Indian citizens and as Mussalmans. With reference to the Cawnpore settlement, while thanking Lord Hardinge, he said that an administrator of Sir James Meston's ability and intelligence would also have arrived at the same conclusion were it not for the obstacle of Prestige, which intervened like the Himalayas between Mussalmans and justice. Prestige not based on justice could never strengthen British Rule, while justice was bound to strengthen it. Although Nowsherwan was not then alive, his reputation for justice still survived him. The speaker said that their religion had provided for them an excellent code of conduct for all occasions, and in steadfastly following its dictates they would not only remain good Mussalmans but also become good subjects and good neighbours. But the Mussalman who was not loyal to Islam could never be trusted to be loyal to King or country.

The speaker then reminded the audience that the responsibility of a Mussalman for the progress of India was no less than that of a Hindu. So long, however, as Mussalmans had been sunk in ignorance, their participation in politics would have harmed them and their country alike. But a new generation had now come to the forefront and it could be trusted to take its proper share in Indian politics without detriment to itself, to the Government and to the country.

As regards their attitude towards the Congress, if it had changed during the last twenty five years, had not the attitude of the Government undergone a more pronounced change in the same period? Compare and contrast the attitude of Lord Dufferin and Lord Curzon, said Mr. Wazir Hasan, with the attitude of Lord Hardinge, and with still more recent attitude of Sir James Meston himself, and then judge whether it was after all so strange for the Mussalmans to change their attitude towards that body. The Mussalmans may not find it always possible to adjust their attitude to the changing attitude of individual Vicereroys and Lieutenant-Governors, and for that reason the speaker suggested that they should provide themselves with a rule of conduct. He would suggest that, without prejudice to their own interests as a community, they should unite with the Hindus in furthering the cause of Indian prosperity and good government in India through every legitimate constitutional means.

As regards their Mission to England, he said that the British public was engrossed in its own affairs, and it was necessary to send out such missions to England to enlighten it with regard to Indian affairs. He concluded his speech by saying that they should have full confidence in British justice and in their own righteousness and strength of purpose, and they should co-operate with their fellow-countrymen sincerely and cordially.

MR. MOHAMED ALI'S SPEECH.

After him Mr. Mohamed Ali rose to offer thanks for the ovation which the people of Delhi had given to them on their return. He recounted how he had come to Delhi a year ago as a mere stranger, and how in that short space of time Delhi had given him a home and a vast number of friends. This was nothing new, but, an ancient tradition of Delhi, for it had even provided a throne and a dominion over the whole of India for homeless wanderers like Babar whom their own country had sent away as exiles.

Mr. Mohamed Ali referred to the various events which had happened in quick succession in the few years before he and Mr. Wazir Hasan had set out on their Mission to England, and in connection with the Balkan War called upon the Chairman, the Shahi Imam of the Jame Masjid, to bear witness to the many occasions on which he had asked the people of Delhi to voice their gratitude to Lord Hardinge and his Government for their real sympathy and assistance. He had sought the assistance of the Viceroy in order to make it clear to the Mussalmans that whatever British Ministers might do or say the Viceroy and the Indian Government felt for them and were ready to assist them to the best of their powers.

With reference to Cawnpore, he pointed out that, in spite of much pressure brought to bear upon him by numerous visitors from Cawnpore, he had kept the affair of the Mosque out of his papers till a part of it had been demolished. He had reposed full confidence in the sagacity and wisdom of Sir James Meston, but it was impossible for any honest journalist to be satisfied with the demolition of the Mosque, and in view of the heavy responsibility that he had taken upon himself in advising the Cawnpore Mussalmans against newspaper agitation while he was corresponding privately with the Lieutenant-Governor, he was bound to agitate against the sacrilege. Whatever others may say, he had in his possession a letter of Sir James Meston praising at least one of his articles on the subject as "excellent." When, however, Sir James Meston plainly told the deputation at Lucknow that he would do nothing in the matter—a decision which they honestly presumed to have been arrived at in consultation with the Government of India—they recognised that the agitation in India was not only useless but likely to become mischievous. But they did not despair of ultimate justice, and instead of lighting a fiery cross in India as people hostile to British Rule would have done, they proceeded to England to appeal to His Majesty's Ministers, and in the last resort, to the British public. Although they left India very quietly, it was not to be assumed that they felt themselves to be criminals escaping justice. In Bombay, in Aden and in London criminals could be arrested and brought to justice; and after all no crime could be wiped off in three and half months, so that if they were criminals when they left India so quietly, they were criminals still on their return with such evident éclat. What had induced him to leave Delhi so quietly was that with the noose round his neck which every journalist carried in those days, and a judiciary still unseparated from the executive, they felt that it was possible for people to throw obstacles in his way if they announced their intention to go on that Mission and had this come about at the very least much valuable time would have been lost. That was the reason why they had not formally obtained their credentials as the delegates of the people before leaving India. But as they had expected, the people amply provided them with credentials immediately on their departure. He had no desire to publish these reasons for they were less creditable to others than to themselves. But the partisans of those others in the Anglo-Indian Press had tried to make much capital out of their silence on the subject, and he now made a present of those exciting reasons to the Anglo-Indian Press during that festive season, and without injury of them.

The speaker then referred to the many ways that were open to them of advocating the cause of the people, and explained the reasons why they preferred to deal directly with the Ministers in the first instance, and how they spent a good deal of time in that effort. He then gave the fullest details of the dinner episode and conclusively showed that the dinner to be given to them was the independent suggestion of His Highness the Aga Khan himself, who had telephoned to the speaker at midnight immediately after his arrival in London from the Continent for Prince Arthur's wedding, that it was necessary in the interests of justice and of the Moslem Community to "counteract the false charges" published by the Times in its issue of 7th October. He also explained that the words "the Cawnpore victory" were the words uttered by the Right Hon. Mr. Ameer Ali and not by either of the delegates. After giving further details of the dinner episode Mr. Mohamed Ali said that this occupied their time from the 17th October to the 18th November, when through the assistance of His Highness the Aga Khan's letter they broke down their boycott in the Tory Press, and the Morning Post very willingly published the true version of the matter and a very frank leading article in which it called upon Mr. Ameer Ali to offer any explanation that he could give of his own unexplained action.

The speaker said that among other things that they had explained in England to as many as they could reach was that what was called sedition in India was in most cases the natural demand of the grown-up son for a larger allowance than he received as a small child; that many officials demanded from them obedience such as could only be offered to the King-Emperor and to his commands enacted in the form of laws of the land; that the complaint against Young India was a confession of failure on the part of those who had made Young India what it was through the education that they had given it; that public criticism of official action was in reality a praise of praise for the freedom given to India by the British, a freedom that was unknown to the subjects of the Tsar and in the majority of cases to the subjects of Indian Princes; and that what the Indian objected to was not what the law demanded but what executive officers sometimes demanded in excess of the demands of the law.

Mr. Mohamed Ali then gave a summary of other views which they had expressed on behalf of their people and asked them to say whether those were not their views. He said that the great mistake which the British made was to believe that Indians had only been familiar with autocratic methods of Government and could not understand any other, as if those who had been taught in Indian Colleges had read nothing of Locke and Mill, Rousseau and Spencer, Burke and Bright. He said this was extremely folly, but even if it were true, was it possible for the British to satisfy all the demands of autocratic rule? It was true that in Native States the holding of public meetings of protest was not easy; but it was also true that every class of his subject had access to an Indian Prince like own Chief, the Nawab of Rampur who commanded sources of information in his own family and household which British officials did not possess. The latter lived a life apart from the people, and in the absence of personal knowledge as an Indian autocrat possessed they could learn the truth only from the police, from the Press and from public platforms. It was easier for Indians to adjust themselves to the demands of the system of Western democracy, but it was hopeless for the British officials to adjust themselves to the system of Oriental Despotism. They could rule India as the Moghals had done before them, or as they were used to governing in their own country. But their rule in India was as un-Moghal as it was un-British, and no wonder that sitting between two stools they occasionally touched the ground.

The speaker compared the success of their Mission to the dropping of a pebble in the ocean. They could not expect thereby to create a storm, but they were satisfied that ripples had disturbed the evenness of the sea's surface where the calm of ignorance, if not indifference, had reigned before. What was necessary was to arrange for relays of public men for the presentation of their views in England, and this should be done because there was no reason to despair of justice from their Sovereign and from the sovereign people of Great Britain.

Lucknow.

The delegates were not permitted even to enjoy a night's rest at Delhi after their long journey, for the people of Lucknow and Cawnpore were impatiently waiting for their arrival at the headquarters of the All-India Moslem League and in the city the sufferings of which had been the chief immediate cause of their Mission to England. They, therefore, left for Lucknow after a hurried dinner the same night. But owing to the congestion of traffic at Christmas their train reached Lucknow several hours late. In spite of this the entire platform was crowded by thousands who had assembled to greet them, and it was some time before the delegates could push themselves through the crowd to the carriages awaiting them outside. Here considerable delay took place as the people insisted on dragging the carriage and the delegates begged to be excused. In the end the crowd succeeded in taking off the horses and in spite of the protests of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali, and although requested many times to put the horses back, it dragged the carriage the entire distance of two or three miles to the grounds of the Rifah-i-Am Club. Fearing that the hall itself would not be able to hold all the people attending the meeting, the organisers had arranged to put up a large number of shamianas in the grounds. But in spite of the delay for several hours in the arrival of the delegates' train which compelled a large number of people to return home, the attendance at the Rifah-i-Am Club was so large that hundreds of people had to stand in the sun. The proceedings were opened by several speeches by prominent Mussalmans of Oudh who thanked the Mission for the service it had rendered in the cause of Islam and the Moslem Community of India.

MR. WAZIR HASAN'S SPEECH.

After the delegates had been garlanded Mr. Wazir Hasan thanked the people of Oudh and explained the objects which he and Mr. Mohamed Ali had in view when they left for England. He exposed the baselessness of the opposition which their Mission had been subjected to and with impressive eloquence gave expression to the warning that if, God forbid, British strength in India ever declined, the guilt of bringing about that calamity would properly attach to those people who regarded the representation of Indian grievances as a crime. Unless relations between Government and people become closer and more cordial there was not only the possibility of danger in India, but the greater danger of the loss of that prestige which Great Britain rightly enjoys to-day among the nations of the world.

MR. MOHAMED ALI'S SPEECH.

Mr. Mohamed Ali in the course of his speech referred to the colossal ignorance that prevailed in England about this country. As a typical instance he mentioned the case of the Cawnpore Mosque. Soon after reaching England he had collected together through a Press-Cuttings Agency all that had appeared in the English Press on the subject of Cawnpore Mosque. With the single exception of the Outlook, which published several forcible articles condemning the blunder of the authorities and arguing at length and with knowledge about the situation, there was not a single paper which published anything except the lying version concocted after a few days' deliberation by a Cawnpore correspondent of some Anglo-Indian papers. Indian news, continued the speaker, seldom appeared even in the London Daily Press, and when it did appear it was confined to a few lines of alarming news about some outrage in Bengal. The English Press had published nothing about the demolition of the Mosque and the consequent agitation during the entire month which intervened between the sacrilege and the so-called riot, and the British public was therefore shocked by the news of the riot which created the impression that some blood-thirsty ruffians had broken the law and the heads of police without rhyme or reason. One paper had thought it necessary to enlighten its numerous readers on the subject of the place where that "serious riot" had occurred. One would have thought, said the speaker, that the thriving industries of that Manchester of Northern India would appeal to the writer charged with the duty of enlightening the ignorant readers, but nothing so commonplace and vulgarly modern, in fact appealed to him. He went back to the year 1857 and the treachery of Nana Sahib as if that cold-blooded rebel was the type of the average Cawnpore tradesman in the thriving and busy Baisi Bazar to-day. The writer had described the horrors of 1857 and had referred to the Memorial Well as if the deplorable occurrences of the 8th of August were part and parcel of a new mutiny. The speaker asked whether after that they could expect much sympathy for the sufferings of Cawnpore from the readers of that journal. He emphasised the need of enlightening the ignorant, gullible and deluded British public, and urged the necessity of applying two great remedies to such a grave evil. In the first place, he recommended the establishment of a National Fund which could be used, among other things, for the purpose of sending out accredited agents to England from time to time to enlighten the British public about Indian affairs, and he suggested that, if the subscriber consented, the balance of the Cawnpore Mosque Defence Fund after providing for the sufferers might be utilised as a nucleus of the proposed National Fund. The second remedy was the establishment of a Standing Committee of "Friends of the Mussalmans" which could keep in touch through its various sub-committees with the Mussalmans of the world and remove all misunderstandings between the Mussalmans and the British public by collecting accurate information on all important affairs and correcting the misrepresentations of an ill-informed and misinformed Press in England. Mr. Mohamed Ali announced that in spite of the Parliamentary recess of six months the delegates had succeeded in inducing some friends of the Mussalman of different political parties to form such Standing Committee, and he hoped that it would be established within the next few months. He was prepared, he said, to return to England next summer when the Parliament was sitting in order to set this Committee on its feet. He gratefully acknowledged the assistance that he had received from men of various political parties in England, and although the Liberals were more prejudiced against the Mussalmans as a community, and the Tories were less inclined to believe Anglo-Indian officials to be capable of making mistakes in administration, the speaker freely admitted that there were a large number of people of both parties who took interest in the welfare of the Mussalmans and were prepared to listen to their genuine grievances. All that the Mussalmans wanted was interest in their welfare and a desire to do them justice. They could not expect, nor should they expect, to find prejudiced partisans who would espouse their cause whether they were in the right or wrong.

Cawnpore.

THE TELEGRAM TO H. E. THE VICEROY.

Before leaving Cawnpore, Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali sent the following telegram to H. E. the Viceroy :—

"Having seen the depressed and distressing condition of Cawnpore Mussalmans last August, and on our return seeing their joy and hopefulness to-day, we feel we owe it to Your Excellency to bear witness to the magical powers of your loving message addressed to them last October and to thank you most cordially for bringing peace to an afflicted people. Surely the universal affection for Your Excellency of thousands of Mussalmans who received us to-day at Cawnpore must be the most acceptable present that could be offered to Your Excellency on this day. May this Christmas usher in an uninterrupted era of peace and goodwill inaugurated by Your Excellency in our Motherland, and may your name be handed down to coming generations as a great peace-bringer."

H. E. THE VICEROY'S TELEGRAMME TO THE DELEGATES.

The Private Secretary to H. E. the Viceroy sent the following reply by wire to the foregoing Christmas greetings :—

"The Viceroy sends many thanks for your appreciative Message and is glad to hear that peace prevails at Cawnpore."

Once more the train which carried Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali from Lucknow on Christmas morning was some two hours' late. But when they reached Cawnpore they found if anything a larger and still more enthusiastic crowd gathered to greet them at the Railway Station, procession of carriages was formed and proceeded along the selected route which was several miles long. A large portion of which was gay with bunting. Several arches had also been erected along the route, and large crowds lined the roads on either side and threw flowers into the delegates' carriage. The procession first stopped at the Machhi Bazar Mosque which the delegates visited, and then proceeded to the McWright Theatre Hall which was gallily decorated. Here the crowd was enormous and could not have been less than twenty thousand, in spite of the fact that a good many people had gone back home for breakfast on account of the delay in the delegates' arrival.

MR. WAZIR HASAN'S SPEECH.

Mr. Wazir Hasan spoke at considerable length generally on the lines of his previous speeches. He began by expressing thanks of the community to His Excellency Lord Hardinge for his declaration at Cawnpore that the Mohamedans were loyal. That, said the speaker, used to be an axiom, but when the Mussalmans began to voice their legitimate grievance about the Cawnpore Mosque, some Anglo-Indians forgot all that and began to denounce them as seditious. The Viceroy then felt it to be due to the community to declare it publicly and at Cawnpore itself that the charge was unfounded and that the Mussalmans were as loyal as before. The speaker then went on to refer to their Mission in England, and said that the demonstrations of welcome at Bombay, Delhi, Lucknow and Cawnpore had proved better than any thing else their claim to represent their community to have been well-founded. The failure to recognise the national voice was the greatest mistake that their rulers could commit, and those who misled Government and the British public were the worst enemies of British Rule in India. They all wanted the continuance of British Rule in India. What they objected to, and would continue to object to, were the evils of bureaucratic methods of government. They wanted British Rule in India to be based on the principles of justice and a participation in the Government by the subjects, and he described the latest act of Lord Hardinge in coming to Cawnpore as another link in the golden chain that bound India and England together. Referring to the Cawnpore settlement, the speaker, while explaining that it was arrived at three weeks after their reaching England, and that during that interval they had several interviews with responsible and influential people in the India Office and elsewhere in which they fully discussed the situation and the terms of compromise, said they disclaimed all share in the glory of the final settlement for which undoubtedly the credit was due to His Excellency Lord Hardinge and to his counsellors, official and non-official, and last but not least to the Mussalmans of Cawnpore themselves and their legal and other advisers whose good sense and moderation made the compromise feasible. Referring to the Press Act and the judgement of Sir Lawrence Jenkins, the Chief Justice of Bengal, in the Comrade case, Mr. Wazir Hasan described His Lordship as one of the pillars of British Rule in India. In eloquent terms he explained how he felt more attached to England than before after having had the great privilege and pleasure of knowing Sir Lawrence Jenkins and he felt sure that if there were many more Englishmen like Sir Lawrence in India one would hear very little of disaffection and disloyalty. In conclusion, the speaker alluded to the obstacles thrown in their way in England and put in a forcible plea for united action on the part of different communities in India.

MR. MOHAMED ALI'S SPEECH.

Mr. Mohamed Ali went in to some details relating to the communications that had passed between him and the Mussalmans of Cawnpore on the subject of the Mosque and called upon a number of the most prominent Mussalmans of the place who were present there to deny if they could the statement that they had visited him at Delhi more than one to request that he should agitate in his paper against the then apprehended demolition of part of the Machhi Bazar Mosque, and that their emissary was constantly travelling between Cawnpore and Delhi, and Cawnpore and Calcutta to urge him to befriend them and advocate their cause. That surely, said the speaker, did not very much look like "outside agitation." He asked them to deny if they could their own statement made to him that but for his advice they would not have sent the second memorial to Sir James Meeson in June last through the Hon. the Raja Saheb of Mahmudabad, and that they would rather have commenced newspaper agitation immediately after the failure of the first sent in April. Could they deny their own statement that but for his advice to have full confidence in Sir James Meeson, and failing him in constitutional agitation, there was great likelihood on the 1st of July when part of the Machhi Bazar Mosque was forcibly demolished. Could they state that the agitation which they had recourse to was due to the taunts of anybody outside Cawnpore and could they deny that the speaker for one had clearly pointed out to them the dangers of official displeasure. They knew better than any official in India how much he had deplored the incident of the 3rd of August, and if he had so long patiently borne personal vilification from a type of Anglo-Indian officials, and newspapers, he could now put them all in the witness-box without any impropriety to prove how earnestly and anxiously he had worked for the amicable settlement of the Mosque case. When, however, the reply of Sir James Meeson to the deputation that waited upon him at Lucknow on the 16th of August had disappointed all hopes of a settlement such as he has expected and it appeared to the laymind as if there was no further hope in India, he felt it to be his duty to proceed to England and to voice their appeal in an atmosphere of dispassionate justice and equally clear of prestige as of passion. He had fully counted and weighed the risks he was running, but this was the least that he could do for them after the manner in which they had implicitly followed his advice and failed in their attempt to obtain justice. But nothing pleased him more than the sagacious and bold step which His Excellency the Viceroy took some five weeks after their departure in coming to Cawnpore and bringing them peace, and he felt certain that in the bright faces and hopeful views of the Mussalmans of Cawnpore which was so different from the aspect last August everyone who could see and was not wilfully blind could find a justification alike for the time-honoured rule that the Head of the Indian Government should not be an Anglo-Indian official, and the new and wise departure that there should at least be one Indian member in the Government of India. To make sure that Hindu and Mohamedan grievances alike would receive the fullest consideration by Government at all times and that first-hand knowledge would be brought to bear on the problems of the two communities, the speaker trusted there would before long be two Indian Members in the Viceroy's Executive Council belonging to the two great sister communities of India.

After giving details of their work in England and of the dinner episode on the lines of their previous speeches, Mr. Mohamed Ali asked the people of Cawnpore who, after the dinner, were the people most concerned, whether it would not be in the best interest of the Community, if, after providing for the relief of the Cawnpore of suffering, any balance of the Cawnpore Mosque Defence Fund was used as a nucleus of the National Fund of the Mohamedans of India.

The delegates then received magnificent gold embroidered garlands and after the recitation of several poems as at Bombay and Delhi they were entertained at lunch and departed in the afternoon after enthusiastic ovation.

A VISION OF INDIA.

The Last Viceroy.

(From "The Daily News & Leader" of January 1, 2001.)

The following is a verbatim report, received by arial telephone, of the speech delivered yesterday by the last British Viceroy of India, in resigning his office into the hands of the Princes and Citizens assembled in the Durbar Hall at Delhi. His Excellency said:

Your Highnesses and Citizen Representatives—We are gathered here, on the last day of the twentieth century, to conclude an Act of State which will certainly be recognised by future ages as one of the most momentous and most glorious in the history of the world. For two hundred years, Great Britain has held in trust directly or indirectly, the welfare of all the many peoples included within this ancient and splendid Empire. To-day in the name of my Sovereign, the King-Emperor Edward IX, I lay down that stewardship, and remit the welfare and the destinies of India into her own keeping. Very wisely, if I may say so, your council of Princes and Citizens has determined that the head of your Government should be hereditary rather than elective, and, obviating all possible jealousies, has conferred that hereditary leadership upon the second son of the King-Emperor. His Royal Highness is to-day leaving Windsor Castle on his air-yacht the "Arjuna" and to-morrow, with the new century, the new Kaiser-i-Hind will make his entry into this, his capital. In the meantime, you may not, perhaps, think it impertinent if I briefly review the events and influences which have led up to this consummation of the age-old longing of your country, and the heart-felt wish of mine.

From the dawn of history India has suffered from what may be called an arrested predestination. She was clearly pre-destined to unity, yet she could never permanently attain it. Geographically, she was marked off from the rest of the world more trenchantly than almost any other region, not absolutely an island. Her outward frontiers were extremely definite, her inward divisions were vague, arbitrary, and fluctuating. In the imagination of the outer world, she has always figured as a unit, and the achievement of her unity has been the dream of every great political power that has ever arisen within her bounds. Again and again it has been partially achieved, again and again the half-completed structure has crumbled to pieces. Why? Simply because of its vastness. With the methods of communication which prevailed down to the middle of the nineteenth century, no central power could possibly keep in working order a political organism of such gigantic ramifications. Local ambitions, interests, and rancours always took the upper hand, and no Empire ever succeeded for long in securing the one aim and justification of Empire—namely peace. Yet the idea of unity was so haunting and dominant that India could never settle down into permanent and contented multiplicity. She has been throughout her history like a troubled sea, wherein one great wave after another has towered aloft, only to fall in shattering ruin and make way for the next.

How did the Romans succeed in holding together for centuries an Empire as large as India and much more scattered? The answer is easy: they made roads and bridges. Had the Guptas or the Scythians, the Pathan, or the Moguls, been like the Romans, a great engineering Power, the fate of India might have been very different.

The British had inherited something of the Roman instinct for keeping their communications clear and easy; and fortune so willed it that, just as their power had spread over the whole country, the invention of railroads may be said almost without metaphor, to have reduced India to about one-tenth of its former size. The electric telegraph, too spread, like a sensitive nervous system, from Tuticorin to Peshawar, from Karachi to Chittagong. The second half of the nineteenth century developed those mechanical pre-requisites for real unity, which had theretofore been lacking.

About this time, too, the sentiment of national oneness began effectively to possess the soul of the people. Previously a united India had been an administrative rather than a popular ideal; but now it began to take hold of general mind. Religion had even from pre-historic ages paved the way. To the devout Hindu, the whole country, from the remotest Himalayan peak to the kala pani of the southern strait, had always been one in sanctity. Secular patriotism, on the other hand, had been smothered in caste feeling. But now, with the spread of education on more or less Western lines, and with the consequent relaxation of the rigidity of caste, patriotism of a more or less Western type became a real and potent motive in many minds, and began to filter down from the educated few to the uneducated many. British rule had unified India, and had for a century kept the peace between jarring religions and racial factions—was it not inevitable that a sentiment of unity, a national self-consciousness, should rapidly develop and assert itself?

This was a period of no little danger. Natural and inevitable as it was, the growing national self-consciousness of India did not always manifest itself wisely; nor was it always met with wisdom on the side of the British administration. Now that the dangers are long outlived, and the generation which bred and battled with them has passed away, I hope, I may say without offence that Indian patriotism had in its youth the faults of youth—namely rashness and impatience. It forgot the lessons of history; or, rather, it remembered only those which ministered to a somewhat inflated self-esteem. It forgot that the unity in which it gloried had been imposed by an impartial power from without, and had not yet had time to beget an instinct of solidarity in the mass of the people, separated by manifold diversities of race, language, creed, and caste. It forgot that in so far as patriotism itself was of one mind, that unanimity was negative, a unanimity of opposition to foreign rule, and would certainly fall apart the moment that common object of distastefulness was withdrawn and the problems of national organisation had to be faced. It was very sincere, no doubt, in feeling that even the misrule and anarchy of the past were preferable to this external and mechanical "good government" which (as it was mistakenly led to believe) was "sapping the manhood" of the people. But it forgot that it was not free to choose between order and anarchy. The relapse to anarchy would, indeed, have been only too easy, on the premature withdrawal or expulsion of the British power; but it was absolutely certain that this would have been the signal for some lother power European or Asiatic, to step in, and to restore order with a far heavier hand than that of Britain. In brief, Indian patriotism forgot that a certain standard of political competence is indispensable to any nation which is to hold its own among the civilised peoples of the modern world, and that political competence, however highly developed in individuals, was not to be acquired in one or two generations by a race which had, for untold ages, renounced the political, in favour of the religious, life. There was no reasonable prospect even of the rise of a competent and all-comprehensive native despotism.

• Far be it from me, however, to pretend that all the unwisdom was on the Indian side. On the contrary, all historians now admit there was, on the side of the British administration, a much less excusable blindness to the plain facts of the case. At the end of the nineteenth century a wise Englishman, long familiar with India wrote these words: "The Indian Empire is a miracle, not in the rhetorician's sense, but in the theologian's sense. . . . It is a miracle, as a floating island of granite would be a miracle, or a bird of brass which flew and sang and lived on in mid-air." That was profoundly true; but the Englishman in India, a crank in a wonderful, well-oiled machine, was apt to lose all sense of its wonderfulness, and imagine it the most natural thing in the world that it should run on for ever. Not all Englishmen—I could name to you some of the greatest of British soldiers and administrators who saw and declared that British rule could not be an end in itself, but only a means to an end, and that it must consciously, deliberately and sincerely address itself to the realization of that end—self-governing self-protecting, united India. But not many Englishmen were at that time—I speak of a century ago—able to take so large and clear a view. The prevailing tendency was to assume that the glory and prestige of England demanded the eternity of the British raj and to regard as disloyal the most reasonable and law-abiding aspiration towards self-government. What is to us a truism was to that generation an inadmissible paradox—namely, that England's mission was not to perpetuate her rule, but to render it as brief as was consistent with the safety and well-being of India. Few could then realize that the most glorious day in the annals of England would be that which has now arrived—the day on which her great work accomplished, she could lay down her stewardship, and say to a self-controlled, self-reliant India, "Hail and farewell!"

So long as the superstition of sempiternity prevailed, it was inevitable that the relations between the governing power and the more intelligent among the governed should be strained to the point of hostility. Even the most necessary measures of external security were resented, for they seemed to mean primarily the security of foreign rule. Administrative efficiency awoke the reverse of gratitude, for it seemed to mean the condemnation of native born India to perpetual inefficiency. But, in the words of the Victorian poet "the thoughts of man are widened with the process of the suns." Gradually, imperceptibly, a new light stole into the official mind and a true ideal replaced the idol of an ever-enduring raj. It is just eighty years since, in 1890, one of the greatest of my predecessors in this high office formally defined the aim of the King Emperor's government "as co-operation with the Indian genius in building up a united India, capable of taking a free and equal place among the nations of the world." Even before that certain urgent reforms, such as the separation of the executive from the judiciary, had given earnest of good intentions. But when once the great step had been taken, the great admission made, a change came over the whole spirit of the scene. There were still, of course, many differences of opinion on details of policy; there were still the party of impatience and the slow-but-sure party; but with faith in the sincerity of the governing power, there came a new willingness to realise and admit the amount of leeway that had to be made up before India could stand alone among the great powers of civilisation. Energies once devoted to embittered political agitation were now concentrated on social reform. Political thought, instead of running on purely critical, destructive lines, turned to construction, to planning, to forecasting constitutional arrangements and administrative methods. The new orientation gave to Indians in the public service a new motive for developing the best that was in them, since their efficiency no longer went merely to the credit of the foreign rule, but helped to curtail the term of tutelage.

Meanwhile vernacular education was awakening the peasant to a new sense of the possibilities of life. His passive contentment with a precarious minimum of food and shelter began to give place to active thrift, with a view to the attainment of a reasonable level of comfort and security. A widespread network of agricultural banks rescued him from the clutches of the money-lender. Manufactures were developed under a co-operative system which put an end to the more exploitation of defenceless, unorganised labour. The better side of caste was brought into play in a system of guilds which has restored the waning glories of Indian craftsmanship. At a hundred points, age-old tradition, habit and instinct were modified in the light of awakened intelligence; and the result is that we now see around us a prosperous and progressive India, with many problems still awaiting solution but unquestionably capable of confronting them with vigour and judgment, and controlling her own destinies in accordance with her own genius.

It is not for me either to praise or to criticise the constitution you have adopted. I may, however, express great confidence in the already tried statesmanship of your Council of Princes, and a strong belief in the wisdom of utilising the system of caste, purged of its arrogance and inhumanity, as the basis of representation in your wider National Council. One of the difficulties with which the Government of India had to contend, even within the memory of some of us, is now a thing of the past. The dreams of conquest and expansion which made the international politics of a century ago a huge game of bluff, are now seen to have been survivals from a bygone stage of world-development. It is admitted on all hands that races and nations must work out their salvation within their own boundaries, since from any other line of conduct only chaos and madness can ensue. India then, no longer needs a powerful defensive army, but only a force for internal and frontier police-duty, involving an out-lay of less where our predecessors spent crores of rupees. It is a saner world than that even of a generation ago—to say nothing of a century—into which you are to-day launching your Imperial Ship of State. My duty is only as it were, to touch the button that releases the Leviathan; but no more honourable duty was ever assigned to mortal man, and I perform it in a spirit of solemn thankfulness, which is, I am sure, shared by the King-Emperor and by every English-speaking man and woman. India has been called, of old and prematurely, "the brightest jewel in the British Crown." Only to-day is that saying fully justified. May its lustre never grow dim.

[This remarkable effort of statesmanship is commended to us by Mr. William Archer.]

The Indian Peril.

We reproduce to-day the articles contributed by a writer to the "Times" about the authorship of under the above heading by an anonymous writer of [which we have written elsewhere.

Gathering Forces.

I—The Accomplishments of British Rule.

In all her long history India has never been so prosperous as now. Her wealth and her industries are steadily increasing; land has largely appreciated in value; wages are rising; and the supply of labour is not sufficient for the demand. Recent great irrigation schemes are only beginning to spread their beneficent results, and others are in progress, or in near prospect. The railway system is being developed and improved to render it able to fulfil the requirements of a magnificent trade compared to which that of pre-British days was a bagatelle. Judged by all material test, the state of India is such that most countries of the world might well envy and marvel at her progress.

Politically, from the Indian point of view, the advance in recent years has been immense. The reforms of 1909 went far beyond Indian expectations. There never was time when so many Indians had a voice in so many branches of the administration, could so effectively present their views, or were able to count upon such sympathetic consideration. Government was never so gentle, so quick to learn, and to redress grievances, so tender towards Indian susceptibilities, or so zealous in labouring for the public good. Never were the public servants of India so hard worked, so anxious to initiate measures for the benefit of the people and so diligent in striving to make them successful. Local self-government has mainly passed into Indian hands to make or to mar. The control of education in some important aspects has been committed to Indian bodies. If in the High Courts the European element is in a majority, the administration of law in the lower stages is predominantly Indian. The Sircar, once abrupt and peremptory, now shows an anxiety to please and a readiness to consult Indian opinion which were formerly unknown. While, in Western countries, bureaucratic methods have been more and more relaxed. Where they exist, they do not exceed the necessities of the orderly conduct of business, and they are often due to the large Indian office establishments. The capable Brahman clerk is a born bureaucrat.

THE NATIVE STATES.

In the huge territory—more than one-third of all India and considerably more than three times the area of France—comprised in the native states. Home Rule prevails with greater or less success in proportion to the enlightenment and the vigour of the Indian ruler. Of late years, the policy of non-interference has been developed to an extent which would formerly have been viewed with apprehension. The Queen's Proclamation of 1858 announced that "We shall respect the rights, dignity, and honour of the native princes as our own," and this royal promise has been faithfully kept. When, however, misgovernment or grave scandals threatened to tarnish the honour of a native state or to restrict the liberties of its people, interference, in direct or indirect form, has been deemed necessary. And, further, in cases where the condition of a native state appeared favourable, Political officers were encouraged or permitted to press reforms upon the administrators. This has been changed by the important pronouncement of Lord Minto at Udaipur in 1909, in which the policy of the Government of India was laid down for the future "as with rare exceptions one of non-interference in internal affairs." His Excellency, "preferred that reforms should emanate from the Durbar themselves," thus plainly indicating that suggestions, formerly regarded as part of the duty of Political officers, should be discontinued. During minorities the Government necessarily assumes direct responsibilities both in regard to the upbringing of the young chiefs and to the temporary administration. While in all such cases, the state revenues are carefully nursed, and any gross abuses which may be brought to light are removed, no changes are introduced which would be repugnant to the characteristics of the state or would commit the future chief to lines of action which would be likely to disapprove. Self-governing India, since it came under British suzerainty, was never therefore, left so free to develop in accordance with its own methods and ideals as it is to-day and hence was the tutelage of the paramount Power so lightly felt by the Princes and Chiefs, while financial assistance is none the less readily placed at their disposal in times of need.

THE COMBAT WITH FAMINE AND DISEASE.

After the Mutiny, which followed perhaps inevitably, upon a protracted period of war involving the successive annexation of Sind, the Punjab, Lower Burma, and Oudh, government in India completely changed its character and entered upon a new political phase under the direct control of the Crown and Parliament. The last vestige of dynastic rivalry had been swept away, and the Administration henceforth could devote its energies to domestic questions. The results, operating gradually and at first slowly, have led to the situation which has been described. Government in India now undertakes activities of all kind which in Western countries are left to private enterprise—activities which closely touch the lives of the people—and the Administration is thus becoming, more and more and in the best sense, parental. Inquiries of many kinds have been carried out with far-reaching results and others are in progress. Famine, arising from defective rainfall, has been in all ages the greatest ill from which India suffers. In pre-British days the mortality thus caused was appalling, and the early travellers have left records of horrors which baffle the modern imagination. Now the administration of famine relief has been reduced to highly organized system which is being constantly improved, and the fine railway system which we have created enables food to be transported to stricken areas to an extent that was formerly impossible. Famines will still inevitably afflict the people of India; but loss and suffering have been infinitely mitigated, and what remains is mainly due to inherited habits and customs which, for a time at least, will continue to militate against the promptitude and the completeness of relief measures. It is a fact that in no country in the world can famine be dealt with so effectively as in India, and nowhere else are there so many trained and devoted public servants ready to cope with this scourge. Devastating epidemics occur and recur in the history of India, where like famines were submissively accepted as signs of the wrath of the gods. In face of these terrible visitations, Government and people were powerless. They wrought wholesale destruction unchecked, and they exhausted themselves in accordance with laws which science is beginning to reveal.

All this has been changed in recent years by the action of the Government. Plague still claims too many victims; but the Administration provides a prophylactic to which the people are happily beginning to resort, and in other ways this disease is being successfully combated by the progressive development of the sanitary services. Any outbreak of cholera instantly taken in hand by medical officers and thousands of lives have been saved by prompt action. Malaria and its prevention are being earnestly studied with practical results which will increase as knowledge extends—and is allowed to prevail. Smallpox, once a widespread scourge, has been brought under control. Much more remains to be done and will be done; but anyone who knows the extreme difficulties of sanitation in an Eastern country with a vast population will find in the progress attained in recent years, convincing proof of the anxious care which Government have devoted to raise the standard of public health.

TAXATION.

While in all directions the Administration has shown increasing activity, the incidence of taxation per head has in 10 years risen from Rs. 10½ d. to Rs. 11½ d. only, or, including land revenue, which according to the ancient custom of India is rent paid to the State, from Rs. 5½ d. to Rs. 7½ d. The salt tax, once regarded as oppressive, has been reduced to a minimum, and the Punjab cultivator can now purchase this necessity of life at the rate of 3d. a pound. In no country in the world is taxation so light, and the slightest comparison with Japan serves to show the relative immunity of the agricultural land of India from State burdens.

INDUSTRY AND CAPITAL.

The establishment of law and order after the Mutiny led to economic advances of all kinds apart from that due to the agency of the Government. British capital found its way into industries, and Indians followed the lead given by European enterprise. A great mill industry has thus been built up in Indian hands and has attracted Indian capital. In other directions industrial progress is being steadily made, and the investing habit is tending to take the place of the unfruitful hoarding which has long retarded the economic development of India. In ten years bank deposits have increased from Rs. 27 crores to more than Rs. 63½ crores, and bank capital from Rs. 4½ crores to nearly Rs. 6½ crores; while Indian Post Office Savings Bank depositors have grown from 834,366 to 1,868,939, and the membership of co-operative societies now exceeds 400,000, though the movement is still in its infancy and is foreign to India. Figure could be multiplied indefinitely, which all indicate steady advance of a kind while genuine Indian patriotism must specially desire.

MISSIONARY EFFORT.

Another important development since 1858 is the extension of the Christian mission now grouped under 16 heads with innumerable sub-branches. From Europe and America large sums are poured into India every year and devoted mainly to the education and up-raising of the depressed class. The native Christians now number more than 8½ millions and about 198,000 children largely orphans are under instruction in private schools. Missionary effort, apart from its religious aspect, has become a philanthropic agency of growing importance, while the example of personal service devotedly rendered is an educating power of inestimable value. In the purely social sphere, recent years have seen the establishment of numerous associations in England and in India which afford striking evidence of British endeavours to promote kindly race relations and to help the growth of Indian nationhood.

To those who care to study facts nothing in modern evolution will appear so amazing as the accelerating advance of India since the day of the Mutiny, and while government in all form attempted by mankind is necessarily imperfect, British rule in India can justly claim a measure of success elsewhere unparalleled. Twenty years ago Sir Alfred Lyall, with intimate knowledge of Indian condition and a rare understanding of Indian character, came to the conclusion that "English dominion, once firmly planted in Asia, is not likely to be shaken unless it is supplanted by a strong European rival." He did not reckon with forces, then weak or latent which have gathered strength with a rapidity that none could foresee.—The Times.

II.—Causes and Consequences of Unrest.

THE advancing prosperity of India and the great changes in the methods of government might fairly have been expected to produce greater contentment and more active support of an Administration which is visibly promoting Indian progress and zealously cherishing Indian interests. Diametrically opposite results have followed. A standard of prosperity, never previously approached, coincides with a situation never comparably so menacing.

The signs are plain for all to read. Agitation in all forms is spreading throughout the land and is producing the inevitable effects. A large section of the Indian Press devotes itself to a relentless campaign designed to undermine the authority of Government and to promote acute racial antagonisms. The operation of the Press Law, where it is enforced, may check the more crude manifestations of sedition; but it is powerless to cope with the incessant stream of misrepresentation and the spread of false reports which sow broadcast the seeds of hatred and contempt. Indian writers, educated in our schools and universities, have reduced to a science the methods of saying what their readers will perfectly understand while keeping within the four corners of laws which—in India—are mildly administered. And any lack of open violence is supplied by leaflets and placards emanating from secret presses which may secure wide circulation before their existence is known to the authorities.

SEDITION AND MURDER.

The propaganda assumes many forms, direct and indirect, obvious and shrouded, but the effect upon the masses of India is the same and is becoming increasingly apparent. Secret societies grow in membership and range from little groups of decadent youths to large organized bodies of which the full ramification is unknown. To these associations the periodic assassinations of officials and of loyal Indian public servants are due. Within a few years attempts have been made on the lives of two successive Viceroys, and in neither case did the offer of a large reward produce evidence from the many persons who were cognizant of the plots or spectators of their execution. Many more murders have been planned but have failed to reach the stage of attempt. British feeling has been stirred both at home and in India by these startling manifestations of hostility; but even when a double murder was perpetrated in the heart of London no violent resentment was provoked. It may have been imagined, as some Indian politicians have proclaimed, that such crimes were plainly the work of isolated and irresponsible madmen. If so, no greater mistake could have been made.

The general effects are more significant and more dangerous. In Bengal dacoity, whether for private gain or for replenishing the coffers of the agitators, has become a diversion of educated youths; and victims and law-abiding people are unwilling or afraid to assist the ends of justice. In the Panjab, where 12 millions acres are now under irrigation, where new towns are springing up and the wealth of the cultivators has marvellously advanced, the increase of serious crime has reached alarming proportions. "Three districts have 6,000 per cent. as many murders as in the United Kingdom" and "thefts, burglaries, grievous hurt, and dacoities are also on the increase—not a steady increase, but one that goes up by leaps and bounds." Here also help to the arm of the law is not forthcoming. Similar tendencies show themselves elsewhere, and the recent exhibition of mob violence at Cawnpore is symptomatic of a situation which is no realized outside India. There are districts where British law does not now run and where security of life and property can no longer be guaranteed. Stones may be thrown at Europeans in villages where 20 years ago the people would have shown the kindly courtesy which was characteristic of the country. Indian parents complain bitterly of the growing intractability of their boys, and the general decay of manners is a matter of common observation. These and other indications plainly visible to residents in India, and distressing to all who cherish an affectionate regard for her people, are the necessary result of a propaganda which ranges from dislike and distrust to hatred and contempt.

THE BURDEN OF GOVERNMENT.

In an Eastern country, where public opinion as a steadying factor does not exist, Government is the one and only authority understood by the masses. It is to Government they look for help in trouble, for personal security, for justice, and for protection against their own oppressive customs. In India it is Government alone which can prevent the clash of the racial and religious differences which deeply permeate the whole body politic. Only under a Government which stands above and aloof from these jarring elements can there be the faintest hope of the creation of a united India in some happier future. The failure of politicians at home to realize the special and peculiar relations of the British Government to the vast masses in India explains much that is deplorable. You cannot safely think of India in terms of Western conditions.

If, as is certain, the undermining of all authority in India is rapidly proceeding, what must necessarily follow? The day will arrive when the teeming millions of uneducated Indians will have been taught to hate the handful of British officials and residents, will have come to disregard all authority, and will offer a problem in Government which is insoluble.

INDIA'S MILLIONS.

The total population of India at the Census of 1911 was almost 313½ millions. Of this number 18½ millions were returned as literate, and only 1,670,000 as literate in English, including 1,029,000 classed as "Hindu Brahmanic." The increase of the total population in 10 years was about 20 millions, of literates 2,858,000, and of literates in English 545,000. There are nearly 2,400 main castes and large numbers of sub-castes still increasing. The Census enumerates 119 groups of languages belonging to 15 families, exclusive of European tongues. "Agriculturists" number more than 65 per cent. More than 294½ millions of people are illiterate, and at least 230 millions live the simple village life of old India. Of Hindus about 40 millions belong to the depressed classes and are banded in degrees varying from actual oppression to social ostracism. The operation of British law and the ministrations of the missionary bodies are gradually ameliorating the condition of these poor people.

Anyone who attempts to understand the greater problems of India must, as an essential preliminary, master these and other figures, and must be able to grasp their political significance. The vast mass of the population is totally unfit to take part in self-government and has never done so; but its attitude towards any Government is supremely important, and if disaffected it could make all government impossible. Between the simple, kindly masses of India and the British officials there is no trace of natural antagonism. Warm attachment on both sides is common. The Briton knows nothing of the physical repugnance which the superior castes feel towards the lower orders, and he is able to acquire influence and to win real affection where the ablest Brahman would absolutely fail to secure either. The records of the Indian frontier attest on every page the strong regard which has existed, and exists to-day, between the tribesmen and the British officer.

If left face to face with the masses of India the British Government, so long as it chooses its servants well, would have few difficulties. But those masses are naturally excitable, credulous to the last degree, fanatical in matters of religion, and prone to the kind of panic which, as the French Revolution showed, may easily lead to violence. The Mutiny was primarily a military revolt, due to military conditions, and brought to the explosion point by the issue of cartridges in the making of which the religious sentiment of both Hindus and Mahomedans was said to be outraged. The civil population over large areas espoused the rebel cause for fear of consequences, although individual Indians gave the most touching proofs of fidelity. If to-day conditions differ widely from those of 1857, the lesson and the warning remain.

THE DISAFFECTED MINORITY.

The great change which has come over India in recent years and has developed latterly with ominous rapidity is due to the interaction between Government and the masses of a small but steadily growing disaffected minority. Education inevitably breeds discontent in one form or another, and its influence for good depends upon the qualities of character which it is able to evoke. In India Western education started with false aims, and has not yet arrived at the true paths of progress. Our grand-fathers decided that the main object was the creation of a class of "Anglicized Indians," intended to act as intermediaries between Government and the millions for whose welfare it is responsible. We have succeeded in obtaining many valuable Indian officials; but the system has inevitably led to the production of a far larger and yearly increasing class which devotes its slender educational equipment to misrepresenting the aims and the results of British rule and to spreading broadcast the seeds of disaffection among the impulsive millions of India.

In a London Police Court the assassin of Sir W. Curzon Wylie and Dr. Lalkaka justified his crime by the assertion that the English people were responsible for the murder of 80 millions of Indians in 50 years, and for annually taking 100 millions sterling out of the country. How had Dhangra come by these monstrous beliefs? The answer to the question goes to the root of the danger in India. Here was no obsession of an isolated madman, but simply one of many public revelations of the effect of the propaganda. If baseless calumnies of this description are scattered far and wide among the millions who have not the smallest means of ascertaining facts, how can unrest in India be staved? And the creed of Dhangra, which has led to many other murders, is only part of what is being daily inculcated.

AN INTERNATIONAL PROPAGANDA.

The propaganda is not confined to India, but has become international. Not only are there active centres of disaffection in Europe and America, but in places where no knowledge exists and prompt exposure need not be feared, addresses are delivered by Indians in which atrocities committed by the British Government are luridly described. Mr. Roosevelt's striking tribute to our work in India may have been suggested by stories of this kind which had reached his ears. When a member of Parliament, after visiting India publicly proclaims as a fact that Government exact "75 per cent. of the yield of the land" from the unhappy rayat, it is impossible not to fear that busy people may forget to ascertain the truth, and may derive a general impression that the land of India is oppressively burdened by taxation. In the Central Provinces which were referred to, the assessment averages about 9d. per acre!

A large volume might be written to register and refute the gross inaccuracies, or worse which find expression in England and are remitted back to India as accepted facts; but the labour would be in vain. The correction would never overtake the misstatement, and meanwhile the effect of the encouragement which is being given to the propagandists in India by careless writers and speakers at home cannot be estimated.—The Times.

III.—Nationalism and its Purposes.

PERVERSE PROPAGANDA.

In his admirable study of "Indian Unrest" Sir Valentine Chirol carefully examined the influence of Brahmanism, which he regards as one of the "only two forces that aspire to substitute themselves for British rule, or at least to make the continuance of that rule subservient to their own ascendancy." The other force he defines as that "generated by Western education, which operates to some extent over the whole of India, but only upon an infinitesimal fraction of the population recruited among a few privileged castes." Neither of these forces had, in his opinion, "in itself sufficient substance to be dangerous"; but he clearly saw that "the most rebellious elements in both have effected a temporary and unnatural alliance on the basis of an illusory 'Nationalism' which appeals to nothing in Indian history but is calculated, and meant to appeal with dangerous force to Western sentiment and ignorance."

This diagnosis of the situation a few years ago was profoundly true, but recent developments indicate the need of some qualification. The "temporary and unnatural alliance" has been strengthened for evil, and other than "the most rebellious elements" are, consciously or unconsciously, playing a part in the alienation of the masses. Between the Western thought imperfectly assimilated in the schools and colleges of India and Brahmanism there may appear to be an impassable intellectual gulf, but the imported "Nationalist" theories have been absorbed by Brahmins whose ambitions blind them to the hopeless incongruity of ideals and who are quick to see the political uses of religions in which they may have ceased to believe. And so-called Hindu "Moderates," or Mohammedans, when they engage in a movement for the establishment of what is described as "self-government" in India, cannot be expected to exercise a nice discrimination as to methods. In India we have to recognize the fact that apparently antagonistic elements can unite in swelling the propaganda directed against British rule, and whether perpetual misrepresentations or inducements to active hostility suit the predilections of individuals; the effect upon the vast unthinking masses is to instil dislike differing only in degree. Such "temporary and unnatural" alliances may achieve effective until irreparable injury has been inflicted upon India, and their existence can be represented as a proof of the catholicity and the solidarity of the "national" spirit.

EXTERNAL INFLUENCES.

It is perhaps inevitable that the growth of this spirit should be welcomed and encouraged by well-meaning persons at home who fail to understand its relation to the helpless millions absolutely dependent upon British rule to save them from anarchy. The Nationalist idea is a by-product of a shallow education in which the merits of democratic institutions, resulting from centuries of political evolution were casually imbibed without the counterpoise of knowledge. The up-rising and the naval and military triumphs of Japan suggested nebulous possibilities of pan-Asiatic dominion. The paper Constitutions nominally adopted in Persia and China stimulated vague notions of self-government. It was discovered—not in the pages of history—that India had a golden past in which all other nations learned at her feet and her peoples were immune from all the ills of modern existence. This and more could be regained if the "demon" of British rule were driven out.

The political uses which this theory can be made to serve are manifold. It may well appeal to the nobler instincts of the Indian peoples. It ought so to appeal—if it bore the least resemblance to truth. In the painful story of "Siri Ram, Revolutionist"—the saddest and the truest picture of some aspects of the Nationalist propaganda that has yet been painted—the Swami skilfully plays upon the imagination of the young Indian student:—

A dragon is sucking the life-blood of our Bharat Mata. She is weeping. Shall we sit at our meals amid laughter and merry-making without care? Or shall we not rather give up our pleasures and smear our bodies with ashes every day until we have rescued her and trampled the demon under our foot? . . . Our country was the crown of all countries and was called the Golden Land. Her hour has come again. Drums are beating. Heroes and martyrs are proceeding. See to Sivaji, Napoleon Buonaparte, and other heroes of Germany and France. See to Japan. Take only a life for a life.

This is no invented harangue. It is simply a paraphrase of the teaching which is being daily distilled into the impressionable youth of India, and the Nationalist sympathizers at home are assisting the process.

THE MOVEMENT ANALYSED.

Who are the teachers and where lies the strength of the movement which threatens the peace of India? Among the 1,670,000 persons classed as "literate in English" there are men of whom any country might be proud—real Indian philanthropists and patriots, students of affairs, captains of commerce and industry, some scholars, true reformers, loyal friends willing to help the Government with disinterested advice and perfectly cognizant of the fact that on the stability of British rule every hope for the future of India absolutely depends. Such men fear and deplore the tendencies which they plainly see, but their numbers do not increase, and they are sensitive to the attacks to which they are subjected. Their influence is diminishing in India and is not felt in England, where determined efforts are made to capture public opinion for Nationalist purposes. The large number of students in colleges and secondary schools who may be classed as litterati for Census objects have too often been used for political purposes, but they can hardly be regarded as politicians fit to lead or to represent opinion. There are more than 305,000 Christian literates in English. Probably not more than 500,000 adults remain, and these would include many thousands of persons who have failed in their examinations, who are not educated in any real sense, and who cherish grievances against the Government, which they regard as the cause of their want of success. Lastly, there are large numbers of Indian Government servants who are true to their salt. All such estimates must be conjectural; but the adult classes who constitute the plastic "material" upon which, as Sir Valentine Chirol has pointed out, "the leaders of unrest have most successfully worked" cannot greatly exceed 300,000 and may be less in number out of a population of 318½ millions.

ARISTOCRATIC INDIA.

As will be seen from the figures already given, the literates in English tend to increase in a higher ratio than the general literates many of whom are barely able to read and write a vernacular language. The litterati have picked up the shibboleths of democracy, and some of them can glibly use its formulas, but of the existence of any real democratic spirit it is difficult to find a trace among them. A body less representative of India cannot be imagined. India remains and will remain for many generations an essentially aristocratic country in a sense of which the British people at home and in the Dominions have long lost the knowledge. Some of our mistakes in India have been due to our lack of this knowledge, and for want of it we may and do at times unconsciously offend the deep rooted feelings of an ancient people. Were we to abdicate in favour of the "Nationalists" there would be no materials from which to form and no democrats to administer a democracy. The success of the present political movement would entail an attempt to govern by the narrowest of oligarchies, which external aggression apart, would instantly crumble to pieces. Such a Government, were it conceivable, would violate every principle cherished by the politicians at home who are giving support to the growing disaffection, and would violently conflict with the inherited traditions of old India. When the Indian Nationalist speaks attractively of "representative" institutions it is necessary to remember that he is thinking in terms of a handful of persons whose interests often conflict with those of the millions of India, and who show no real sympathy with their needs. He contemplates the attainments of power for himself and his class, and any addition of Indians in the higher posts of the Administration which the Public Services Commission may recommend cannot have the smallest tranquillizing effect. It would provide only for a pitiful fraction of the literate malcontents, leaving all the rest unbenefited. Like the generous and important reforms of 1909, it would utterly fail to satisfy the aspirations fomented and proclaimed.

THE MOHAMEDANS AND TURKEY.

Unfortunately for India, circumstances which the Government could not control have powerfully assisted the Nationalist movement. The Tripoli and Balkan wars naturally produce excitement among the Moslems of India. There were sober and loyal Mohamedans who strove to restrain it; but the Nationalists duly exploited the alleged impotence and ill-will of the British Government in the interests of their astute Hindu allies, have risen to power in the councils of the community. The consequences appeared at Cawnpore where a question which had excited no local interest was, suddenly and by outside influences, made the occasion of an outbreak of fanaticism. The usual deplorable results followed, and the incendiaries on whom the whole responsibility rests escaped scot free. The settlement would be Gilbertian but for the preceding tragedy, since the sanctity of the dalan, which had formed the sole justification of the riot, was readily abandoned.

INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The grievances of the Indians in South Africa, which most naturally and rightly appeal to all classes and religions, are an even greater source of danger. The matter is infinitely complicated and entangled with Union politics and with the relations which must exist between the Home Government and the Dominions. The facts that the British people in South Africa support the reasonable demands of the Indians, that the Indian Governments are in fullest sympathy with those demands, and the Englishmen freely subscribe to the funds which are being raised to help sufferers, that the obnoxious £3 licence tax is doomed, even if it is not proved illegal, as an English lawyer maintains, and that methods of administration—easily changed—are as much responsible for the hardships complained of as legislation, cannot be made clear to the sensitive masses of India. It is distressing to note that inflammatory reports were at once spread over India, and strong language was instantly forth-coming without waiting for ascertained facts. Whatever might be the result of an inquiry, harm which cannot be remedied has already been done, and the general result must be to strengthen the forces of disaffection.

Incidents of party-strife at home, the preparations in Ulster, strikes which lead to violence, even the outrages of the suffragists, can be turned to account for political purposes and can be used to supply points for the propaganda. Thus in India we can plainly see the creation of an atmosphere in which the best efforts of Government and the wonderful progress already achieved are viewed as in a distorting medium where all sense of proportion is lost and truth is effectually obscured.—The Times.

IV.—Duty and Policy of the Government.

Since the Nationalist Party began to aim not at building up Indian nationhood but at supplanting British rule, the injury inflicted upon India has spread and deepened. The diversion of energy and funds from the cause of the real people of India has visibly checked the progress of social reforms which would have helped to uplift the masses and to instil the spirit of brotherhood. Signs of a real and healthy awakening, due to Western influences, can be discerned. Some of the best and most patriotic of Indians are earnestly endeavouring to work on truly national lines, and several movements have been started in recent years to develop practical philanthropy, to stimulate self-help, and to undertake the many tasks to which Government agency is not suited. Such efforts are overshadowed and stunted by the perversion of ideals preached by the small body of lawyers, doctors, journalists, and schoolmasters who claim the leadership of the classes which have acquired a superficial Western education and who are seeking, through these classes to overthrow all authority in India. A train of misfortunes has naturally followed. Murder, crime and general lawlessness increase in many places, and the loss of innocent lives in riots artificially fomented may well give rise to anxiety for the future. How many other rising storms have been quieted by the tact and the soothing influence of British officials is not guessed in England.

THE BANK FAILURES.

Even the recent bank failures, which have brought suffering to many poor people, are directly due to the propaganda. The swadeshi boycott movement, started in Bengal and endorsed by the Indian National Congress, naturally led to the establishment of fraudulent institutions, which made appeals to a spurious patriotism. As an Indian banker has recently pointed out, "company promoting became the hobby of all true patriotic Indians." Now, my good countrymen lost sight of the point that plans matured in such an atmosphere and such a temper were bound to be attended by grave dangers." There have been great bankers in India. The Beths of Clive's times must have possessed remarkable capacity. India to-day can boast of men who show sterling business aptitudes combined with untarnished integrity; but too many of the promoters of the swadeshi institutions which have lately collapsed with ruinous results can lay no claims to either. It is to be hoped that public investigations and such legislation as is possible for the protection of the people will follow; but the Nationalist movement in this aspect has already had the effect of setting back the investing habit, and we cannot be sure that some ignorant victims will not be induced to throw the blame on the Government.

Many other examples of the effects of political agitation in India might be adduced. Enough has been said to give some idea of a situation which is becoming more and more distressing to all who love India and her warm-hearted peoples, who realize the sacred nature of our obligations towards them and who are striving to promote the good will that is essential to the building-up of Indian nationhood. A small section of the population is working, strenuously and successfully, to bring about the alienation of the vast unwieldy masses. That is "the Indian Peril," and if it is not understood in time there will be a rude awakening.

QUESTIONS FOR CONSIDERATION.

Let the conscientious democrat at home reflect upon the tumultuous forces latent in 295 millions of people wholly uneducated and inheriting, in part at least, strong fighting instincts, split not only vertically into discordant elements deeply permeated by traditional enmity but horizontally into thousands of castes, and quickly roused to violent fanaticism. Let him ask himself what power is to preserve this stupendous mob from blood-stained anarchy if British rule is weakened or removed. Let him consider who is to hold back the armed warrior tribes of the North-West Frontier with Afghan hordes behind them, the Nepalese on the north, the Chinese on the north-east, from the rich plains and cities of India. Let him admit that the peace and order in India which he may have seen or read of are the direct results of British rule with the forces behind it, and if these forces fail the reaction will be catastrophic. Let him realize that, if that day comes, the literati whose familiarity with the phrases of democracy attracts his sympathy will be instantly submerged, and the elemental instincts of the untutored millions will ruthlessly assert themselves until some other Western Power restores order by the sword. Then perhaps he may come to doubt whether the so-called Nationalist agitation merits his encouragement.

TASKS TO BE ACCOMPLISHED.

Out of the grave perplexities and complexities of the situation in India some few general principles plainly stand forth as guides to policy. The welfare of the 295 millions of helpless and inarticulate people, not the momentary gratification of a handful of literates, must be the first object, as its furtherance is the first duty, of Government. If they are allowed to be alienated, India will become ungovernable, and nothing is so certain as that any visible weakening of the British Raj will bring about alienation on a large scale. In the East the masses instinctively follow what they believe to be the rising star and quickly abandon what may seem to be a losing cause. Something of this nature seems to be occurring in Bengal, where the number of British officials is utterly inadequate. We must gradually educate these millions, remembering that the vast majority of them will always remain cultivators, and seeking to fit them for the tasks of their lives. We should also endeavour to build up the village community, where this is possible, and thus to inculcate citizenship.

Our Government must concern itself less with politics and more with economics. There is ample scope for work which will benefit and uplift the toiling millions, but will never be pressed and may be strongly opposed by the lawyer politicians who pose as friends of the people. We must show inflexible justice in dealing with conflicting interests, never forgetting that the Government is the only force under which nationhood can grow up out of the jarring elements of India. It is necessary to reverse the old Latin adage and, ubique to govern. In proportion to our success in uniting the Government with the governed and in securing co-operation between all classes will be the progress of India towards self-government in the distant future. We must unflinchingly enforce law and order, realizing that misplaced leniency may be cruel in the long run, by encouraging outbreaks in the suppression of which the lives of harmless persons will inevitably be sacrificed. There are parts of India in which the primary duty of guarding life and property is not now adequately discharged, and some Native States can show a higher standard of security than certain British districts.

Improvement of our educational system in the higher branches should be fearlessly undertaken in the truest interests of the people. Technical education needs to be built up, and the propaedeutic study of English literature, which the experienced author of First Steps has effectively exposed, requires to be eliminated. Other efforts are patent, and their inevitable results have been frequently pointed out. No country stands in greater need of soundly educated men and women than India; but, for various reasons, the products of the universities are deplorably inadequate to the growing requirements. The judicial system urgently needs to be overhauled. Established with the best of intentions, it operates in certain respects with real hardship upon a naturally litigious people easily exploited by the superfluity of pleaders, and it too often fails to secure justice. "Inexplicable acquittals," wrote our most acute foreign critic, "encourage crime and ruin the prestige of the dominant race."

LOYAL ELEMENTS.

If, as is now the case, a small band of political malcontents has come to wield an influence which threatens to alienate the toiling millions from our rule, there are elements sincerely loyal by conviction by personal affinities, or by knowledge. Reverence and affection for the Sovereign are deeply engrained in the mind of the peoples of India. This strong sentiment, the inheritance of many centuries, is a power for good which the agitators are seeking to undermine. The Princes and Chiefs, who have already been threatened by the propagandist, realize the dangers of a "Vakil Raj," and they would not for a moment tolerate in their States an agitation directed against themselves. The fine old gentry of India wonder whether the flowing tide is with the Government, and what will be their position if it is not. The native officers are beginning to ask whether the Sircar is afraid, and it is most undesirable that an Asiatic army should think it acents fear in its rulers. Indians trained in practical business perfectly understand the basis of British credit upon which the whole increasing structure of Indian commerce and industry rests. The Government in normal times cannot depend upon all these elements for active support, but it can show regard for its friends, seek their counsels, and avoid arousing their distrust by making concessions to agitation—concessions which can never lead to the least political advantage and will invariably be taken as the starting-point for fresh demands.

THE NECESSARY ADMINISTRATION.

Strange as it may seem to some mind at home, it is strength in Government which alone attracts support in the East. And Government can be more educative by frankly explaining its objects and issuing authoritative statements of facts which could not be entirely ignored. Party organs have at least the advantage that both sides of a question or of a policy may be presented; but in India there is no effective antidote to the streams of misrepresentation and detraction which now find their way even to the simple villagers, who can be as easily reached by the administrative machinery. Firm administration of the Press laws is essential in the truest interests of the masses, who are the real sufferers from incendiary publications, as experience has sadly proved. These laws cannot absolutely prevent incendiary writing artfully veiled; but they can mitigate the danger and help to raise the standard of journalism. It is the bounden duty of every Briton in India to give out sympathy unstinted when it is deserved; but he must never flinch from frankly condemning what is unworthy and reactionary. That is the true way to show real friendship to India and to build up the best qualities of her peoples.

If, however, the Government and its officials adopted every measure best calculated to avert the coming danger, influences emanating from England might go far to thwart their aims. Can it be too much to ask that politicians and publicists at home shall take reasonable care to ascertain the truth, and shall assume that Britons in India have as keen a sense of justice and of duty and as much sympathy as are given to Britons elsewhere? And may they not seriously consider whether the aspirations which they encourage really represent a burning zeal to make the bounds of freedom wider yet, or a growing desire for power to be wielded by a small section of malcontents who have imperfectly assimilated some Western ideas? The great question to be resolved is—Can a democracy govern a vast Eastern Empire? Upon the answer, which must be forthcoming within a few years, the ruin or the sustained and quickened progress of India depends.

Moslem India & British Foreign Policy.

THE following letter was addressed by Mr. Mohamed Ali to Mr. Frederick Harrison, the great Positivist writer who wrote on the above subject in the December number of the Positivist Review :—

Sir,—It may seem a paradox that although I was most anxious to make your acquaintance, it is only now when I am leaving for India that I write to you. But this apparent paradox would perhaps explain best how busy I have been during the two months that I have been in England working in conjunction with my friend, Mr. Wazir Hasan, in order to explain, in the first instance to His Majesty's Ministers, the Indian Moslems' point of view about events at home and abroad and certain measures and policies of Government. It will take me too long to relate all that we did during these 8 or 9 weeks, all that we achieved and all that we failed to achieve, and perhaps this account may be available, if the "Manchester Guardian" publishes in full the interview that a representative of the paper had with me yesterday. I only write now in connection with an article that you have contributed to the December number of the Positivist Review which seems to me to do scanty justice to the intelligence of Indian Mussalmans. It may sound something like an impertinence for me even to express the reverence in which I and many of my fellow-countrymen and co-religionists hold the name of Frederic Harrison, but I assure you that it is chiefly on account of that reverence that I am venturing on this somewhat lengthy explanation of the Indian Moslems' point of view to you.

The perusal of the article appearing over your signature has pained me a great deal, because I find that what has appeared in the English Press in the garb of views of the Indian Mussalmans regarding British foreign policy has not failed to influence even so unprejudiced a judgment as yours.

You refer to systematic and violent appeals from Indian Mussalmans calling on the British Government and people to intervene in the attacks made by foreign nations on Moslem States, and you say that this appeal is avowedly made in the cause of Islam as a religion, on the ground of the British Empire containing a large Mussalman body. You also suggest that the Mussalmans desire to thrust aside all question of political sense and preach a sort of new crusade on behalf of Islam which you characterise as gross folly and criminal fanaticism. You go still further and express your belief that Englishmen are called upon to rush to the defence of a Mohamedan State simply because it holds by the Koran, and that whether the conduct of the State itself has been wise, honest and civilised, or corrupt, savage and barbarous. You state that the avowed motive of intervention is plainly to help a given religious creed, and that a creed and a social system with which Englishmen have neither sympathy nor interest. You go on to say that the Mussalmans of the Indian Continent have no kind of contact with the Arabs of Tripoli, the Moors of Morocco, or the Turks of the Sultanate, by race, history, intercourse, or interest, that the only point of union is the Koran which they seek to thrust into the political issue to induce a Christian State to protect the religion of Mohamed in Europe simply because that State has a section of Mussalman subjects in Asia, that the few Europeanised Indian Mussalmans who know anything about either Turks or the Balkan peoples look at it solely as a matter of religious ascendancy—the Koran, right or wrong,—and that the absurdity of a similar demand on the part of the Buddhists of Ceylon, for instance, would be too palpable to be admitted, and that perhaps the men of no other race or creed could be led to make so preposterous a demand. Then you go on to state that the political vice of Islam is to confuse in one idea political and religious objects, to make the creed itself the public law of the State, and the interest of the creed the ke-ynote of patriotism. You go further and express, evidently as your deliberate opinion, that the source of corruption, confusion, disorder, and tyranny of Moslem State of our age, is just that the law of Mohamed is still held to remain the law of modern civilisation, and that they exhibit all the vices of the Papacy in the worst times when society was regarded as being ruled by men of God, according to the word of God. Passing from these reflections on Islam and Mussalman States, you refer to the Indian Moslems' views as really a form of that covert and subterranean revolution which you are assured is undermining the peace of the Dependency; and you think that perhaps the sinister patience with which the Indian officialdom has allowed criticism of our neutrality to pass unnoticed is due to their wish to treat in silence a cry which is too absurd to be used in good faith. You believe that a British crusade on behalf of Mohamed would be even more unthinkable than a crusade on behalf of Christ, and that for many reasons it would be even more pernicious, and you suggest that when fanatical Indians ask you to maintain the supremacy of Mohamed over a Christian population, the Positivists must tell them that, bearing in memory all the evil done in the name of Mohamed, Christ, Buddha or Confucius or any other prophet, ancient or modern, they will not listen to any suggestions that in the 20th century the national policy shall be coloured by any kind of religious sympathy or religious antipathy—or by anything but secular, practical, human and social wisdom.

In the above re-statement of your views, I have, as you will admit, kept rigidly close to the text of your article in order to make sure that in expressing my own opinion I shall do you no injustice. Now may I crave that, in judging me and my co-religionists and fellow-countrymen, you will extend the same justice to us. This is my first request, and I hope not an unreasonable one. But if you will do so, I think, very little would be left in which we shall differ, for I beg to assure you that no responsible Mohamedan or body of Mussalmans in India has the fantastic, absurd and preposterous notions that you have attributed to Indian Mussalmans, and if you do not accept this as fact, you would, I hope, do us the justice of quoting our own words even though it may be after having so wholeheartedly condemned us.

I admit that perhaps once or twice some Moslem meetings held in India did call on the British Government and people to intervene in the attacks made by foreign nations on Mussalman States, but the bulk of Moslem opinion has expressed itself, not once or twice, but a hundred times, in favour of an absolute British neutrality. Whatever appeals have been made to the British Government and people for the exercise of diplomatic pressure, or on rare occasions for forcible intervention, have been made either on humanitarian grounds or for the preservation of international morality. If in modern society civil contracts are held binding, it is not only because Christ or Confucius or Mohaméd declared them to be sacred, and their observance pleasing to God, but because the sacredness of these contracts was essential for the continuance and progress of society, and because their observance was dictated by secular practical, human and social wisdom. If treaties between "high contracting parties" are sought to be made binding, it is exactly on these grounds. And it is not only Indian Mohamedans that have been inclined to think that international obligations are being treated very lightly in these days, for I can quote numerous protests on the part of Englishmen and Christians who have denounced the manner in which the most solemn treaties have recently been set at naught by one Power after another the moment it felt itself strong enough to break those treaties. Forcible intervention of any Power anxious to preserve the sanctity of contracts of great importance between one State and another on the observance of which depends the happiness, not of individuals in one State only, but the happiness of many States and countries, as a whole would perhaps be acceptable even to those who are strong supporters of a peace crusade. After all it is no more than the duty of a policeman among the Powers. But when appeals were made for diplomatic pressure, and, if necessary, forcible intervention of Great Britain, because some of the foulest deeds of barbarism were being perpetrated in the oasis of Tripoli, and because half a million Mussalmans who had never fought against the Balkan Allies were being butchered in the most revolting fashion, one would have thought that the leader of a movement, which places humanity above all other ideals and purposes in life would be the first to join such appeals. It is true that you are prepared to go entirely with anyone who utters what he feels, whether on political or on humanitarian grounds; but you have never attempted to point out when and where Indian Mussalmans uttered what they felt on other grounds, and used those other grounds as the basis of an appeal to Great Britain for intervention or even diplomatic pressure. I entirely agree with you that it would be the height of folly for the Mohamedans to appeal to Great Britain in the cause of Islam as a religion on the ground of the British Empire containing a large Mussalman body. But it seems to me that instead of the Mussalmans being guilty of such folly, it is your own Liberal Prime Minister who comes quite close to it when in his last Guildhall speech he guarantees to the Mussalmans the preservation of Moslem sovereignty over the holy places of Islam. Much as the Mussalmans would like the preservation of Moslem sovereignty over their holy places, they feel that this is a matter in which it would be the height of folly to expect Christian nations and Christian people to assist them. For once the matter being religious it is only those who follow that religion that can be reasonably expected to assist. A Society has already been founded in India for the purpose of assisting the independent Moslem Sovereign State that protects the holy places in this religious object, and all that Indian Mussalmans ask for is that they should be allowed to continue their efforts, and should not be persecuted on the suspicion of being concerned in some covert and subterranean revolution, such as you are assured is undermining the peace of the Dependency. Instead of the Indian Mohamedans importing religion into politics, it is the British authorities that may perhaps import politics into religion. It will be time enough to condemn the gross folly and criminal fanaticism of the Indian Mussalmans and the absurdity and manifest wickedness of their appeals, when the motive of intervention or diplomatic pressure is shown to be to help a given religious creed, whether that motive is avowed or not. I have myself taken as large a share as most Indian Mussalmans in the activities of Indian Mussalmans to help Turkey and Persia and Morocco during the 3 last years; but I shall be greatly surprised to find that at any time during these three years in which I have filled hundreds of columns of my papers in support of Moslem States, I have written a single word suggesting that Great Britain should become the defender of the Moslem faith and protect Moslem States, right or wrong, simply because a section of the Oriental Empire is Mussalman. Whether an "insolence" or not, it is "incredible" to me, and whether such a suggestion is based on ignorance or any other basis, it is all the same "childish" and "preposterous." But do you not think that when you have used such strong language for what you have been led to think are the Indian Mohamedans' views, it is your obvious duty to substantiate the allegation that these are the Indian Mohamedans' views. It is unlikely that you have read Indian Mohamedan newspapers published in Urdu, and your source of information could obviously either be the newspapers published by Mohamedans in English or the opinions attributed to Indian Mussalmans by the Anglo-Indian Press and Anglo-Indian correspondents of some English papers. I should esteem it a great favour if you would enlighten me as to which of these sources of information has supplied you with the data for your denunciation. If it is newspapers published by Mohamedans in English, I would prefer the specification of their demands which you characterise as preposterous. If, however, your source of information is Anglo-Indian newspapers, or Anglo-Indian correspondents of British newspapers, then let me assure you that they have done us the grossest injustice, and it is indeed very depressing to find that even men of your character and judgment can be so easily influenced by the most partisan Press in the world.

It is an open secret that Anglo-Indians very seldom know any vernacular of India to a degree that would entitle them to the claim that they can understand Urdu newspapers as thousands of Indians understand English newspapers. Anglo-Indian journalists are no better than the rest of the Anglo-Indian community, and I do not know that any Anglo-Indian newspapers employs a competent staff of translators for placing the views of Indian journalists who write in the vernaculars before its editorial staff. And yet this wholly uninformed body of people presumes to interpret the views of Indians to the British public! However, it is not only un-informed but prejudiced also. A publicist of your vast experience need not be told that it is unsafe to trust too far an Opposition paper to do justice to Government measures and policy and the Ministry in power, or vice versa. And yet the Anglo-Indian Press is not only a party organisation, but is also influenced, as English party organisations are not influenced, by prejudices of race and colour. It is because this organisation had done everything in its power to mislead His Majesty's Government and the British public at large that Mr. Wazir Hasan and I were persuaded to undertake, at considerable expense, inconvenience and sacrifice of time, a long journey to England, in order to lay the true Indian Moslems' point of view and the salient features of the situation, in the first instance, before the Ministers and other men of influence, and, in the last resort, before the British public. The Ministers have, for reasons which have not appealed to us and which will not convince our fellow-countrymen and co-religionists any more than ourselves, refused to give us a hearing. But so anxious were we to avoid the appearance of the least desire to embarrass them that we reluctantly refused some opportunities that were very courteously and kindly offered to us for the ventilation of our views; and the final reply of the Secretary of States for India and some of his colleagues came so late during our sojourn that we could not effectively and in detail explain the position, views, and political attitude of those whom we had come to represent. However, we had one or two opportunities of repudiating certain opinions attributed to us by the lying Anglo-Indian correspondents of newspapers, like the Times, even though the Times itself consistently refused to publish a line from us in spite of repeated vilification of us in its columns. The first occasion on which Mr. Wazir Hasan and I referred to the attitude of Indian Mussalmans towards Turkey and Great Britain, and Great Britain's attitude towards Turkey and Indian Mussalmans, during Turkey's troubles, was, as the President of the Positivist Society points out, when we took part in the Positivist Conference on the 26th October at Essex Hall. A fortnight later I referred to the subject at greater length in responding to the toast of my health at the dinner which the Islamic Society very kindly gave to us. On both these occasions I repudiated as emphatically as I could any desire on our part to dictate the foreign policy of the British Empire. But I have equally emphatically declared that the foreign policy of the Empire must be "imperial" and not only "national" as even you evidently wish it to be. It must be remembered that if the Christians subjects of His Majesty are no fewer than his Mohamedan subjects, that is no reason why the foreign policy of the Empire should be the "national" policy of the Christians of the United Kingdom or the "colonial" policy of His Majesty's Christian subjects in the overseas dominions.

I find that Mr. Swinny would like it to be made clear that Indian Mussalmans do not desire British foreign policy to be swayed by any question of creed or colour, and should like it to be neutral between contending sects. This is exactly what Indian Mussalmans wish to make clear. But it is more than the speeches of your Prime Minister have made clear, for I should like a Positivist to convince me that in referring to the Greek occupation of Salonica in his Guildhall speech last year, Mr. Asquith did not speak with the accents of the jubilant crusader who exulted over the seventy millions of His Majesty's Moslem subjects, as well as over other Moslems, that Salonica, the gate through which Christianity entered Europe, was once more in Christian hands. Nobody could accuse Mr. Asquith of enthusiasm of a character that would make his utterances otherwise than deliberate, and yet it was such a speaker that made the famous Guildhall speech of 1912!

One word more about British neutrality. I have never seen any explanation of the inconsistency involved in the fact that Great Britain was a party to the declaration of the Powers when the Balkan war broke out, that the territorial status quo ante in the Balkans would be preserved irrespective of the results of that conflict, and Mr. Asquith's emphatic pronouncement, only a month later, that the fruits of victory must be assured to the victors. You will remember, Sir, that after the Græco-Turkish War, the doctrine of the fruits of victory going to the victors was considerably modified by the Powers, including Great Britain. Indian Mussalmans did doubt the neutrality of Great Britain when these contradictory pronouncements were made by the responsible Ministers of Great Britain, and their doubts were not removed but, on the contrary, strengthened by the Birmingham speech this year of that very deliberate speaker, Mr. Asquith, when he sought to turn back the Turks from Adrianople—the Adrianople from which Europe wanted the Turk to be turned out even before it was taken—by threats which I do not remember the Minister of any other Power having held out at the time. It is not for me to say whether this contradictory attitude of British Ministers, which naturally created doubts in our minds about British neutrality, was dictated by religious partisanship or not. But the fact remains, and it will take a good deal of explanation before it can be entirely explained away. I do not know who are the professional critics of your Foreign Office, or the amateur diplomats who see some criminal purpose in every despatch that issues from Downing Street, nor have I come across any of the plenty of tourists from India or Africa whose business, according to you, is to denounce Sir Edward Grey, any possible successor, and all his predecessors alike. But whosoever they may be, their task was certainly made extraordinarily easy by the speeches of the Liberal Ministers during the troubles of Turkey, and surely it is not necessary to steal Downing Street despatches in order to denounce Sir Edward Grey.

What has pained me considerably is your statement that the religious creed and social system of the Mussalmans are things with which Englishmen have neither sympathy nor interest; for if this is so, I can well understand why England has so often blundered in dealing with the Mussalmans in India and abroad. As one who desires the continuance of the British connection with India, my hopes of the continuance of this connection are not unlikely to receive a rude shock if I was to be convinced that Englishmen are lacking not only in sympathy with Islam, but also in interest therein. If Englishmen are to wrap themselves up in cotton wool lest their Christianity, or for the matter of that their Positivism, catch cold if it came into contact with the Islamic atmosphere, whatever one may think of their prudence, one cannot admire the power of their conviction in their own creeds.

I presume it is this absence of sympathy and interest with Islam which has led even such a great thinker as yourself to make the statement that the Mussalmans of the Indian Continent have no kind of contact with the Arabs of Tripoli, the Moors of Morocco or the Turks of the Sultanate, by race, history, intercourse or interest. So far as race or intercourse is concerned, I need not say anything here. But surely if the Mussalmans of the Indian Continent took no interest in the Arabs of Tripoli, the Moors of Morocco or the Turks of the Sultanate, they would not have felt for them all that they have felt in recent years. And we refuse to be bound by an ignominious, or, at any rate, a Western European convention that unless men are of the same country or race they have no business to take an interest in each other. It is true that the point of union between the Mussalmans of the world is the Koran. But what more rational or peculiarly human point of union could there be for mankind? Race is nothing more than breed, and in that respect the sympathy of men of the same race for each other is not unlike the sympathy of other animals of the same breed with each other. As for the country supplying a point of union, we should like to be told why territorial patriotism, which generally means "my country, right or wrong", is a nobler feeling than the extra-territorial patriotism of the Mussalman, even if it is based on your assumption: "the Koran, right or wrong." So long as Indian Mussalmans are law-abiding, and contribute loyally their proper share to the strength of the Empire, why should they abate one jot of their extra-territorial and religious fervour? It may be the very foundation of Positivist sociology to keep political action clear from any religious sectarianism, to keep an impartial course in the clash of religious bigotry. If it is so, the Positivist sociologist should have thundered forth against the religious bigotry of the Balkan Allies, who did everything in their power to give a religious colour to the war, and they should have denounced the speeches of Mr. Asquith, which did not seem to keep British political action clear from Christian religious opinions. I have no doubt that Mr. Swinny and other Positivists did so; but when we find the revered name of Frederic Harrison associated with no such powerful denunciation, but with invective directed against the Mussalmans of India without reference to anything that the Mussalmans had said or done, we have reason to deplore the ignorance of the true facts of the situation, from which we find not even the best in this land are free. You say that of the Mussalmans of India not one in a hundred thousand could have any clear knowledge of the Turks in Europe or of the race questions in the Balkans, and that the few Europeanised Indian Mussalmans who know anything about either Turks or the Balkan peoples, look at it solely as a matter of religious ascendancy. Could you honestly say that of the Christians in Europe, and particularly in England, even one in a hundred thousand has any clear knowledge of the Mussalmans in India or elsewhere, or that even one in a hundred thousand of the Britons who exulted over the victories of the Balkan Allies had any clear knowledge of the Turks in Europe? As for the question of looking at the war as a matter of religious ascendancy, did not the Balkan Allies deliberately assist the world in forming such a notion of the war? Nay, has not religious ascendancy a great deal to do with the conflict between the followers of the Greek Patriarch and, of the Bulgarian Exarch? Are these questions looked at merely from a political or social point of view by the Christians in the Balkans? It is true that, with the progress of materialism in Europe, the force of religion, whether it be the religion of humanity or the religion of divinity, has greatly abated. But unfortunately we see everywhere signs that even though much of religion may have evaporated, there is still a great deal too much in Christendom of the residuum of ancient religious prejudices. Nobody who has been for some time among the Mohamedans, whether in Turkey or elsewhere, thinks so badly of them as the stay-at-home Englishman who has imbibed from his infancy prejudices against Islam and Turkey which are as old as the passions of Peter the Hermit, and of the Pontiffs of Rome that organised three Crusades against Islam.

It seems to me that when you trace the course of corruption, confusion, disorder and tyranny of Mussalman States of our age to the fact that the law of Mohamed is still held to remain the law of modern civilisation, you are asking us to accept your own religious creed and your own religious prejudices even though they be not the creed of Christ or the prejudices of Christians. Will this explain the corruption, confusion, disorder and tyranny of some Christian States of our age, for you cannot find integrity, order and freedom everywhere even in Europe and Christendom. I would rather be ruled by men of God according to the word of God than by some men who deny the Deity and wish to rule according to their own prejudices and idiosyncracies which are coloured by greed and selfishness. Believe me, the enemies of modern civilisation would be found lurking within its own fold more than anywhere else. No doubt you bear in memory all the evil done in the name of Mohamed, Christ, Buddha and Confucius, but do you not forget the still greater evil done to humanity in the name of nationality and patriotism which, while lacking religious sanctions, have seldom provided themselves with the sanctions of reason. Look at the wars of the last and this century alone, and count the number of those who have died on the battlefields leaving behind them uncared-for orphans and unprotected widows, and tell us if these are fewer in number than those who lost their lives in Crusade or Jihad. If British imperial policy—I will not say national, for to me the "British nation" signifies very little—should not be coloured by any kind of religious sympathy or religious antipathy, should it be secular in the sense in which the wars dictated by capitalists are secular? Do you not realise to what extent the nations of to-day are puppets in the hands of these wire-pullers? Just think to what extent European manhood and the substance of Europe are being sacrificed to the creed of nationalism and the greed of the capitalist, instead of contributing to the growth of civilisation. No doubt Europe is to-day in many respects more civilised than any other continent, but there are a thousand things in which a Mohamedan can reasonably despise the civilisation of Europe, and it is for clear thinkers like a Frederic Harrison to point out to Europe that civilisation is not after all the same thing as comfort.

I have taken a great deal of your time, Sir, but you will understand the strength of the motives that impel me to do this, when I tell you that I have written this letter at a time that I could hardly spare a minute for anything in the hurry and worry of packing for India on my very last day, in England. By all means condemn Indian Mussalmans if they ask for anything more than their legitimate share, and denounce Turkey if its existence is a source of danger or even disadvantageous to humanity. But, in the first place, do not condemn us for views that are not our own, and, in the second place, keep an open mind for the thoughts that are ours, even though they may not be your own thoughts. There is room enough in the world for all of us to live peacefully, but when greed for gold or earth-hunger masquerade as civilisation and rationalism, it is not as absurd as you are led to think if we try to snatch away the veil and expose the reality of European passions and prejudices. Indian Mohamedans have a great deal to gain by the continuance of British rule just as British rule has a great deal to gain by the continued loyalty of Indian Mohamedans. Nothing should be done on either side which would prejudice either; and it is just because we wish to remove these prejudices that we came here, and that I have taken the liberty of addressing you in this frank manner. My reverence for you is unabated, and I trust you will not misunderstand my desire to remove the misconceptions which I think have led you to write as you have done. We can ill afford to lose the sympathy of a Frederic Harrison by heated arguments but we can afford still less to lose the sympathy of Great Britain, which is certain, if the case goes against us by default.

With the greatest esteem and veneration,

I remain,

Your humble and sincere admirer,
(Sd.) Mohamed Ali.

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HERKE, CONSTANTINOPLE.Turkish Fezes made in Turkey.

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpacks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

11-5-'14

Sole-Agents for Indiafor Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople.*SHaida & KHURSHED,COMMERCIALISTS, BADAUN.(1) CIGAR and CHEROOTS.*(2) CIGARETTES:—Turkish and Egyptian (by direct Importation) and others.(3) TOBACCOS:—All the best known British, American and Turkish.(4) Towels, Banyans, Stockings and Handkerchiefs Embroidered.KHUDAM-I-KAABA ON IT.(5) Cooking Stoves, Soaps, Powders, Lavenders, etc.(6) Stationary. (7) Fancy Articles.“KHATOONI”

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! The Latest Invention !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! Quite Up-to-date. !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! Most Comfortable !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! Very Handsome !!

? “WHAT IS IT” ?
? ? ? ?

!! The Best Pardah Keeper !!!! THAT IT IS !!*!! The New Burqa !!*OBTAINABLE FROM*The Khatoon Stores, Delhi.*(Khatooni) The “Code Word” mentioning one Burqa.Illustrated Price List free on Application..REDUCED PRICES.*To clear the debt and to save the property of a Mussalman.

* * *

STUDENTS ARE REQUESTED TO ORDER AT ONCE.

* * *

			Original Price.	Reduced Price.
			Rs. A.	Rs. A.
Quran, with English Translation, 1st quality	...	20	0	9 0
Ditto Ditto 2nd	10	0	4 8
Ditto Ditto 3rd	5	0	2 4
Selections from the Quran, 1st	5	0	2 0
Ditto Ditto 2nd	2	8	1 0
Life of Mohamed (may peace be upon him)	...	1	8	0 12
Karima, with English Translation	...	1	0	0 6
Trilingual Dictionary, English-Urdu-Hindi	...	5	0	2 0
Urdu-English Dictionary	...	2	8	1 0
Ditto Ditto	...	1	4	0 8
English-Urdu Ditto	...	2	8	1 0
Persian-English-Urdu Dictionary	...	3	0	1 4
Roman-English Ditto	...	1	8	0 10
English-Roman Ditto	...	1	8	0 10

Other useful notes, &c. of Matriculation are available at Reduced Prices.

APPLY SHARP TO—O. M. CHIENE,Receiver appointed by the Court,ELGIN ROAD, ALLAHABAD.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the “Akhbar-i-Islam,” the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: “The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to naughty diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive inasmuch as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility.”

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

THIS YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the virile power and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it so say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parishes necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiwar, India.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER RECEIVED FROM THE
BOMBAY MUNICIPALITY PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

ESANOFELE and MALARIA.

" Treatment with ESANOFELE controlled with quinine in most cases was recently given a fair trial. The majority of the cases belonged to the Parel Hindu Orphanage, where MALARIA OF A PARTICULARLY SEVERE TYPE raged this year. 48 cases of Malaria were treated of which FIVE WERE CHRONIC, with considerable enlargement of spleen and General Malaria Cachexia." Result :

REDUCTION IN THE SIZE OF THE SPLEEN	+	+
DISAPPEARANCE OF PARASITES	+	+
INCREASE IN THE HAEMOGLOBIN VALUE	+	+
GENERAL CONDITION OF PATIENTS VERY SATISFACTORY.

Writing on the result of chronic cases the report states :— " Quinine would not have worked equally well in these cases and one is especially emboldened to give this opinion from the case of a Sukharam Jivaji, who was a chronic sufferer and ALWAYS TOOK QUININE OR QUININE AND ARSENIC MIXTURES WITHOUT MUCH BENEFIT.

" On the whole, ESANOFELE appears to have VERY GOOD EFFECT ON CHRONIC CASES.

ESANOFELE is obtainable from all Chemists and Dealers throughout BRITISH INDIA, BURMA AND CEYLON.

General Agents:—

Messrs. B. G. GORIO & Co.,
3, Wallace Street, BOMBAY.

FOR INFANTS
"ESANOFELENA."
AFTER MALARIA.
FERRO CHINA WINE.

MANUFACTURERS:—

FELICE BISLERI & Co., MILAN, ITALY.

For Stationery write to

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

Don't shoot but ring.
The Standard Electric
Bell sets, mounted on galvanized steel. 20 yds.
wire and 5 months
battery. Rs. 7-8
20 yds. 1 year Rs. 11-0
Electric Bell Set Rs. 5-0
EAST-WEST CO.
General Agents,
DELHI

EVERY KIND OF
PRINTING DONE
IN THE "COMRADE"
PRESS, DELHI.

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper,
Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

NOTICE.

Madrassat-ul-Islam, Larkana, Sind.

Applications are invited for the post of Principal and Superintendent of the Boarding House. Applicants must be Mohammadan Graduates with some teaching experience. Pay Rs. 150—10—200, and free quarters.
Applications, with copies of testimonials should reach the undersigned before the 1st February 1914.

(Sd.) J. E. B. HOTSON,
President, Madrassa Board, Larkana.

ISLAMIC LITERATURE.

PRECIOUS BOOKS AVAILABLE

Apply for Price List (enclosing 0-1-0 postage) to the—
GENERAL NEWSPAPER AGENCY & BOOK DEPOT, Ballimaran, Delhi.

DO YOU WANT

TO EARN ANOTHER

Rs. 3 A DAY?

Reliable persons can add another Rs. 3 a day to their present income by making hosiery on the celebrated "Durbar Auto-Knitter" at home. Previous experience not necessary. Distance no drawback. Work simple.

Our Proposition Briefly Explained.

Purchase one or more Auto-Knitters from us, according to the number of members in your household who are ambitious to increase their earnings, and we guarantee thereafter to purchase work turned out by you with yarn supplied by us. Our profits do not come through the sale of the machines, but through the success of the operators.

Remittances are forwarded the very day that the finished work is received. The markets of the world are clamouring for hosiery made on the "Durbar Auto-Knitter." We are unable to keep pace with the ever-growing demand. We want more earnest workers—we want you. Write to us now for full particulars.

Genz, Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS,

Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay Street, Chowringhee Road, CALCUTTA.

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FULL DETAILS.
FILL IT IN, DETACH ALONG DOTTED LINES, AND SEND TO-DAY.

GENTLEMEN,

I wish to take advantage of your offer. Please send me immediately full particulars, whereby I can earn Rs. 3 a day. Enclosed please find Anna Stamp to help to pay postages.

Date

Name

Address

GENZ, WHEELER & CO., Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay St, Chowringhee Rd, CALCUTTA

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 7.
No. 5.

Single Copy
Annas 4.

Delhi: Saturday, January 31, 1914.

Annual Subscription

Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page.		Page.
Week	89	The Indian Moslems' Tasks	95
OUR LONDON LETTER	90	GUP—
TELE A TELE—		The Council	97
The Annual Meeting of the		ENVER BEY APPOINTED WAR
Aligarh Trustees	91	MINISTER	99
The Gift of the Caliph to the		RUSSIA AND AZERBAIJAN	99
Indian Moslems	92	A FRENCH VIEW	100
The Turkish Exhibition at		1914—THE SWORD OF PEACE	100
Delhi	92	THE ALBANIAN THRONE	100
"Distinctive Needs."	93	THE HINDIEN BARRAGE	101
The Man in the Street		TURKEY'S NEW LOAN	102
The Musselman and his Creed	93	TWO YEARS OF ITALIAN IMPE-
LEADING ARTICLES—		RIALISM	103
The Press Act—III	93	CYNICISM OLD AND NEW	105
		ADVERTISEMENTS	105—108

ate and peaceful policy. News from Albania is regarded as disquieting, but not dangerous. The question of sending warships by the powers to Albania was raised, but it is hoped that such a step will be unnecessary. The question of an Albanian loan is still unsettled.

Turkey.

Constantinople, Jan. 28.

The anti-Greek atmosphere has suddenly been superseded by more conciliatory dispositions an evidence of which was given yesterday by the assurances given to the Patriarch and by the moderate attitude being observed with regard to the Aegean. The change is ascribed to the difficulties of Djavid Bey, who left on the 12th instant for Paris to renew loan negotiations, in obtaining aid there.

A competent personality has authorised a letter to declare that Turkey's policy is not a bellicose one, and that her military activity is confined to remedying deficiencies caused by the late war.

The Minister of the Interior, in an interview, stated that Turkey had no intention of purchasing further warships. The Rio de Janeiro was only purchased to prevent its falling into the hands of Greece. The whole of the loan would be devoted to economic purposes.

A telegram from Valona states that Ismail Kemal has started for Italy, where he will spend a few days, after which he will proceed to Berlin to meet the Prince of Wied.

Aegean Isles and Albania.

London, Jan. 27.

Reuter understands that the British Government has drafted a communication for presentation at Constantinople and Athens on behalf of the Powers in a form making it clear that the unanimous decision of the Powers must be respected. The date originally fixed for the evacuation of Albanian Epirus having passed, no fresh date has been proposed but the draft suggests that the withdrawal be as quick as possible. Reuter learns that the question of the Powers guaranteeing an Albanian loan is still unsettled. Britain and some other Powers have signified their willingness, provided all participate, and under certain conditions connected with the expenditure of the money.

Reuter learns that the Powers are likely to acquiesce speedily with Sir Edward Grey's proposed drafts informing the Athens and the Constantinople Governments of the decisions of the Powers.

It is probable that the Triple Alliance will recommend the fixing of the date for the Greek evacuation of Albania.

Aligarh College.

Aligarh, Jan. 26.

As decided by the Aligarh College Trustees in their meeting of 1st instant, their representative deputation of trustees from the different provinces, and including the Honorary Secretary the Raja of Jehangirabad and Mr. Syed Wazir Hossain, waited upon H. H. the Nawab of Rampur, yesterday, requesting him to withdraw his resignation from the visitorship of the College. News has now reached here that His Highness has kindly withdrawn it.

South Africa

Pretoria, Jan. 22.

It is announced that the Indian promise to await the report of the Investigation Commission be ore renewing passive resistance. The authorities agree to release the imprisoned passive resistors, and await

The Week.

Italy and Turkey.

London, Jan. 22.

A telegram from Home says that is an article replying to the claim made by the Turkish paper Tanin, that the time has arrived to restore Dodacanese to Turkey, and denying the Porte's obligation to indemnify Italy for expenditure during occupation, the Tribuna absolutely insists on indemnification by a concession in Asia Minor, enabling Italy to share European economic activity in the Eastern Mediterranean. The Tribuna says that such demands are moderate, and will be supported by the Triple Alliance.

Italy and Asia Minor.

Paris, Jan. 25.

Signor Nogara, Italian Member of the Commission of Ottoman Debt, has gone to London. It is reported that he will negotiate on matters connected with concessions in the Aidin and Adalia regions which Italy expects in return for the expenditure during her occupation of the Aegean Islands.

Albania.

London, Jan. 24.

M. Venizelos has left for Paris.

While he is en route, as to the results of his visit, Reuter learns that the importance in diplomatic quarters is that the actual date of Greek evacuation has lost its importance, owing to the general belief that the Greek Government has no intention of following anything but a moderthe recommendations of the Commission before they introduce legislation.

The correspondence between Mr. Gandhi and the authorities has been published. The net result is that the Indians will await the report of the Commission before reviving passive resistance. Although Mr. Gandhi will not appear before the Commission, he agrees to Sir Benjamin Robertson appearing on his behalf. The authorities agree to liberate bona fide passive resisters, and await the recommendations of the Commission, adopting legislation accordingly. The Indians undertake not to press the charges of ill-treatment and brutality towards the strikers, the Government agreeing not to produce negative evidence with regard to the matter, but reserving the right to investigate occurrences resulting in loss of life at Esperanza and Mount Edgcombe. The Government repudiates strongly and emphatically, as heretofore, the charges of harsh and improper action against Indian passive resisters. The Government also says that it is anxious that any recommendations which the Commission may make on the larger issue of Indian grievances should be received at a sufficiently early date to enable proposals to be submitted to Parliament during the forthcoming session. It is hoped that those proposals, if accepted by Parliament, will ensure a satisfactory and permanent settlement. The Government consider that such a settlement of a long-standing dispute is too important to justify any risk, endangering its achievement by delaying the proceedings of the Commission, already delayed through unforeseen circumstances, or by an enquiry, which would now be necessary one sided, in a point of a minor and secondary importance, relatively to the wider issues at stake, therefore, the Indians decline to submit to the Commission any specific charges in connection with the treatment of passive resister during the recent troubles, the Government will not think it necessary to take any further action in refutation of the allegations against it and its officers. The reply states that the Government decided to release the passive resisters before Mr. Gandhi's letter was received.

Durban, Jan. 26.

At a mass meeting of Indians addressed by Mr. Gandhi and other Indian leaders, it was decided to endorse the provisional agreement reached between Mr. Gandhi and the Government. The Indian Grievances Committee has opened its sittings here. The Union Government alone is represented by Counsel. There was a fair attendance of Indians, but none of the leaders was there. No Indian witnesses were forthcoming. Judge Solomon said that the position was most unsatisfactory. The Indian's allegations of ill-treatment fell to the ground, unless they supported them with evidence. The Commission asked to be notified of specific allegations but none had been received. Mr. Charles de Villiers, representing the Government, informed Sir William Solomon that the Government was not prepared to adduce evidence regarding the allegations but was prepared to meet the allegations of ill-treatment made in evidence. The Government had not communicated with the Indians except through Mr. Gandhi. Sir William Solomon remarked that they did not know how far Mr. Gandhi represented the Indians. Mr. de Villiers, continuing, stated that the Government would give evidence regarding the allegations of the use of unnecessary force in repressing the disturbances. Sir William Solomon: There again the evidence of Indians is important as they make charges against Government officials. If they do not bring evidence, it will be most difficult to investigate as the Commission has no power to summon witnesses. Mr. de Villiers, replying to Sir William Solomon, stated that the Government's attitude concerning the general grievances was contained in the blue book of correspondence which it was proposed to put in at a later stage. Evidence was adduced regarding the Mount Edgcombe affray. The evidence was similar to that given at the magisterial enquiry, and there were no fresh points. Sir Benjamin Robertson was present throughout the proceedings listening to the statements on behalf of the Indian Government. After the Mount Edgcombe evidence had been heard, the sitting was adjourned.

Durban, Jan. 27.

The Indian Grievances Commission resumed its sittings to day. In the absence of Indian evidence, the proceedings promise to be of little interest. Mr. Polkinghorne, Protector of Indian immigrants detailed the system of recruiting indentured Indians in India. He said that the marriages of Indian immigrants were made valid in Natal by registration without regard to whether they were possibly polygamous. Whereas before the strike, 90 per cent. re-indentured on the termination of their indentures, since the strike indentured Indians had refused to re-indenture or pay the Three Pound Tax or return to India. The payment of the three pound licence had been little enforced. The latest figures showed that £9,000 had been paid out of the £48,000 due.

The Natal Indian Congress will meet tomorrow to discuss the advisability of giving evidence before the Commission.

Message to Mr. Gokhale.

Delhi, Jan. 27.

Mr. Gokhale has received the following cablegram from Mr. Gandhi, dated Durban the 26th:—"Indian mass meetings at Durban, Pretoria, Johannesburg, and other centres have unanimously endorsed agreement."

Sir Benjamin Robertson gave important evidence on behalf of the Indian Government before the Indian Commission to day.

He said that it was most unfortunate that they were unable to enter into the charges made, because it was the decision of the Indians not to give evidence. The Indian Government was most anxious for some settlement of these grievances. While he was expressing his personal views, they agreed with those of the Government of India. The latter's view of the £3 Tax was that the object for which it was imposed, namely that of inducing the Indians to return to India, was no longer being fulfilled as was admitted by the deputation from Natal, which visited India in 1908. Negotiations were then entered upon for compulsory repatriation of indentured Indians at the termination of their indentures, but they fell through. In view of the prohibition of the immigration tax not having had the effect intended, and the invidious nature of its collection and also the feeling in India, the Government of India desired its repeal.

The coolies were most ignorant of the conditions in Natal. Many left India as the result of a family or caste quarrel, and they would not take the trouble to understand and appreciate the conditions under which they would have to serve. Sir Benjamin Robertson suggested if it was thought desirable to replace the £3 Tax by a licence until ex-indentured Indians got domiciled, the licence should be taken out once and for all. The Government of India was most anxious that means should be found to validate monogamous marriages in South Africa. The only way out of the difficulty seemed to be registration with a declaration from the man that he would take only one wife. Monogamy in India was practically the rule. The Government of India agreed that in case of plural marriages, only one wife should be admitted in South Africa. It also desired that all the existing rights of South African-born Indians should be maintained.

The Rev. Mr. Pearson advocated the abolition of the tax as coolies did not understand its significance when they left India. As the tax failed to cause the coolies to return, he suggested that some inducement should be offered to them so that they would return voluntarily, such as a gift of twenty or thirty pounds. If the whites really wanted the Indians to leave, one clear way of inducing them to go was to boycott them. Mr. Pearson also objected to the tax on the ground that it induced the Indians to re-indenture. He considered the indenture system to be thoroughly bad. He agreed that the material conditions under which indentured Indians lived were very good, but objected to its being made a criminal offence to refuse to work. This increased the criminal population. He had come to the conclusion that the indenture system placed coolies in a disadvantageous position in regard to the administration of the law.

Our London Letter.

London, 26th January, 1914.

CAPT. RAOUF BEY.

CAPT. RAOUF BEY of the Imperial Ottoman Navy, the brave skipper of the "Hamidieh", who distinguished himself at sea during the recent Balkan War, as you have been no doubt informed by Reuter, paid a flying visit to London lately and has already departed. The Press, as was expected under the circumstances, associates his visit with the recent purchase of the Brazilian Dreadnought by the Turkish Government and, no doubt, this subject must have occupied his attention, amongst one or two other matters, with which he has certainly dealt, while in London. The Captain, very wisely refrained from granting any interviews to the representatives of the Press, who had attacked him by hundreds, and so the outside world knows very little of his doings in London. I have, however, very substantial reasons for believing that his visit to this country was primarily connected with the Turkish Naval Organisation Scheme, which is being matured most favourably. Considering that Turkey will have six first-class Dreadnoughts at her disposal at no distant date, it is obvious that the Ottoman authorities should seriously consider the proper establishment of this vital arm of the Ottoman Empire if the Turkish Empire is to have a prosperous, progressive and a viable future—an outlook for which condition of affairs has never looked more hopeful. Turkey has every opportunity in the Eastern naval advisers at Constantinople and given a reasonable chance of peace and freedom from outside interference, the future naval efficiency of the Turks, under the guidance and instructions of the British Officers employed, is assured.

THE GERMAN MILITARY MISSION.

While dwelling upon the question of the Turkish Naval Organisation, mention must also be made of the German Military Mission to the Sultan. The German Military Mission, which has been in existence for every, has already started its work at Constantinople, and the question has arisen no little controversy as to Turkey's military future. It cannot be doubted that the German authorities are taking the right step at the right moment. It is believed that the Turkish

TETE À TETE

The annual meeting of the Trustees of the Aligarh College came off on the 31st January, and we are glad to note that the proceedings were throughout business-like and marked with good temper. One of the important matters dealt with by the meeting was connected with a series of resolutions submitted by the Hon. Secretary for the regularisation of the finances of the College and the proper administration of the various Funds held in deposit for different purposes. The Hon. Secretary had prepared a detailed note with considerable lucidity and care, pointing out the existing tangle in accounts and setting it forth in tabular form. These tables show that there ought to have been Rs. 587,603-4-11 in deposits of various kinds, up to 31st March, 1913, but that the actual amount in hand was only Rs. 211,805-7-8. The deficit of Rs. 325,797-18-8 was due to expenditure incurred in meeting the general needs of the College out of the moneys set apart for other objects. Of this about a lakh and a half cannot be made good except by collecting fresh subscriptions from the public. You may stand off emergencies for a while by robbing Peter to pay Paul, but as a system of keeping accounts it is thoroughly unsound, and though it may have led to no actual waste, it has certainly produced a muddle in the finances of the College from which it would take much patient care and labour to extricate them. We are glad the Trustees have realised this and, while marking their disapproval of the slackness of the syndic in charge of Finance, they have made it a rule that the Registrar should not pay any bill in future without satisfying himself that (1) it carries the proper sanction according to Rules, that (2) it is provided for in the Budget and that (3) there is enough money under that head. Another necessary resolution adopted at the meeting was that the Budget meetings should in future be held in March when the budget for the current year should be passed on the basis of the actual figures from 1st April to 31st December and approximate figures from 1st January to 31st March. According to existing practice budget discussions are mere academic exercises in accomplished facts. The reform in method though tardy is welcome, and we trust it will lead to greater financial efficiency and expedite work. Till now the budget meetings have been held sometimes 10 months and frequently 5 or 6 months after the commencement of the financial year. This laxity was little short of scandalous and not long ago several Trustees had brought it to the notice of the Board. We are glad Haji Mohamed Swaleh Khan Sahib brought the matter up this time with success. We are also glad that another important proposal of his was accepted, viz., that the Long Vacation should begin in the College just after the annual University examinations. This change, which will come into force in 1915, is absolutely necessary, for the period of two and a half months from August to the middle of October now devoted to vacations and coming so soon after the long period of inactivity when the students are waiting for University examination results reduces the length or number of College terms and leads to a great waste of students' time. Among the five Trustees elected this year we are glad to note the distinguished names of the Hon. Nawab Syed Shamsul Huda, Dr. Ansari, Mr. Mazhar-ul-Haque and Mr. Jinnah. We regret that Mr. Mohamed Faiq missed a seat by just a few votes, and hope that either the Old Boys would elect him or the Trustees themselves would do so next year. Messrs. Sultan Ahmad, Mustafa Husain Rizvi, Dr. Naziruddin Hasan and Mr. Tasaddug Ahmad Khan Sherwani should be certainities for next year. We must also acknowledge that the Honorary Secretary of his own accord withdrew some proposals of his about the Syndicate which were not in order, and this augurs well for the future. We trust these proposals will not be pressed again and that the Honorary Secretary and the Syndicate will co-operate for the well-being and progress of their joint charge.

The Annual Meeting of the Aligarh Trustees.

are entitled to improve their army—and this problem is for the Turks themselves to decide—it cannot be denied by any thinking man that it was Germany and Germany only, who could help the Ottomans in this respect. There is no other country in Europe to-day which can rightly boast of such a thorough and perfectly organised Army as Germany possesses, and this is the sole reason as to why Turkey has engaged German officers as her military instructors, although numerous political reasons are given in certain quarters for this step on the part of Turkey. Perhaps some people are of opinion that Swedish officers or Belgian instructors would have been employed with greater advantage! It is, however, admitted that the employment of German officers as instructors in Turkey is not without precedent, but what is really distasteful to Turkey's neighbours is the fact, which is not without its significance, that the present German Military Mission is enjoying much greater freedom from Ottoman officialdom, and that it is thus wielding a much larger power and influence as compared to its predecessor. This laxity allowed to the German instructors, from the purely Military point of view, however, was indispensable and will certainly enable them to discharge their duties much more efficiently and usefully than they would, were their scope of work and area of activity narrowed down to the smallest limit. The bitterness caused by the appointment of the German Military Mission in certain quarters is very greatly enhanced by the recent entry of Enver Pasha in the Turkish Cabinet as Minister of War. Those who are in close touch with this great hero and know him intimately are fully aware of the very moderate and sound statesmanship with which he is gifted, in addition to his numerous other qualities as a fine soldier, a true patriot and a wonderful organiser. Even in the British Press there is some mild yet plainly visible uneasiness felt at his appointment to the War Office, and the Daily Mail has gone to the extreme of heralding the event with the prominent headlines of "Firebrand as War Minister." They have lost no time in attributing Enver Pasha's new appointment to a deliberate Germanophil policy of the young Turks, coinciding, as it does, with the presence of the German officers at Constantinople. The Daily Telegraph, however, has published an interview, given to its Constantinople Correspondent by Enver Pasha, in which the new Turkish War Minister has clearly and plainly outlined the future Military policy of the Ottoman Government. The new War Minister is determined to place the Ottoman Army on a thoroughly organised and efficient footing, which, he says, is rendered absolutely essential for the safety of the Empire. If this defensive policy is deliberately interpreted in various quarters as the new forward policy of the "firebrand," no more malignant misrepresentation of facts could be imagined. Enver Pasha has undoubtedly taken upon himself a task of no little magnitude and responsibility, but those who have been following his brilliant career, so far, in the service of his Sovereign and country, have no doubts as to his ultimate success in his new role. May he be spared long to serve his country usefully and honourably!

THE KIKUYU CONFERENCE CONTROVERSY.

During the past week or so, the newspapers have been full of letters and articles on the keen controversy caused by the Kikuyu Conference, which was held lately in order to unite the numerous Sections of the Protestant Church for missionary purposes, if Christianity is to successfully overcome Islam as its rival in Africa and other places abroad. The energetic Christian Missionaries, it seems, have only now realised that in Islam they have a very formidable rival to deal with and are sparing no efforts to join the various branches of Protestantism together so as to be able to strike unitedly against the religion of the Moslems. This point is being vigorously pressed in the newspapers which are giving every prominence to the subject. The controversy has revealed matters of extreme interest. As an outsider, I am in no way entitled to enter the controversy, but I may just draw the earnest attention of the zealous Missionaries to the fact, which cannot be disputed, that they have before them a greater field for religious work in this country itself than in the remote corners of the world, over which they are expending unnecessary sums of money and energy. The simple faith of the Moslems carries conviction with itself and certainly appeals more to the pagans in Africa than the complicated and mysterious form in which Christianity is presented to them by different missionaries representing different Sections of the Christian faith. Moreover, the so-called Christianity which exists here to-day is itself in great danger of rapidly becoming extinct and needs more spiritual attention on the part of the priesthood for its revival than the spread of Christianity abroad by means of the most unchristian system of conversions. If these God-fearing missionaries would only attend to their own duties at home and leave the rest of the world to itself, no greater service could be rendered to the cause of universal peace in this world!

THE ISLAMIC SOCIETY.

At to-day's Juma-Namaz, held under the auspices of the Islamic Society, Mr. Kedwai, an ex-Secretary of the Society, was amongst the worshippers. His genial presence was most welcome to the present members, who are fully aware of the past services of Mr. Kedwai to the Islamic Society.

When the Mussalmans of India became aware some months ago of the intention of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan of Turkey to present a carpet for the Delhi Mosque, they were peculiarly gratified at this gracious mark of His Imperial Majesty's good-will towards them. It was not only gratifying to their sentiment of devotion to the Caliph, but was regarded as a visible proof of his appreciation of the help which the Indian Mussalmans had rendered in some measure to mitigate the sufferings of their Turkish brethren in the hour of their sorest need. And naturally enough, they were looking forward to the arrival of the Caliph's gift in India with much eagerness, for their highest pleasure was to receive the gift in a manner worthy of the occasion. Delhi had, in particular, been on the tiptoe of expectancy and had made elaborate preparations to mark its enthusiasm and gratitude for the honour of which it had obvious reasons to be proud. Those who witnessed the striking demonstration of the Delhi Mussalmans on the occasion of Mr. Zafar Ali Khan's return from Constantinople would recall the circumstances to which in some measure it was due. A strong rumour had preceded Mr. Zafar Ali Khan that he was bringing the carpet with him to Delhi, and the effect of the rumour was electrical. Huge throngs turned out to greet what they supposed to be the bearer of the Caliph's present, and the crowd that accompanied the procession through the hot and stuffy streets of Delhi was unparalleled in the annals of the city. It, however, transpired that the carpet had not yet arrived, that, in fact it would be brought to India by the new Ottoman Consul-General, His Excellency Khalil Khalid Bey, who would hand it over to the Delhi Moslems in person. And now began the long period of eager waiting and preparation to give His Excellency a befitting welcome. Arrangements for a magnificent public reception had been made and perfected months before. Scores of young men had enrolled themselves under the indefatigable Mr. Chishti to form a mounted escort for His Excellency the Consul-General, and they had provided themselves with expensive uniforms. The exact date of the arrival of the Consul-General in Delhi became the one topic of discussion. It became the general talk in every Moslem household. Rumour after rumour spread and died away and yet it served to keep the people's hope alive. Much impatience naturally became manifest as days wore on and numerous enquiries began to be addressed to us every day. But there was no doubt in the minds of the Delhi Mussalmans that the Consul-General would some day come and the ceremony of handing over the sacred present of the Caliph to the Indo-Moslems at Delhi would be performed in a way befitting such an event. Well, the Consul-General has come and—for all that the people of Delhi know, perhaps gone, and the carpet must have somehow been smuggled into the mosque, for the people found it spread full length before them as they came for Friday prayers. We need not say what their feelings have been. There was a conspiracy of silence around them and their fondest hopes and desires lay shattered at their feet. They had prepared to receive the Consul-General in their tens of thousands, yet the Consul-General's coming on Thursday was as secret an affair as it was sudden. Only a faint rumour was heard in the afternoon that he was coming from Bombay, which was afterwards confirmed by the Deputy Commissioner, but at such short notice that practically nothing could be done. Those who had heard the rumour went to the station, but none was sure of the exact time of his arrival and many went back disappointed to their homes. When the last train arrived at midnight a Turkish gentleman was seen alighting from a first class compartment and a couple of hundred of people who still lingered there rushed towards the carriage. They learnt that he was the Consul-General, and they saw him handing over a receipt for boxes containing the carpets to the Deputy Commissioner's chaprassi who had evidently been sent to take charge of them. The Consul-General quietly went to his hotel. The carpets were given over to the Mosque Committee that lost no time in spreading them properly before the people became aware of what had happened. The Consul-General attended the Juma prayers, and as the people saw him they grieved in their hearts that some cruel and malign fate had deprived them of the long looked-for opportunity to pour out to him their feelings of devotion and gratitude towards the Sultan and their brotherly love for his people. We need not care to enquire who is responsible for this organised method of cheating people of their hopes and suppressing their desires, but whoever he may be, we can not admire his tact, wisdom or statesmanship. He has simply exasperated the feelings of the people and this is not a very gratifying achievement. The only question that we need ask is, what is the net gain of all this secrecy and this "personally conducted" tour of the Ottoman Consul-General in which the Deputy Commissioner and his chaprassi and some members of the Mosque Committee have been so prominent? Has all this chaperoning eased a grave and critical international situation seriously affecting Entente or Alliance, or has it even killed the creation of the Times, the bogey of the "Indian Peril"? As Puck says, alas, what fools these mortals be!

The Turkish Exhibition about which some announcements had been made in these columns from time to time was formally opened in Delhi by Nawab Viceroy-ul-Mulk Bahadur on Friday after the Juma prayers. There was a large attendance of Mussalmans and the ceremony was performed amid great enthusiasm. In the address presented to the Nawab Sahib full mention was, of course, made of the objects for which the Exhibition had been organised. As has often been stated, the primary object of the exhibition is to interest people in Turkish manufactures and industries and thus bring about closer relations between India and the Ottoman Empire. The immense economic potentialities of Turkey in Asia are well-known. The European company promoter is more than usually alive just now to the vast opportunities for exploitation that this region offers, and rival diplomacy is busy promoting a race for concessions. It would be to the mutual advantage of both Turkey and India if trade becomes more active between the two countries and the Indian capital or labour assists in the economic development of the Ottoman Empire. The Turkish Government would welcome such assistance, while Indian labour and capital would enjoy facilities that they can not obtain elsewhere. A strong and regenerated Turkey is held to be the one object of British foreign policy and this end can not be better achieved than by offering every encouragement to the growth of closer economic ties between Turkey and India. The proceeds of the Exhibition will be exclusively devoted to the promotion of the scheme of colonisation of the Moslem refugees in Anatolia. Dr. Ansari in the course of his stay in Turkey took an active part in the formulation of this scheme and promised to help in the establishment of a colony by raising subscriptions from amongst the Indian Mussalmans. The details of the work done in this connection have already been published in these pages. The exhibits cover a wide range and we shall give a detailed description of them later on. Among the attractions of the Exhibition are Dr. Ansari's lantern lectures dealing with various phases of Turkish life and Dr. Asmat Ullah's physical feats. We congratulate the organisers on the great success they have achieved in bringing their long-cherished idea into practical shape. The perseverance and devotion of Dr. Ansari, Dr. Abdur Rahman, Mr. Chishti and the band of workers under them deserve special praise. The exhibition will last for some weeks and we trust it will meet with generous patronage from the public. We shall publish next week a fuller account of the opening ceremony as well as of the exhibits to be seen.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us a long letter disputing some of the conclusions we have reached in our consideration of "The Indian Moslem's Tasks." He makes a wry face, in particular, at the suggestion that "the Mussalmans should evolve a system of communal education based on their distinctive needs." We regret we are unable for want of space to publish the letter in full, but we give some extracts which sum up its general line of criticism and the substance of its argument. Our correspondent thinks that "what makes it (our suggestion) particularly obnoxious is the fact that it is a perfect translation of the feelings and the wishes of the man in the street." "We seem to forget," he argues, "that God in making the Mussalman did not namake the man." He is generous enough to allow the Mussalmans the luxury of a "distinctive" creed, but, according to him, "the creed being meant to purify and improve us as men, why should the average man parade it? The professional Mollab may wrangle with the professional Pandit. Perhaps the Pandit will help to form a trinity of triangular nations, but why in the name of all that is sensible should an average befezzed Indian have distinctive needs in the matter of education surpasses the comprehension of some of his well-wishers. There are hundreds of young Mussalmans who are sick unto death of this cant of formalism in religion, and who deplore the consequences of the recent revivalism and the rigid enforcement of ritual in some of our seats of learning. He does not tell us what sort of education the Mussalmans should have—perhaps the sultana mimicry that is going on in the madrasas and colleges fills his mental horizon. He has a vision of "the man in the street," and imagines that all attempts to give Moslem education on communal lines would be a mere pandering to his "feelings and wishes." And he evidently forgets that the progress of each community that numberless of millenial periods has laid a basis of its own particular social structure and its peculiar social genius. Even the mind of a child is not so much moulded by a tabula rasa, much less the collective genius of a century and a half of people."

Our correspondent seems to have no patience for that much-maligned individual—the man in the street. We do not claim to know what his conception of that being is; but we confess to a fugitive suspicion that he holds somewhere at the back of his brain a picture of a thoroughly vulgar and ignorant creature who figures in crowds and sways noisily to every gust of passion. Evidently a person of this type is a fit subject for cultured sneer. Our experience of the man in the street, however, is a little different. He may be ignorant and vulgar, but he is sure of his instincts and very often his instincts go to the roots of life. Culture sitting disdainfully high and aloof from the common life of stress and toil would soon become a new madness, were it not that the breath of real life from the street and the market-place occasionally blows into its cosy apartments and cleanses them of their scent-loaded stuffiness. The man in the street is the person who is the central fact about all communal life. He can be neither ignored nor suppressed. He creates real problems and himself supplies the energy needed for their solution. He sets the pace to all social endeavour. His needs are in real significance the communal needs. When he can not be thought out of existence, the only practical course open to communal patriots is to try to raise the level of his character and intelligence. It is for this purpose and nothing else that the organisation of Moslem education is necessary on communal lines. The man in the street amongst the Mussalmans has certain fundamental views about life, which have sunk into his consciousness and become a part of his nature. In all educational efforts these views will have to be taken into account. It is needless to insist that his prejudices and superstitions should not be nursed with tender care. Education would be a futile thing if it were not directed to cure "the average man" of his limitations. But it is absurd to imagine that the Mussalmans can grow up into a strong, efficient and prosperous community by roaming at will through the educational wilderness that the State Universities have produced in India. They, as a community with certain ideals of life, have their distinctive needs, and as long as these ideals endure, the needs can only be met by evolving a distinct type of education for Moslem boys and girls.

"The Man in the Street."

As regards the views of our correspondent on the Mussalman's creed, the root defect of this type of criticism is that it does not rise above the vulgar conceptions of religion and its place and function in human life. Formalism and ritual are taken to be the spirit and the inward reality; and in the name of "Truth, not Plato" much ignorant and senseless chaff is indulged in at the expense of the "the average man," as if he had no business to think about his creed. God in making the Mussalman did not unmake the man. No, he only made a Mussalman of him. And it is surely this that makes all the difference. Seventy millions of human beings have some definite title to call themselves a community. We do not know what the title can be, unless it is a community of ideals about life which have moulded their will and purpose and inspired their past history. Religion is the only bond of union among these millions of India, for it offers them a set of ideals which they have accepted as their guides. As long, therefore, as this bond exists, and hopes are shared in common and the wills of individuals unite freely to strive through circumstances towards the far-off Divine event, distinctive needs will continue to be felt by them for moral and intellectual equipment. There is always a class of men in all communities who look on religion as something merely decorative and picturesque, as the chogha of the prospective Khan Bahadur, that is reverentially taken out on the important occasion of a visit to the Burra Sahab and is as reverentially put back. If there are persons in the Moslem community whose attitude towards Islam is a mere sense of patriotism and loyalty to an old creed that has long ceased to satisfy their minds, they have certainly no distinctive needs and may browse at will in search of new fashions and pastures new. But the bulk of the Mussalmans still believe in Islam and are not ashamed of the faith that is in them. This faith is to them not a drawback but a responsibility, not a disabling defect, but a distinction. To have a distant goal in mind and some measure of the path ahead is surely not more perilous than to stumble about wrapped in mental fog and without the power to see farther than a few paces from the nose. The Moslem needs are distinct, if we are pardoned for the platitude, because they have a distinctive creed, distinctive history and distinctive environment. What is supposed as Western education is itself the product of distinctive needs. The Canadian fur coat is no more suited to the hot climate of India than the mental vesture of the average European is for the average man among the Indian Mussalmans. And the average man has a clearer perception of this than some of

The Mussalman and his Creed.

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

III.

We shall deal to-day with the most important assurance that was conveyed by the Government, through the Home Member who was in charge of the Press Bill, while enacting it in 1910, namely, the assurance that "it is not, like the Press Act of 1878, a purely executive measure." "The initiative," said Sir Herbert Risley, "indeed, rests with the Executive Government, but ample security against hasty or arbitrary action is provided in the form of what is virtually an appeal to a highly competent judicial authority." Let us examine in this connection the nature of the measure, and the nature of the judicial safeguard provided therein as understood at the time, if not by Government, at least by the people of India, including those who voted for the passage of the Bill, and thereafter let us see what value is attached to the judicial safeguard by the same "highly competent judicial authority" that was to decide the appeal from the "initiative" of the Executive Government.

But before we do so, let us not forget that the Press Bill was passed when Lord Morley was still the Secretary of State for India, and it will not be inappropriate if we explained here the general attitude of that great statesman towards judicial checks on the initiative of the executive in its dealings with the Press, just as we quoted last week his opinion on the freedom of the Press generally and the evil effects of gagging the Press in India. Speaking in July, 1908, at the Indian Civil Service Dinner, Viscount Morley referred to the Newspapers (Incitements to Offences) Act of 1908 which had become the law only a few days previously. He said, "I have no apology to make for introducing executive action into what would normally be a judicial process. Neither, on the other hand, have I any apology to make for tempering executive action with judicial elements; and I am very glad to say that an evening newspaper last night, which is 'not of the politics to which I belong, entirely approves of that. It says: 'You must show that you are not afraid of referring your semi-executive, semi-judicial action to the High Court.'"

We trust we are not assuming too much when we say that if it was necessary to show that Government was not afraid of referring to the High Court the order of the seizure of a Press for printing "a newspaper article inciting to murder and violence, or resort to explosives for the purposes of murder or violence"—an order, be it remembered, issued by "a Magistrate of a certain status" at the application of a Local Government—it was still more necessary to show that Government was not afraid of referring to the same judicial authority an order of forfeiture of the security, or the security and the entire Printing Press, issued by the Local Government itself, because it was used for printing anything containing "words, signs or visible representations which are likely or may have a tendency, directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise" to produce in the reader a number of feelings of varying degrees of impropriety. At any rate, the necessity of showing that Government was not afraid of a reference to the judiciary could be no less in the latter case than in the former.

It may be that at any time the political circumstances in a country may assume such a grave character that it may appear to those responsible for the safety of the State the lesser evil to withhold from the judiciary the power to pronounce on the legality of executive action. Inaction or the permission of an appeal to the judiciary against executive action may at such times appear to involve greater risks to the State than action based on considerations forbidden to law Courts, or in which impressions and personal experiences to which no expression can be given in a Court have been potent incentives to such action. It is not so difficult to imagine certain contingencies when the State may be led to adopt such a policy for its safety if it is recognised that in another set of circumstances the State may rightly feel itself compelled to declare Martial Law. In these easily imaginable contingencies those responsible for the safety of the State have a perfectly straightforward course open to them, and that is to ask for and obtain the necessary authority for such executive action as they deem proper from the Legislature. In 1878, Lord Lytton's Government, for reasons that do not seem to be apparent to us to-day, asked for and obtained such an authority, and whatever our opinion may be as to the necessity for such extraordinary powers, it cannot be denied that the course followed by Government on that occasion was perfectly straightforward and unobjectionable. This was the opinion that the Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah also expressed in the course of the Press Act debate on the Hon. Mr. Bannerjee's resolution on the 9th instant. He said:

It stands to reason that when Government ask the Legislative Council to sanction legislative measures empowering large and comprehensive powers to be given to them, they ought to follow one of two courses. They ought to say, "gentlemen, we want these powers to be conceded to us and we want you to extend to us your trust and confidence in regard to the manner in which we will apply them." That would be a perfectly straight course, and if they do that and the Council accepts that view, there is nothing further to be said. But if they come to the Council and say that "though we want certain powers in regard to matters which are under consideration, and that in order that these powers may not be arbitrarily exercised, we suggest embodying in the Act certain safeguards to protect people who may be adversely affected by executive action under these provisions," we are entitled to ask that those safeguards should be effective and of such a character as to give relief which Government themselves propose they should have.

As we have already shown, Government did not desire to follow the course it had adopted in 1878, and preferred in the words of Lord Morley, "tempering executive action with judicial elements," or in the words of Sir Herbert Risley, the provision of "a very complete check on hasty or improper action by a Local Government." We are therefore entitled to ask whether the safeguards Government intended to provide, and as everybody believed did provide, were effective or not. If we can prove that they are not effective, we are equally entitled to ask at the very least that, as Sir Porshim Rahimtoolikh said in the Council, "those safeguards should be effective and of such a character as to give relief which Government themselves propose they should have." Now the provision in the Press Act of 1910, for a judicial reference is contained in Sections 17, 18 and 19 which run as follows:—

17. Any person having an interest in any property in respect of which an order of forfeiture has been made under Section 4, 6, 9, 11, or 12 may, within two months from the date of such order, apply to the High Court to set aside such order on the ground that the newspaper, book or other document in respect of which the order was made did not contain any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in section 4 sub-section (1).
18. Every such application shall be heard and determined by a Special Bench of the High Court composed of three Judges, or where the High Court consists of less than three Judges, of all the Judges.
19. (1) If it appears to the Special Bench that the words, signs or visible representations contained in the newspaper, book or other document in respect of which the order in question was made were not of the nature described in section 4, sub-section (1), the Special Bench shall set aside the order of forfeiture.
(2) Where there is a difference of opinion among the Judges forming the Special Bench, the decision shall be in accordance with the opinion of the majority (if any) of those Judges.
(3) Where there is no such majority which concurs in setting aside the order in question, such order shall stand.

We see from this that, unlike the universal presumption of English law, the benefit of the doubt was intended in the Press Act itself to be given to the State and not to the individual adversely affected. That in itself was no small loss to the individual adversely affected as against the State, but the Legislature was further induced to enact Section 22, which bars all jurisdiction except that of the High Court, and narrows down the jurisdiction of the High Court itself to a remarkable extent. That Section runs as follows:—

22. Every declaration of forfeiture purporting to be made under this Act shall, as against all persons, be conclusive evidence that the forfeiture therein referred to has taken place, and no proceeding purporting to be taken under this Act shall be called in question by any Court, except the High Court on such application as aforesaid, and no civil or criminal proceeding, except as provided by this Act, shall be instituted against any person for anything done or in good faith intended to be done under this Act.

We had occasion to take legal opinion on the nature and extent of this bar of jurisdiction when the District Magistrate of Delhi issued a warrant for the seizure of all copies of the Comrade and of the Hamdard in which any portion of the Macedonia Pamphlet proscribed by the Government of India had been reproduced or translated, because we were anxious to obtain from the law Courts an injunction against such seizure. And what was the opinion given? It was this, that although the publication proscribed was the pamphlet itself, and not any copy of a newspaper in which a portion thereof had been reproduced or translated, the warrant of the District Magistrate was, in the words of Section 22, a "proceeding purporting to be taken" under the Press Act, and could not be called in question by any Court except the High Court for the Province of Delhi. As the High Court of Delhi is the Chief Court situated in Lahore, it was impossible to move it in time to prevent the seizure of copies of the Comrade and the Hamdard by the Delhi police, and they were surrendered under protest. It is true that when on the suggestion of the Hon. the Chief Commissioner we applied to the District Magistrate himself for a re-consideration of his orders, he upheld our contention that he had acted ultra vires. But it is equally true that if he had not upheld our contention and had persisted in his own decision, the Press Act had provided nothing like the boasted "very complete check on hasty or improper action" even by a District Magistrate, excepting, of course, an appeal to the High Court. In fact, we were told that if Government declared the forfeiture of our Printing Press, and an over-zealous subordinate official also removed the trouser-press of the proprietor no law Court in the wide world had jurisdiction except the High Court of the Province. This is not a joke but the law of British India as enacted in the form of the Press Act of 1910, and he who doubts it may bring a test case as we ourselves did last August.

It comes to this, then, that when security is demanded as a mere matter of course, as intended by Mr. S.P. Sinha, the framer of the Press Bill, or as a reflection on a journalist, as is generally done, not only by Local Government under section 3 (2) or 8 (2) but also by District Magistrates (e.g. in our own case), no Court in the world has any jurisdiction, and that when any declaration of forfeiture is made, no Court in the world has any jurisdiction except the High Court.

We have explained this point at perhaps needless length, but what has impelled us to do so is the desire to make it clear that the person adversely affected by any proceeding purporting to have been taken under the Press Act has to stake everything on one cast of the die, and that the State is to receive all the benefit of the doubt. But what if the die be loaded? The decision in our own case has shown that under the present law the die is loaded, and the Hon. the Home Member, speaking on behalf of Government in the debate raised by the Hon. Mr. Bannerjee, has now frankly told us that Government has always intended that the die to be used should be a loaded one.

We shall discuss in a subsequent issue the question raised in the Pamphlet case about the grounds of Government's opinion which are to be stated in a declaration of forfeiture under Section 12 of the Press Act and the Hon. the Home Member's pronouncement on the subject. But we may explain that when the Government of Bengal had also declared the forfeiture of the Macedonia Pamphlet, and in pursuance of that declaration the Police Commissioner of Calcutta seized a copy which we had in Calcutta at the time and had submitted to him through our solicitors, we applied under Section 17 to the Chief Justice of Bengal to appoint a Special Bench of the High Court to hear and determine our appeal against the order of the Bengal Government. The Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins appointed a Special Bench composed of himself and the two seniormost Puisne Judges of the Calcutta High Court, Sir Harry Stephen and Mr. Justice Woodroffe, and the appeal was heard for two days towards the end of August. Our application was based on two grounds. It was contended on our behalf that, in the first place, Government had failed to state the grounds of its opinion in the declaration of forfeiture, which, not having satisfied the requirements of law, was null and void. In the second place, the proscribed Pamphlet did not contain any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in Section 4, sub-section (1). The judgments of Sir Lawrence Jenkins (with which Mr. Justice Woodroffe agreed) and of Sir Harry Stephen were delivered on the 1st of September, 1913, and in the course of these judgments the whole Act was turned inside out. On the first point the Chief Justice held as follows:—

"The repetition of an opinion cannot be its grounds, and yet that is all that the notification furnishes in the shape of grounds. This is obviously insufficient and not a compliance with the terms of the Act. Moreover, I think that this direction in the section is 'mandatory and that the Legislature intended to impose and has imposed on the Local Government an imperative obligation to state the grounds of its opinion.'

"The notification, therefore, appears to me to be defective in a material particular, and, but for Section 22 of the Act, it would (in my opinion) be our duty to hold that there had been no legal forfeiture.

The result is that though I hold the Notification does not comply with the provisions of the Act, still we are (in my opinion) barred from questioning the legality of the forfeiture it purports to declare."

This astonishing result has been due not only to the fact that Section 22 bars all jurisdiction except that of the High Court, but also because even the jurisdiction of the High Court is confined to the narrow limits of merely determining whether the publication in respect of which the order of forfeiture was made did or did not, in the words of section 17, "contain any words, signs or visible representations of the nature described in Section 4, sub-section (1)." In other words, if a trouser-press was seized by the police when a Local Government ordered the seizure of a printing press, no Court in the world had jurisdiction to call in question the legality of this "proceeding purporting to be taken under the Act." Even the High Court had no jurisdiction in such a case, for in the words of the Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock, "the only issue that it was intended should be submitted to judicial decision, and that only to a Special Bench of the High Court, was the question whether the words, illustrations etc., which formed the subject of forfeiture fell within the aim of Section 4 of the Act or not. . . . There never was any intention to give to any Special Bench of the High Court any other power except to decide Aye or No, whether the word etc. complained of did or did not come within the description contained in the clauses and sub-clauses of Section 4."

This, then, is the joint opinion of the Judiciary and the Executive, that unless a man feels confident of proving without a shadow of doubt and to the satisfaction of all or a majority of the Judges constituting a Special Bench that the publication complained of contained only such 31st January.

The Comrade.

95

words, signs or visible representations as are neither likely nor can ever possibly have a tendency, whether directly or indirectly, whether by inference suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication or even otherwise to produce any of a number of results of varying degrees of gravity and danger described in six sub-clauses of Section 4 (I), he can seek relief nowhere against the most hasty, arbitrary and improper executive "proceeding purporting to be taken under this Act."

And even if he can muster enough confidence to approach the High Court with an appeal based on this one point in which, in the words of Lord Morley, executive action is tempered with judicial elements in a matter that "would normally be a judicial process," what result must he expect? Let us consult the judgment of the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins in our own case on this subject. Says the learned Chief Justice of Bengal:

The provisions of Section 4 are very comprehensive and its language is as wide as human ingenuity could make it. Indeed, it appears to me to embrace the whole range of varying degrees of assurance from certainty on the one side to the very limits of impossibility on the other. It is difficult to see to what lengths the operation of this Section might not be plausibly extended by an ingenious mind. It would certainly extend to writings that may even command approval. An attack on that degraded section of the public which lives on the misery and shame of others would come within this widespread net: the praise of a class might not be free from risk. Much that is regarded a standard literature might undoubtedly be caught.

In another place the judgment goes on to say:

If the applicant cannot establish the negative the Act requires, his application must fail. And what is this negative? It is not enough for the applicant to show that the words of the pamphlet are not likely to bring into hatred or contempt any class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India, or that they have not a tendency in fact to bring about that result. But he must go further and show that it is impossible for them to have that tendency either directly or indirectly, and whether by way of inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor or implication. Nor is that all, for we find that the Legislature has added to this the all-embracing phrase "or otherwise."

Referring to the High Court's powers and functions under the Act, Sir Lawrence says:

The High Court's power of intervention is the narrowest; its power to pronounce on the legality of the forfeiture by reason of failure to observe the mandatory conditions of the Act is barred; the ability to pronounce on the wisdom of the executive order is withheld; and its functions are limited to considering whether the applicant to it has discharged the almost hopeless task of establishing that his pamphlet does not contain words which fall within the all-comprehensive provisions of the Act. I describe it as an almost hopeless task because the terms of Section 4 are so wide that it is scarcely conceivable that any publication would attract the notice of the Government in this connection to which some provision of that section might not "directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication or otherwise" apply.

"What then," asks the Chief Justice "is the conclusion of the whole matter?" This all-important question he answers conclusively in the following manner:—

Of the two alleged checks on executive action supposed to be furnished by the Act, one, the intervention of the Courts, is ineffectual, while the other for this very reason can be, and in this case has been disregarded, without impairing the practical effect of a forfeiture purporting to be under the Act.

Well may Mr. Justice Woodroffe in that case ask the Advocate-General, as he did in our case, "Has a reference to this Court any reality at all?" And well may the Chief Justice say in the course of his closely argued and masterly judgment that "It may be a question 'whether even the semblance which this Act provides should not have been withheld as it was by Act IX of 1878.' Mind, this is not the opinion of that abject being, an Indian journalist, but the considered judgment of 'the highly competent judicial authority' a reference to which was with such self-conscious generosity provided by Government in 1910 as 'a very complete check upon hasty or improper action by a Local Government.' And yet such is human ingenuity that out of this unpromising material the Hon. the Home Member has been able to extract public recognition of the moderation and reasonableness of Government. He proudly mentioned in the debate on the 9th instant that only five cases were taken up to the High Courts and not one was successful, and concluded his remarks by the noteworthy observation that 'the fact that it has been difficult to prove that offending documents were innocent seems to me the very surest testimony that the Executive authorities have exercised their powers in no arbitrary or far-fetched manner.'

And what is to be the consolation that the Indian Press is to derive from Government's recent re-consideration of the question? Sir Reginald said: "I have a very lively faith in the independence of our High Court Judges, and I feel no doubt, if at any time the Executive Government should use their powers under this Act rashly or oppressively, that the Judges will find no difficulty in surmounting these obstacles and invalidating their illegal action." We make a present of this generous commendation of the Judiciary by the Executive to the Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court that heard our own appeal, and particularly to Sir Harry Stephen who received at the hands of the Hon. the Home Member the signal honour of the citation of a carefully selected passage. For was it not Sir Harry who made the following significant observations in the course of his judgment about the very passage which was cited? "In attempting to form an opinion on it 'I find myself in a position which, as far as I am aware, no Judge in the British Empire has been placed since the remote days of 'early English jurisprudence. I have to decide a question of fact 'on such evidence as is supplied by one document. The side on 'whom the onus of proving his case is cast is not in a position to 'give any evidence. As the other side has not called any witnesses, 'no cross-examination has taken place. . . . Such information as I have is unverified and general to a high degree; it has 'never been my duty to acquire information in the matter; and 'absolutely none has been supplied to me on this occasion. Under 'these circumstances I have no doubt that any opinion I may express 'will be received by others with the respect that is due to the office I 'have the honor to hold, but it will be impossible for me to share in 'this feeling. . . . Acting on such information as I 'have, I entertain no doubt as to what my answer should be. But 'the absence of doubt is probably due to the absence of evidence 'and cannot be taken as going far towards showing that the opinion 'is correct.'"

We have now seen that the appeal to the Judiciary has proved wholly illusory and the appeal to the Executive has resulted in the praise of their own moderation. But there is yet one more appeal to make, an appeal to the conscience and the reason of humanity, whether English or Indian, both official and non-official, in India as well as in England, and we confidently appeal to that tribunal to decide between us and Sir Reginald Craddock.

The Indian Moslems' Tasks.

V.

We have dealt at some length in our previous articles with the questions relating to the intellectual and moral advancement of the Mussalmans and the organised and sustained efforts they will have to make in order to preserve their communal individuality. It will have, we trust, been clearly realised that the organisation of Moslem education holds the supreme place among the tasks of the community. This is a truism to which every communal patriot would subscribe with loud emphasis. It is, however, truisms which are frequently misunderstood and usually neglected in practice. There has been so much talk about Moslem education since the late Sir Syed Ahmad sounded his note of alarm that the problem has grown almost insipid and lost its interest and seriousness in the popular mind. Even many of those who are presumed to know better seem to be indifferent as if they believed a problem of such singular character and range could be solved by the sheer expenditure of lung-power for a full generation. The prevalent temper of a Mussalman with some taste for communal work may be summed up in "I know all about it." And primed with a "knowledge" which generally consists of a miscellaneous assortment of stray impressions, borrowed half-truths and dim echoes from the inanities of a professional preacher droning to a bored audience, he dismisses the whole subject with a glib assurance. This all-knowing, self-complacent and facile type of education-monger is an unsuspected hindrance and a danger. He has damped public enthusiasm and lulled the Mussalmans into quietude by his cheap, cribbed and mumbled phrases about Moslem education. He talks of intellectual and moral and social progress because he must, since some one else has set the fashion. But he understands his subject no more than the people he sets about to advise. His views are medley of strange desires leavened with a kind of low, practical shrewdness. Fat berths in Government offices; wealthy Hindu banyas and merchants; reminiscences of his travels in a railway train; his mild encounters with men who fill the atmosphere with new cries; his occasional glimpses into the life of great officials, with their unapproachable dignity and neat, silent ways; his rapt wonder at the huge administrative machine running on noiseless wheels—all this alternately stirs and overwhelms him, and he is driven to seek refuge in pathetic harangues at communal gatherings. The dominance of this tawdry vision must cease if the Mussalmans desire to build up a truly strong, enlightened and virile community fit to play an effective part in the affairs of its country. Intellectual equipment selected for its cheapness at some public auction, as it were, would not do. Character and personality cannot be had ready-made. Communities can realise themselves only through their own efforts, by the energy of their own wills and with the help of their own inner light. The first great thing is to feel the stress of hope and aspiration. When the goal is clearly set before the eyes, and self-confidence does not fail, the movement ahead, even through errors and pit-falls, is assured. Education is simply the necessary training of will and intelligence, imposed by the conditions of the present, to meet the demands of the future.

It now remains to see what sort of destiny the Mussalmans of India have been idealising for themselves and whether their ideals about the future are not mere will-o'-the-wisps luring them on to a fruitless and weary quest. Some may even ask with pertinence whether the Mussalmans have reached that stage of culture and self-discipline which alone can bring about a unity of purpose and the evolution of ideals about the future. In modern Indian history there is no more pathetic chapter in some respects than the terrible dilemma of the Moslem position and the infinite travail, almost paralysis, of effort that has ensued in consequence. The advent of the British rule in India not only dispossessed a dynasty and a race of its political power, but also introduced social values and political standards which by their impact on an ancient polity led to chaos and conflict. The greatest sufferers were, of course, the Mussalmans—who with the loss of their political dominance were threatened with the loss of their culture as well. The revolutionary forces which the new order of things brought in its wake set to work to demolish the symbols associated with Moslem civilisation and power. The sense of utter loss, the swift impending change, the rapid onrush of ideas which implied a rebuke and a challenge to old social actions were infinitely galling to a proud and sensitive people. The Mussalmans looked on with sullen despair. Time has however, reconciled them to the inevitable, and they have learnt to estimate their situation stripped of the glamour of the past, in the clear light of day. They see that they are the subject race of an alien Power which has given India a firm, peaceful and progressive rule, and they also realise that they are on a complete equality of footing with the other races over whom they once held sway. To the Hindus the change did not mean any awkward shift—it meant simply a change of rulers. To the Mussalmans, however, it was a demoralising descent full of terrible mental and moral shocks. Indeed, it was a fearful fall on the horns of a dilemma, which still lies athwart the political situation of the community. As long as they were the masters of the country their numerical strength or weakness did not count. The change in their status from rulers to subjects, enjoying equal rights and sharing equal responsibilities with the Hindus, has thrown them into a serious embarrassment. Western education and democratic ideals fostered by British rule have taught them the supreme value of numbers. The lesson with its far-reaching implications has haunted the consciousness of the Mussalmans ever since the first generation of India's patriots began to visualise the future in terms of Western political experience. If representative institutions and government by majority were the goal of Indian aspiration, the Moslem minority might conceivably sink into eternal political bondage. The evolution of a common nationality united for secular ends and of a lofty type of patriotism was not an impossible dream. But as long as religion was the dominant force in the lives of the Indian communities and differences of creed, temperament and social outlook remained vital, Nationalism could not become the supreme motive of conduct and endeavour, nor would the minorities cease to have their fears and their doubts. Such were the natural thoughts of the Mussalmans as they first began to take stock of their political situation. Western education was in the meantime opening up to them new vistas of thought, and they soon began to feel the insult and perversity of having to live a life of repudiation, of veiled hostility to all that has fructified and ennobled human effort in history—the strivings after freedom, the noble rage of patriotism that sets itself to purge the lives of men of all that is vicious and mean in their condition and circumstance. This has been the dilemma of the Moslem position.

It is manifest, then, that the framing of a definite, compact and inspiring political creed has been for the Mussalmans a task of untold perplexity. Political thinking among them had been till recently starved, halting and jejune. The ideas embodied in the latest programming of the Moslem League signify not so much the discovery of a straight and sure path as the protest of educated, self-respecting Mussalmans against a life of eternal apology. They recognise that the aspirations which the Indian National Congress has made vocal are legitimate aspirations, and it would be an infamous thing if they lived to thwart them perpetually. What is more, they as men, feeling all the enthusiasm for progress that has sustained and moved men in history, share those aspirations themselves. They are still wanting in political nerve and assurance and this is solely because they find as yet no basis for free participation in the general political activities of the country without losing their communal individuality. Certain recent tendencies of the Hindu and the Moslem tempers have shown that such basis is not impossible to evolve, that, in fact, it may be evolved within a shorter space of time than most people have hitherto been prepared to allow. For this, however, unflagging efforts will have to be made, and the existing mass of prejudices and suspicions removed from the path by carefully educating public opinion in both the communities. This is an aspect of the subject with which we may deal later on. We are concerned for the present with the character of the political thinking that is going on in Moslem India and the sort of dreams that the Mussalmans are dreaming about their future.

Now, the simple fact is that the Mussalmans have so far done no political thinking worth the name and their dreams about the future are vague and fleeting. The dilemma to which we have referred has hitherto been the bane of their political existence. They are just now beginning to have a sort of confused suggestion of the possibilities that the dilemma can be solved. Much will have to be done before these possibilities emerge in feature and outline and light the way to solution. There are, however, certain fundamental facts in the Moslem situation which must be grasped in order to form a clear estimate of the needs of the Mussalmans and the character of the ideals that they may ultimately evolve. The first great thing to remember is that a Mussalman's religion is his most exacting loyalty. In all social and political endeavour he will seek the inspiration of his faith. A time may possibly come, when religion may lose its vitality and some other secular force take its place. The political problem in India would then shift to a different plane and the Hindu-Moslem question would cease to be. But as long as religion is a vital force in India, the one pervading atmosphere in which motive and purpose take their rise, a Mussalman can never forget that he is a Mussalman any more than a devout Hindu can become oblivious of his Hinduism. Wavering loyalty is the determining factor of political conduct, it is best to recognise that the preservation of its individuality would be to each community its most natural and jealous concern. Political co-operation among different communities can be secured only on the basis of such recognition. The Moslem's task in the political sphere to-day is to preserve his communal individuality as well as to participate on free and equal terms with others in the conduct of Indian affairs. The thought of his numerical inferiority and his lack of aptitude for self-assertive and pushful political tactics have often depressed him and turned him to seek consolation in golden visions of the past of Islam and impossible dreams about its future. We do not, of course, mean that the feeling of Islamic brotherhood, which renders the sympathies of a Mussalman co-extensive with his religion, is in any way to be deprecated. The effect produced in India by the wars in Tripoli and the Balkans has been a great revelation. Amid the travail of suffering and sorrow it has proved unmistakably that the heart of Islam is alive. The future of a community that has something worth living and dying for is not quite hopeless. And it has been equally made manifest that the only motive power that can be applied with effect to Moslem communities is religion. What we mean is that idle dreams achieve little, and the habit of untrained indulgence is a mere sentiment incapacitating a man for practical and fruitful effort. The Mussalmans of India must band every nerve to building up a glorious future in their own country. Their strength will contribute to the strength of Islam as a whole. Even in a democracy ultimate power does not reside merely in numbers. By dint of character and intelligence they can become an indispensable factor in guiding the fortunes of their country. A community of seventy millions, united, intelligent and virile, would be an effective power in any scheme of government that India may ultimately evolve. The future of the Mussalmans is in their own hands—to make or mar. They must accept the existing conditions and make the effort. They cannot leave India. They cannot drive the other communities out into the sea. They can not alter the broad political conditions as they exist to-day. They have to make the best of the situation and set to work to equip themselves anew intellectually and morally and meet the other communities on equal ground.

It is impossible to think of any other course that would not be an outrage to the best instincts of the community. The British rule in India has been a great blessing to the people in many ways. It is gradually and inevitably leading them on to the goal which would mark the consummation of its work and would be at once its justification and its crowning glory. The people of India are being educated and trained in various ways, and the day, however distant, would assuredly come when they will take the direction of their affairs in their own hands. The Mussalmans can delay, if they will, but cannot permanently stave off the glorious event. And if they choose to be perverse they would only stultify themselves. The ideal of a free, united, self-directing India is surely noble and capacious enough for both the Hindus and the Mussalmans to share. It is an ideal that needs many decades of toiling, devoted service before it comes to materialise. No secular enthusiasm, however, can be more fruitful and ennobling than the one devoted to this object. The Hindus and the Mussalmans can only thus rise to their full stature as men and communities. The fact, we are happy to note, is beginning to dawn on the intelligence of the Mussalmans. After the growth of modern education in the community this result was inevitable. Those narrow-minded English publicists and officials who detect in this awakening a change in the traditional Moslem attitude towards the British rule are either deliberately perverse or grievously mistaken. There has been no change in Moslem attitude, but there has been certainly a change of method. And this has been due to the lessons the Mussalmans have learnt from certain recent Government acts and measures. We have often discussed the trend and effect of the Government policy in these columns and need not refer to them again. We may simply say this that the Mussalmans regard the British rule, as they have ever regarded it before, a guarantee for their free development. They cannot, however, be blind to the direction to which all political forces are tending to-day. They have to look ahead and mark the path that lies before them. How they would fare with their fellow travellers on the way when they together set out on their journey is a different question which we propose to discuss in our next. But even a child can understand that all progress postulates law and order and at present law and order are synonymous with a strong but popular British rule.

The Council.

BY THE HON. MR. GUR.

"As large a charter as the wind to blow on whom I please."

—As You Like It.

You may not believe it now, but there was a time when the sky was clear, when the Indian sun shone with all its brilliance, when the grass and the trees were green, when men could enjoy a joke even at their own expense, and women's dress bills could increase in inverse ratio to the size and weight of their dresses without endangering Prestige. Then indeed the Hon. Mr. Gur could laugh and grow more and more unfit to be a jockey, a bantam boxing champion, or the cox of the Oxford Boat at Putney, or a number of other things that carry no weight in the world of affairs. But it was not a century or two ago as readers may well imagine. Antiquarians say it was not further off than 1911 when the world was young and gay, and although the previous quinquennium was noisy without being merry, it was fit on all sides that now that the purification of the lustrum had taken place in 1910, in future noise and mirth would go together. Before the year 1911 ended, however, clouds began to darken the horizon both on the east and on the west. The Indian sun began to lose its brilliance without losing any of its blasting heat. Jokes began to require, in India as they do in Scotland, "a deal o' care." But the making of jokes was itself becoming as difficult as the enjoyment thereof, for the unbroken colt that had till then never felt the touch of bit or snaffle now began to feel itself to be a jaded hack for which whip and spur were occasionally necessary.

This lasted for close upon a year when the cloud that was at first no bigger than a man's hand darkened the whole firmament, and a storm such as imperious LEAH had experienced began to make even far more robust people inclined to indulge in LEAH's rage. The joy of living was gone, and in its place came the passion for death. For a time a merry mask kept undisclosed the features of tragedy, just as hereditary wealth keeps up the pretence of affluence even when res angusta domi insist on their public recognition. Where genuine mirth lent colour to the jocund face before, now a mouthful of blood from the heart itself accompanied the forced laughter on each occasion and incarnadined the face. With more access of grief misery began to mock itself and the laughter grew dry as the heart became drained of blood. On the 5th of March, in the course of the Council Meeting the Hon. Mr. Gur stole away from the busy scene without good-bye or even au revoir. The world no doubt went on as before and Mr. Gur could well say with the poet:

غالب خستہ کی بغیر کون سی کام بند ہیں
روٹی زار زار کیا کیجی ہاں ہاں کہوں

(What is there that does not go on just as before without Ghalib?
Why shed copious tears and wherefore wail for him?)

But when misery had almost exhausted itself, another blow of affliction was struck, and this time it fell nearer the heart than before.

From mocking itself misery began to mock others, and the Hon. Mr. Gur appeared in a very strange guise indeed. From chronicling the amusing weaknesses of easy-going babbling legislators, he took to recording the distressing indications of the "strength" of grim and speechless (if not unspeakable) administrators. Mr. Gur disguised as a War Correspondent and couching his grey goose quill on a field of battle was indeed a strange sight. These were almost the signs of the end of the world, and in fact the Hon. Mr. Gur did say something about the Day of Judgment before he disappeared for the second time. Well, the heights of Simla saw him not in September, for he was making an aquarial search in the Silly Season for the Sea-Serpent and was hanging after the prodigious gooseberry in London.

To-day, still under the stimulus of the New Year's resolutions, the Hon. Mr. Gur resumes his seat among the gods that leisurely contemplate the dull debates and hesitating half-hearted conflicts of mere men below. Let FREE-LANCE hurl the javelin of his loyal buffoonery as before. Let the OORYA continue to make searching inquiries into the paternity of his Baby Province, and let BOOTLAIR SAHEB as usual refuse to be saddled with the cost of maintenance. Let KHUSH-HAL pipe, let SUREN roar and let MADRAS-CHUTNEY-PICKLE-ACHAK add piquancy to the cold roast beef of SANDOW III. The Hon. Mr. Gur is once more there to enjoy the fun and the frolic, and even if he is bearded like the pard, it is only to catch stray jokes as in a net, as stray ethereal waves bearing news are caught in the wireless apparatus. But Mr. Gur comes back a sadder though not a wiser man, for sadness comes but wisdom lingers, and the mirth will have to be noisier and more side-splitting than before if it is to quicken a more sluggish pulse.

Council met on the 6th January and thus commenced an unusually early session. The A. D. C. announced H. E. after whom ST. VINCENT stepped in from the same door. When H. E. had taken the chair an excellent XI of Additional Official Members came forward to take the oath of allegiance, being lead by two skippers instead of one, SAG-SABZI MACLAGAN, and ST. LUKE. PORTER seems to have imbibed so much of the spirit of self-government which is his own province that he has begun to fancy himself as a Tribune of the Plebs duly elected by popular suffrage and not a mere bureaucratic nominee. So when taking the oath of allegiance he read out that he was taking the oath as an elected Member.

When unquestioning allegiance had been duly sworn, questioning commenced and RAJA KHUSH-HAL led with half a dozen questions in his piping voice, compelling the SAGE, the UNDESIRABLE ALIEN, SANDOW III and the RAILWAY SLEEPER to reply. Now this questioning very cruel in the case of the RAILWAY SLEEPER for obvious reasons, but when once he is up he is not inclined to sit down before a quarter of an hour, for the questioner, like MACBETH, has killed sleep, and the RAILWAY SLEEPER may as well stand up and talk as sit down and not snore. But when at the end of the session he exchanges a lower sleeping berth in India with a higher sleeping berth in England, questioning Councillors will miss the giver of the most informing and exhaustive replies. Whosoever among the many constituents of RAJA KHUSH-HAL wanted for his consumption ghas, gur or pass, and wanted it carried by the Railways at a low rate, was consoled by the RAILWAY SLEEPER'S assurance that the Railways had not altered their maximum rates, and if they made any distinction between sugar and gur, the discrimination after all was only in favour of the imported article used by the rich. May it not also be that as gur is sweeter than sugar, it is only sweet reasonableness that prompts the levy of a higher rate for its carriage.

Among others SRI RAMJI asked "will the Government be pleased to state whether" etc., etc., and the RAILWAY SLEEPER all of a sudden became, like other occupiers of the Government Front Bench, noddy laconic in his reply, and said that "the answer to the Hon. Member's question is in the negative." So it seems that the Government will not be pleased to state whether etc., etc. That is what comes of imitating others, for the RAILWAY SLEEPER never in all his Council days had felt inclined to refuse to supply any information ever asked for. The moral of the story is, beware of imitations.

SRI SITAJI asked Government to state what had been done by Government to extend free elementary education among the poor and more backward classes, in reply to which BOOTLAIR SAHEB gave a summary of the answers of the Local Governments. The Dis-united Provinces had referred the matter to a Committee of all talents whose recommendations would be considered when new grants would be allotted. In the Baby Province compulsory payment of fees had been abolished and ninety per cent of the pupils in every school could still be turned out if they did not pay fees. Thus was illustrated the paradox of free compulsory education. SANDOW III's province was more business-like in its reply. No boy was refused education on account of poverty, which, as Euclid would have said, erat demonstrandum. So after this self-evident truth no steps appeared necessary in the way of further relaxation of fees. The Province of the late ROOST-KERPUL, or rather the late province of ROOST-KERPUL had abolished fees for the last two years, and this example was followed by private schools also. In beggarly Burma managers of lay schools could not dispense education and dispense with fees, while the monastic class could afford to do so. Hence Burma Government inclined to think it could dispense with free elementary education altogether.

CHERRY CHITNIS had noticed the laconic character of some official replies and resolved to be even with the officials. Reading out questions too long a process, so at request of SIR GUR—much missed by all the Councillors who rejoice at his membership of another Council—had requested Hon. Members only to refer to the question by its number on the list. Usual formula: "I beg to ask question number so and so put down against my name." But CHERRY CHITNIS impatient even of this, contented himself with the expurgated edition of this formula which he had himself devised, and simply said: "Question No. 15."

After the question a little legislation. In the course of this the ADMINISTRATIVE ORPHAN announced that a certain unnameable individual had not only been knighted but had also been made a Raja, and, as anticipated by a well-informed local official, had managed to slip into the Council. To prevent future action for libel, would the RAJA kindly announce that he is just the reverse of an unnameable miscreant so that there may be no mistake in the publication of his name as member of Select Committee.

WORTHY MEYER, most modest and peaceful member of Government, introduced and referred to a Select Committee a "modest" and "entirely non-controversial" piece of legislation.

But the chief business of the day was the educational debate opened by SURAN. His resolution, as he put it, was "an exceedingly simple one." It was "a mere request for information," an appeal to Government "to take the public into their confidence." Smooth, eloquent SURAN, yours is a sancta simplicitas indeed, and of course you don't mean to harm a child. You only seek for information for which your dear friend of the Curzonian Durbar had invented the Official Secrets Act. You only want to be made a PEEPING TOM and a PAUL PRY. "By Special Appointment" to BOOTLAIR SAHEB and the SHARP'UN, innocently suggesting that there are and there can be no secrets in matters educational. With conviction lighting up your face you deny the possibility of every teeny-weeny skeleton in the educational pigeon-holes and you subpoena the inventor of the Official Secrets Act as your witness. Far be it from you to introduce a resolution in the spirit of controversy or contention. It is only pardonable curiosity and the desire to vindicate the character of Government that you ask for a glimpse of the documents exchanged between the SHARP'UN and other innocent educationist that shun politics themselves as they wish Indian students and their Indian teachers to shun it. Far be it from you to try the sweet unction of flattery. You only state an undeniable fact that education and sanitation are the watch-words of the Government of India. But O sage from the land of the Rishis! why handicap the question of the recognition of schools in which All-India is interested with the deadweight of an unknown second rate College in a far off district in which only one in the Council shared your enthusiasm and he too sought salvation in flight to Mecca?

SURAN, disdaining halting prose, commenced the "Argument" in the following manner:—

Of Bengal's Disobedience in the days
Of wilful CURZON who brought all our woe,
With loss of Dacca till one greater man
Restored it—although Delhi too regained
Her blissful ancient Seat of Government—
'Tis not, O Muse, the time to sing. Of that Anon in Beadon Square. But of the Fruit
Of that Forbidden Tree whose deathless taste
Brought Life not Death, and an awaken'd impulse
Of Education as Bengal's reward,
Sing Heavenly Muse that on the secret tops
Of Simla and Darjeeling dost inspire
A thousand fears and dismal apprehensions.
Show then the vastness of our Mymensingh—
A single District measuring in square miles
Six thousand and three hundred thirty two;
Or of its teeming millions sing, O Muse,—
Four and a half they number—and compare
Our single Mymensingh with all their England
In the not distant days of CHARLES the First,
Which it doth equal. Or if earlier days
Delight thee more, say that it doth contain Twice ten times puny England's population
When it was ruled by EDWARD the CONFESSOR,
Or fifty times what tiny England had
When conquering HENRY and proud Horsa came.
If even this doth fail to satisfy
The Indian Nation's fast expanding Ego,
Work out the flattering ratio of our millions
To England in the days of Noah's Dreadnought;
Or, earlier still, when grandma Eve prepared
For grandpa Adam her first apple-pie.
In ancient census figures I delight;
They point all morals and adorn all tales.
I seek their aid for my advent'rous speech
That with no middle flight intends to soar
Above Parnassian heights, while it pursues
Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme.
And chiefly thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer
Before all Temples those of Western Learning,
That are forsooth our holiest shrines of worship,
Instruct me, what in me is well-proportion'd
Exaggerate, what's low, make tenfold loud
That to the height of this great argument
I may assert the democratic creed,
And justify the ways of men to gods.

After rapid excursions into the Gazetteer giving the area and population of Mymensingh—thus proving it to be ripe for partition—and thence into the biography of the late MR. ANANDA MOHAN GHOSH, and the history of the ANANDA MOHAN College, SURAN waxed eloquent over things which were moving fast, very fast indeed as fast as five motor cars, as an Irishman would say under the impetus of world-wide forces of irresistible potency and the inspiration of progressive ideals, created by education and fostered (ahem!) by a wise and beneficent Government. Without fear of challenge or contradiction talked of Hindu and Moslem Universities Movements, with roots in the awakened educational enthusiasm, evoked by Royal Visit. Finally, came to Mymensingh ablaze with such enthusiasm that even SURAN had to swear his complete innocence of the charge of the slightest exaggeration of language. Story of the Mymensingh Hundred signing legal document within a few hours and guaranteeing for a lakh appeared like subscription of a foreign loan a hundred times over immediately on being brought into market. But wonder it wonders, Government was responsive and Government was sympathetic, and not one but two Directors favoured the raising of the College. An ideal world indeed! and without a grievance to fill the columns of national newspapers when, lo, a shadow is thrown over it all, and like wells and tanks and rivers dried by the sun and filled in an instant by a Monsoon downpour, the newspapers are filled with "copy" by the smart showers, or rather Sharp'UNS, according to the latest idiom from Simla. The Senate had made the recommendation, the University Inspectors had supported it and the Government of Bengal was in sympathy with it, but alas and alack the Government of India declined to grant the affiliation. And this tale of woe, SURAN launched into some comparisons with the express stipulation that he would now speak without chapter or verse, and if possible without the book itself. Wanted to know the reason of "this differential treatment" between a Government College and a private institutions and obtained, admittedly with some warmth of feeling (quite tepid for SURAN) on behalf of private institutions, with one of which he had been connected for as many years as BOOTLAIR SAHEB and the SHARP'UN, had been connected with the Government, that they were entitled to sympathetic consideration. Finally, closed his part of his speech with throwing on the Council proposition a severe light and hope." The ANANDA MOHAN College would have its B. A. class opened in six months—which was not so long to wait after all, unless, of course, it was necessary to weaken the rest of the resolution.

After this SUREN came to the School Final Examination, and by showing that another examination had not proved a success, conclusively and overwhelmingly proved that the School Final was doomed, foredoomed to failure. Only in the last sentence did the Council grasp the significance of this part of the Resolution, for SUREN confessed he viewed with grave alarm and misgivings the operation and growth of a system which must encroach upon the ground covered by the University and eventually seriously restrict it. This introduced the third and most tragic Act in this drama when SUREN, the victor-victim of Barisal, fought a pitched battle with the SHARP 'UN and the I. C. S. over a measure which, if it had been adopted in the reign of ill-fated FULLER, would have saved him both the virtue and the necessity of resignation, and "I. C. S." the exhibition of discipline in the columns of the Pi dog. Having the sympathy of the entire Council with him, SUREN's oleaginuous eloquence rushed over oiled castors. He escorted into the Council the Nestor of Bengal Zamindars, who never hesitated to besiege any Troy and came as the representative of the past to join hands with representatives of the present most probably to save the character of the representatives of the future, though SUREN did not say anything about the future.

As the HON. MR. GUR said last year also when the MILD HINDU's resolution asking for papers on free and compulsory primary education was discussed, and SUREN spoke of these matters, wonder whether any Bengali orator or journalist could perform the miracle of discussing education without building the "Temple of Learning." SUREN tried and failed ignominiously. Shrines, worship and temples were all there in the speech of the Idol of Bengali students. Quoted with great effect the appreciation of the Bengal Government, on the Calcutta University Senate's recognition of schools, from the Bengal Administration Report—for writing which the too intelligent Under-Secretary was probably being sent to the most malarial District just when his furlough was due. Having argued that there was no case for transferring the power from the University to the Local Government, SUREN shrewdly entered the realm of "between-the-lines." "I cannot disguise from myself the conviction that behind all this is the old plea of efficiency." The Senate, said he, deliberates in public and decides in public, and even though it is mainly official, decides with the aid of popular representatives. But the Education Department of Local Governments would deliberate behind the purdah and decide in the zenana without outside assistance. What guarantee then that its decisions would always be guided by educational considerations? Then followed a syllogism.

Government is unquestionably a political organisation.

Therefore, its educational decisions will be dictated by the police.

One of the premisses was missing and the fallacies of Four Terms, Undistributed Middle and Illicit Process of the Middle Term were all there. But whether rules of Logic supported the syllogism or not, all realized that the conclusion was not so very wrong.

After showing that in Bengal the piper was paid by the people, SUREN insisted on calling for the tune and appealed for a policy of trust, as if assuring that the tune that will be called for would be "Rule Britannia" and not "Bande Mataram." Just as he was launching into a praise of "our local institutions, our local environments, our local traditions," ST. VINCENT, the Prompter, walked up to the Throne with the shears of Atropos to cut short SUREN's thread of eloquence. H. E. with characteristic courtesy asked the Hon. Member to conclude. SUREN pleaded for two more minutes, but H. E. informed him that he had had more than the regulation forty minutes and must conclude at once. This exceedingly cruel on SUREN who had an elaborate peroration to declaim. But SUREN as resourceful as he is eloquent, and saying "I will, My Lord," went on as gaily as ever. "We of the East abhor great and sudden changes whether in education or Government (No revolutionary need apply) with all the warmth of our Oriental natures," including presumably a sudden change from speech into silence as H. E. had vainly desired. After praising H. E. and Government for another minute or two, closed his stately oration with an appeal to be permitted to walk in the old ways, where their steps had been so sure, so safe and so steady, and where on the whole the results achieved had been so triumphantly successful. The C. I. D. man whose steps had also been so sure, so safe and so stealthy now laid a heavy hand on his shoulders and asked in tragic accents: Quo Vadis? Whither, O SUREN, whither?

Hardly had SUREN sat down when up rose the non-official Member of the Government of India and the official representative of the Government of the Punjab. Who else could it be but the gallant FREE-LANCE, in voluminous trousers and white turban sitting behind his Despatch Box like any other Member of the Government. Many are the conjectures about the contents of this box, but none save one appear to be correct. Some think that it contains sealed samples of the food served to the chargers of the gallant Tiwana Lancers, while others suspect that it contains a bijou canteen for the Regiment's honorary officers. But the C. I. D. has reason to believe that if the box doesn't contain a couple of miniature revolutions originally made for a South African Republic, it contains—bombs. One of these days a raid is certain to take place, but until then FREE-LANCE can go on dropping explosives of another kind in every debate to the serious risk of the sides of Hon. Members being split with uncontrollable laughter. FREE-LANCE, a true Oriental in his politics as in his social life, would have all correspondence intended for the exclusive monopolistic use of officials remain in strict purdah, whereas he thinks it essential that correspondence set apart from its inception for public use should parade its charms from the balukhanas. Wonder why he doesn't wish to dedicate even these murtis to the gods. Publication of the former class of correspondence, with its characteristic abandon, its oft-recurring allusions to the equally outspoken sentiments of the addressee, and its under-current of secret and unrestrained intimacy as indecent and scandalous as the publication of the documentary records of an interesting Bench of the British Judges in the form of "A Lover's Letter-Writer." How shocking the mere mention in public of the language used by "Popsy-Wopsy" in replying to the importunities of "Dicky Darling." Why, "the majority of those who indulge in commenting upon such publications, and who have unfortunately not very many vocations to pursue in life (Lucky beggars! Wish we had half their 'misfortune') fall short of understanding it in the proper sense, and some of them, if they do so, may distort the meaning in a way which may suit their own purposes," suggesting an "improper sense," not at all suiting the very proper purposes of the co-respond—(PROOF READER: Is the spelling all right, Sir? EDITOR: No, I am afraid it is not, unless the reader is Scotch, Irish or American. You better offer them another 'r' or they would take possession of the entire printing press.)—correspondents. "Thus there lies a great danger which may involve grave issues" (PROOF READER: Shall I drop an 's' Sir, to distinguish it from 'issues' requiring an early grave? EDITOR: You are too far-fetched, my man, and hope you won't give me notice to join the Punjab Secretariat where I hear they give a handsome Commission to their clerks and translators on each day's 'bag.') By so doing there are chances of giving a field to hot-blooded youngsters, and an opportunity to a section of publishers whose sole ambition is concentrated on making capital out of the sale proceeds of their publications finding a ready market at such times and who may welcome the opportunity to rouse the passions of innocent people by such stirring publications."

This was indeed a sustained argument; but FREE-LANCE has to maintain his reputation even more than he has to sustain an argument, and in these days of keen competition in the Punjab for a tiny enough seat, it would never do to be the first to oppose only the resolution that has been moved. He must anticipate the next move also. Who could venture to talk of relevancy if a resolution for the publication of papers reminded FREE-LANCE of other papers too that should not be published? "I have heard," said the FREE-LANCE "that resolutions are being passed by certain organisations to persuade the Government to soften the Press Act for the benefit of the above-mentioned classes which, I hope, the Government would not listen to." Bravo, FREE-LANCE, kill two birds with the single stone of disinterested loyalty, and always ask Government to imitate NELSON with a variation, by turning a deaf ear to the people's petitions.

MAHARAJA MIR KASIM argued convincingly that where a School Final is a passport to service it should be held, but when thousands pass the Matriculation every year it should be the or examination and should be a passport to service. If you don't understand the logic of this ask anybody in Bengal. They will understand it anywhere else.

SRI SIRAJI was unusually eloquent, but as usual inaudibly-throttled the beautiful speech with which he had equipped himself. Indulging, as he said, in no language of flattery or vain compliment characterised the blessing of English education as one of the blessings of British rule, and forgetting the association of processions with torchlight and of students with processions, likened English education to a torch. Little do you know, SRI SIRAJI, what a cult believed to be by some of the blessed educationists, and how it is sometimes mistaken for a fire-brand! You may go back ages and rishtis of your ancient land, but approach not the state of the modern world. Indulge as much as you can in high-things so long as you do not think of the heights of Simla and so your living continues to be plain. "Man lives more in the present than in the past," but take care that he does not deserve to the near future by cutting himself too much from the past "whereas in ancient India knowledge and learning was confined few," it is plain that the only policy in consonance with the age the East is to confine it to fewer still.

The SECOND PANDIT must have gladdened the heart of by declaring that probably it is only a question of delay affiliation of the ANANDA MOHAN College "for a year or two, SUREN had condemned Government for delaying it only for six." But he must have gladdened the heart of the SHARP 'UN at by referring—quite unconcernedly, of course,—to the entertained by some people, presumably living in Mars or Ne Saturn, in short anywhere but in India and in that Chamber, that "Government had been trying to check the secondary education and placing difficulties in its way." He complimented the Secretariat officials on their industry by expressing the fear that even applications for affiliation may be treated "as one of the numerous papers that come up for disposal and are disposed of one way or other under pressure of work."

The one and only original PANDIT followed his alter ego and paid a compliment to the faith of Bengal in the good intentions of Government. He suggested the policy of hastening slowly with the School Final so that "after the lapse of some little time even in Bengal the misgivings and the suspicions entertained against this examination will probably pass away." As regards the transfer of the powers of recognition from Universities to Local Governments, the PANDIT, with transparent sincerity, announced that he was certain "there is nothing that the Government have to conceal on this point", and yet his suspicions got the better of his faith, and he somewhat unexpectedly supported the demand for papers.

BOOTLAIR SAHAB now rose to reply. In the Moghal days every battle commenced with the play of artillery on both sides from a safe distance which never did, nor meant to do, any harm to any individual. BOOTLAIR SAHAB imitates these battle tactics to perfection. Every reply of BOOTLAIR SAHAB commences with a play of the artillery of compliments which never do, nor mean to do, any harm to any individual. After that follows the real business of the day and it is pretty terrible business. Last year these tactics were tried on the MILD HINDU who has himself become a past master in the art of showering harmless compliments characteristic of Moderation. This year, in the sad absence of MILD HINDU which robbed Council of its greatest ornament, the artillery duel was indulged in between BOOTLAIR SAHAB and dear SUREN. "Although his words were rather strong and fulminant, (SHARP'UN, do ask the Boy AT THE WHEEL whether such a mixture of nitre, sulphur and potash comes under the Explosives Act.) I gladly recognise (ahem!) the moderate tone of his speech and his desire to (violent cough!!) help. SUREN had been unnecessarily alarmed. Of course, all due to a misunderstanding, don't you know. Government desire whole-heartedly to take people into confidence. They have no secrets in education. How could you think of such a dreadful thing with me and the SHARP'UN—Yes, specially the SHARP'UN—in the Education Department? Never dreamt of such a thing as substituting mistrust for trust. In fact, I make it a point to avoid anything in the nature of a miss. And pardon me if I take cover—as we sometimes have to do—behind H. E. whom some awful fellow in Bombay was sending back to England next February with a view to substitute the Flaming Sword of the Empire. Surely it was inconceivable to associate mistrust with the Viceroyalty of H. E. Hoping that non-official gentlemen now sufficiently hoist with their own petard, let me proceed to the real business of the day. Of course, as in business—or love—rules, customs, conventions and etiquette must be observed. Those who co-res—(No, you must stick to the 'double r' at least throughout this speech—error)—correspond with Government must feel that they can respond freely and frankly without fear of publicity except in vital cases—to be arranged after full consultation with all concerned, including third parties, known in Roman Law as extraneis and in ula society as the plural of tertium quid."

Having thus made the necessary pronouncement, BOOTLAIR SAHAB a dear SUREN a nasty knock-out blow about differential treatment between private and Government Colleges, showing that while the Mysingh College relied on unperformed promises, the Rajshahi College either fulfilled the conditions or they were in train. A passing sneer he enthusiasm that was claimed to be ablaze and a little skipping discomfiture of the authorities in the BRAJA MOHAN College brought this part of the reply to an end.

He commenced a long-drawn exegesis on the School Final more hectic of droning pedagogy than of the brilliance of BOOTLAIR SAHAB. "Wonder why Council was not asked to take it as read, or to have in the 'very able and exhaustive' Quinquennial Review" by the SHARP'UN—even though he himself says it as in this exhausting dissertation, no one in the Council had energy to listen with critical ears the hurried and desultory for proposing transfer of recognition of schools from the titles to Local Governments. Conveniently forgetting—as single official fails to forget, or fails to remember when y—the fallacy pointed out by Lord Morley, that "whatever for Canada is good for India," and that "because a in Canada at certain times of the year is a truly comfortable therefore a furcoat in the Deccan is just the very garment would be delighted to wear," BOOTLAIR SAHAB declared very modern system of educational organisation is based on and growing measure of State control", and that "the education is a duty which the State owes to the parents rising generation." O, BOOTLAIR SAHAB, can you say that rol means the same thing in the half-naked Deccan that far-coated Canada? What respect does the State pay to wishes and what co-operation does it promise to the nation? Nay, what knows it of the thoughts that pass in the minds of the Indian parents and the dreams that the rising generation dreams?

After laying down a number of questions to be settled by Government which could not be controverted, BOOTLAIR SAHAB skipped over the all important question, whether these questions were to be judged according to the standard of the State or the standard of the parents and the rising generation, excusing himself on the ground that he did not wish "to introduce any unnecessary element of controversy into his remarks." Forgetting that he had already enunciated quite a number of questions to be settled in connection with schools, attempted to show that the Universities had no adequate machinery for ascertaining the condition of schools, as if that was all that needed enquiry. Still the main question was there and could not be avoided. Why a change of policy? So rushed through three or four "complete answers", such as, firstly, the new teaching Universities and, secondly—the new teaching Universities! But dear BOOTLAIR SAHAB, was not at least one teaching University to be made acceptable to an importunate community by permitting it to recognise schools, on the condition that it did not clamour for the affiliation of outside Colleges, and now, does it "seem necessary to set free" even that teaching University "from the burden of work in connection with schools in order to give it time for its more appropriate work"?

SUREN had talked of the piper and the tune argument glibly enough but had forgotten that BOOTLAIR SAHAB was judiciously distributing his largesse among private schools also, in order to call for the tune that he liked best. SUREN had boasted that out of 619 schools in Bengal only 63 were Government schools. BOOTLAIR SAHAB reminded SUREN that out of 929 private schools only 844 were the pipers that had not been paid for by BOOTLAIR SAHAB and, being anxious to call for the tune, "the Government of India have expressed their desire that grant-in-aid should be made more liberal and elastic." Who talks now of stopping the grant of the new Pied Piper of Alig—no, Hamelin, that wants to play the tune of his own community, of course, in order to compass the destruction of its entire rising generation?

In conclusion BOOTLAIR SAHAB wondered whether people realized the enormous changes that were coming and the necessity for recasting their ideas. "What may have sufficed hitherto will not suffice much longer now. What seems an impossible reform now will perhaps be out of date ten or fifteen years hence. Things are moving very fast in the educational world and if India wants to hold her place, we must move in sympathy with them." True, quite true, and the Hon. Mr. GUR echoes the sentiments of BOOTLAIR SAHAB and hopes that everybody would realize the enormous changes that are coming and the necessity for recasting his ideas. How very true that what may have sufficed hitherto will not suffice much longer now, and that the impossible reforms of to-day will be the anachronisms of tomorrow. Things are moving very fast in the educated world of India, and if anybody wants to hold his place, he must move in sympathy with them. Like BOOTLAIR SAHAB, Mr. GUR is an optimist about Indian education, and when he too looks at the results already achieved with the materials at the disposal of India, and reflects on the possibilities as well as the difficulties of the future, he rests in hope. Only he asks Government to believe in the honesty and good intent of India, as Government would have India believe in the honesty and good intent of Government. They are straining every nerve to make Government more responsive to the desires of the people and needs of the time, as BOOTLAIR SAHAB is straining every nerve to make education more responsive to the needs of the people and the time, and both count—and confidently count—on the assistance of each other "in the great work before us all."

SUREN responded in the duel of the artillery of compliments with more compliments about "the tone, the temper and the spirit" of BOOTLAIR SAHAB's speech, and while recognising "the spirit of friendliness and sympathy with which the whole of that speech is charged", dear SUREN saw the Vision of India as it should be. He saw BOOTLAIR SAHAB as the Minister of Education, sitting on the Government Front Bench, and himself, as the Leader of the Opposition, seated on the Front Bench opposite. It was a debate on a motion for publication of papers involving want of confidence in Government, and SUREN felt certain that after the division he would cross with his followers to the other side and leave BOOTLAIR SAHAB to plough the arid sands of Opposition. To be the Prime Minister of India, to be able to control a fifth of God's creatures and to settle their destinies with his "Aye" and "Nay," was indeed a noble ambition. Who, then, can quarrel with dear SUREN for saying to BOOTLAIR SAHAB, "We reciprocate that sentiment on this side of the House?"

This was the one great thing achieved, and the rest was jejune, flat and unprofitable. After demanding greater deference to "the public opinion of the educated community who are the architects of the Government best able to instruct and enlighten Government," SUREN resumed his seat, still "on this side of the House," and through MADRAS-CRUTCHY-PICKLE-AGGAR clearly indicated that on a third part of the Resolution SUREN could hope to secure a dozen votes against four dozen votes of the Government, the much depressed Leader of the Opposition could not muster enough self-confidence to throw down to BOOTLAIR SAHAB the gage of a division. His modesty is his strength.

Enver Bey Appointed War Minister.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Constantinople, Jan. 4.

The appointment of Enver Bey to be Minister of War and his promotion to the rank of Brigadier-General, which carries with it the title of Pasha, have naturally aroused considerable interest and are susceptible of a variety of explanations. It had been expected that Djemal Bey, who has also been promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General with the title of Pasha, would succeed Izzet Pasha. There is a tendency to connect Enver Pasha's appointment with the commencement of work on the part of the German Military Mission under Liman Pasha, on the ground that Enver Pasha, as former military attache in Berlin, would naturally be persona grata to the German officers and more capable of rendering them assistance than perhaps any other Ottoman officer.

On the other hand, it is suggested that the appointment of Enver Pasha is a perfectly natural step in the political evolution of Turkey since the definite triumph of the Committee. What, it is asked, could be more normal than the appointment to the highest office but one that is open to a Turkish soldier of one of the most conspicuous figures of the new regime. The truth probably is that, while the influence of the Triple Alliance may have had some weight with the Government so far as the choice of persons is concerned, the appointment of one of the principal Committee officers was inevitable when once it had been decided to make a change at the Ministry of War.

Constantinople, Jan. 7.

Enver Pasha has not waited long before showing his hand. An Imperial fradeh issued last night permits him to place on the retired list 280 officers above the rank of Major, among whom are Hadi Pasha, a former Chief of the General Staff, and Hurshid Pasha, a former Minister of Marine, and Commander, during the recent war, of the 10th Army Corps. "Make way for the young," is clearly going to be the motto of the new Minister for War, who has agreed to submit all War Office accounts to the inspection of the civilian employees of the Ministry of Finance. Many Members of the Committee of Union and Progress anticipate, perhaps optimistically, that this concession will save Turkey between £22,500,000 and £28,000,000 per annum.

I learn from a well-informed source to-day that Enver Pasha proposes, for the present at any rate, to combine the functions of Chief of the General Staff with those of Minister for War, though it is difficult to understand how any one officer, however energetic can undertake two such difficult and different tasks without the assistance of an active Turkish or foreign adlatus. The mystery, perhaps, is explained by the news which has reached me from the same source that Damad Ismail Hafiz Hakki Bey, a Colonel on the General Staff and formerly Military Attache in Vienna, has been appointed Vice-Chief of the General Staff. Colonel Hafiz Hakki Bey is an energetic and active officer and a keen supporter of the Committee of Union and Progress.

Constantinople, Jan. 8.

An Imperial fradeh has been issued sanctioning the appointments of the Inspectors-General of the four Armies and the Commanders of the 18 Army Corps into which the Ottoman Army is to be divided henceforward. The following are the names of the Inspectors-General:—Marshal Tatar Osman Pasha in Constantinople, General of Division Zeki Pasha at Adrianople, Brigadier-General Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha, till yesterday Ambassador in Berlin, at Erjindjan, and Brigadier-General Djavid Pasha in Mesopotamia.

Among the appointments of the Army Corps Commanders I may mention those of Liman von Sanders Pasha to the 1st Army Corps, Hassan Izzet Pasha to the 2nd Army Corps, Essad Pasha, the hero of the siege of Yanina, Hertev Pasha, Fakhri Pasha, and Ali-Riza Pasha are appointed to the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th Army Corps respectively.

Another Imperial fradeh, authorizing the placing on the retired list of over 100 superior officers in the Army, has also been issued. Among those who are affected by this measure may be mentioned, in addition to Hadi Pasha and Hurshid Pasha, Ghazi Shukir Pasha, the defender of Adrianople; Torgud Shevket Pasha and Ahmed Abuk Pasha, both of whom served with credit in the recent campaign; Abdullah Pasha; Ahmed Feuzi Pasha, the aged conqueror of the Yemen; Yaver Pasha, who was made prisoner by the Bulgarians at Feredjik; Hussein Husni Pasha, and, finally, Hassan Tabein Pasha, who surrendered Salonika to the Greeks. Four Commanders of Army Corps and some 25 Commanders of Minan or Redif divisions figure on this list.

Of the new appointments, that of Mahmud Mukhtar Pasha has aroused considerable interest, for very obvious reasons. Even greater interest is likely to be excited by the statement, published in the Tanin this morning, that Enver Pasha will be appointed Chief of the General Staff, assisted by two vice-chiefs, the first of whom will be a German officer, not as yet definitely selected, while the second, as has been already stated, is Colonel Damad Ismail Hafiz Hakki Bey, who, I may add, is connected with the Imperial Family by his marriage with the daughter of Prince Salah-ed-Din Effendi, the only son of the deceased Sultan Murad V., who was deposed in August, 1876, and died in 1904.

Russia and Azerbaijan.

(BY A TABRIZ CORRESPONDENT OF THE "NEAR EAST".)

Is this still a Persian province? It is hard to think so—

(1) With 25,000 to 35,000 Russian troops* in Azerbaijan, occupying the most important towns—Tabriz, Ardebil, Maku, Khoy, Urmu, Suj Bulak, Dilman (Salmast), Sirab, Maragha, Binab, etc.

(2) With Shuja-ed-Dowleh as Governor-General, appointed by the Russians.

(3) With Governor-General Shuja-ed-Dowleh's palace and person protected by Russian troops every night.

(4) With all the Governors appointed by Shuja-ed-Dowleh being appointed only after their names, character, and inclinations, past personal history and present personal likes and dislikes have been submitted to the Russian Consul-General for his consent and approval, and vice-versa.

(5) With all the candidates for Governorships presented by Shuja-ed-Dowleh being considered by the Russian Consul-General as good Russophiles.

(6) With a Russian Consul, Vice-Consul, Consular Agent, or even a Tajir-Bashi in every town and city, nominally "to protect the interests of Russians and Russian subjects," but in reality to "advise" the Governor—or, in plain language, to tell the Governor what to do and how to behave towards the Russians and Russian demands.

All these things are not at all surprising considering the fact, the indisputable fact, that Governor-General Haji Shuja-ed-Dowleh receives his instructions for the following day's work every night* from M. Vedinsky, the dragoman of the Russian Consulate-General, by telephone. He dare not move a step without informing M. Vedinsky; and in order to spend a few of the hot summer days at his summer palace, at Namatabad, this Persian Governor-General had to ask the consent of the Russian dragoman before leaving the town!

Now, where is the intelligent man who has any knowledge of the Near East who would, or could, state positively that this unfortunate province of ours is a part of the Persian Kingdom? Sultan Ahmed Shah, the young Shah-in-Shah of Iran, had lost Azerbaijan soon after his accession to the Peacock Throne of Nadir Shah. Of this fact I was informed by a friend, who said to me: "At the time that Mohammed Ali Shah arrived in Gumeshtepa I was in Ardebil. A month before Mohammed Ali reached Persia, before there was any talk or rumour of his coming, I received a letter from an officer in Urmu, who wrote to me: 'Ashes upon our heads! We have lost Azerbaijan. Mohammed Ali Mirza is again returning to Persia, and he has given this province to the Russians as the price of his liberty to regain his lost throne.'"

That is plain enough, is it not? The Russians are, and often have been, criticised for acting as if they were "at home" here. The letter just quoted throws a bright light upon their actions; and according to their own lights, it might be argued that they have a good right to act as they do act, and have been acting, for some time past.

A Persian who was employed by the Russian in their commissariat department related the following incident recently—"I went to the bazars to buy some cartridges for my Browning seven-shooter. The shopkeeper asked me five tomans for fifty cartridges. I offered four. He refused my offer. After much bargaining I consented to pay him the full price he had asked, five tomans; but the man then refused point blank to let me have them. 'I do not care to sell them,' he said. 'Do you mean that you will not sell them at all, or that you do not care to sell them to me?' I asked. The shopkeeper replied: 'I do not care to sell them to you?' Then I was furious. With the butt end of my Browning I struck the man on the head, forehead, nose—anywhere that the blows happened to fall. I left for the barracks, but before going I took the fifty cartridges I needed and left five tomans in the shop—for the shopkeeper, sore and bleeding, had already left his shop to complain to Shuja-ed-Dowleh. An hour afterwards two ferrashes of Shuja-ed-Dowleh came to arrest me."

I must here say that this man, with his Russian military cap, and long boots, was trying to pass himself off for a Russian, though he was a Persian subject. He continued: "I told the ferrashes: 'If Shuja-ed-Dowleh wants me, he must ask the Russian commander for me, for I am a Russian subject, and neither you nor your chief could arrest me.' Thereupon the ferrashes apologised for 'not knowing' that I am a Russian subject, and left me, after bowing profoundly. Two hours later a telephone message called me to the Russian Consulate-General, and, of course, I knew at once that Shuja-ed-Dowleh had informed the Consul-General of the incident. I went, and the Consul, meeting me on the verandah, said: 'What has happened to you to-day in the bazaar?' I told him the whole story. Then he, serene and quiet, said to me: 'I do not say that you have behaved badly in the circumstances, but here in Tabriz we are treating the natives rather delicately. You had better be careful hereafter. And that was the only scolding or punishment I got for beating the shopkeeper.'

* The Russian troops in the province are usually believed to number about 17,500.—[Ed.]

Outside Tabriz, the Russian subjects, encouraged and protected by their Consular officers, do pretty well as they please. Selling land to foreigners is forbidden; but Russian subjects buy all the land they want—and more! They lend money to Persians, who mortgage their land, vineyards, water-mills, villages, etc. and in case of inability to repay the loan the mortgaged property is appropriated. A Russian subject—a mere subject, not a Consular official—has taken under his protection thirty-five or forty Kurdish villages near and around Suj Bulak. Each of these villages will yield annually from 2,000 to 40,000 tomans. One village near Suj Bulak yields grain alone worth 3,000 tomans annually. Another produces rice worth 10,000 tomans, to say nothing of its grain, barley, hay, straw, monetary taxes, fines, etc. And the Russian subjects who "hire," "rent," or "protect" these native villages profit to the tune of thousands of tomans every year. The citizen of no other nation could do likewise in this province, however. He is not given the chance!

The Near East for October 3 has just come to hand, and I and a number of my friends have been surprised to read the following lines in your "Notes of the Week" about this province (p. 622, col. ii.):—

"As it is the avowed intention of the British and Russian Governments to maintain the integrity of Persia and to confirm the authority of the Persian Government, it would seem necessary to inquire from what quarter Shuja-ed-Dowleh derives his inspiration for his separatist policy."

We—I and my friends—had always thought that if any man understood the politics and diplomacy of the Near East that man was the Editor of the Near East. Now it almost seems either that we have been mistaken in our opinion or else that the Editor is hiding his knowledge and feigning ignorance concerning the quarter whence "Shuja-ed-Dowleh derives his inspiration for his separatist policy." But fortunately the Editor answers his own inquiry, in the first part of the same Note, when he says:—

"Straws, which are supposed to indicate the direction in which the political wind is blowing, are very prominent at the present time in the Persian province of Azerbaijan."

Treasury officials of Persian nationality are arrested by Shuja-ed-Dowleh, and "the Governor-General's action would seem to have met with Russian approval, inasmuch as no step were taken to remonstrate with him or to protect the Treasury officers." Again: "Shuja-ed-Dowleh now appears to have decided that elections for the Majlis would be undesirable for Azerbaijan. . . . An agitation has been set on foot against the summoning of the Majlis. . . . If the elections were suppressed in Azerbaijan, the position of the province would be tantamount to one of independence of the Central Government." All these things and all those which I mentioned earlier are "straws" which indicate in what direction the "political wind is blowing" across this unhappy country, and from what quarter the Governor-General, Shuja-ed-Dowleh, "derives his inspiration"—be it separatist, independent, or vassalist.

After all, we have not been mistaken in our opinion of the Editor's knowledge of Near Eastern winds and the quarter whence they blow!

MIRZA FIROOZ KHAN.

A French View.

Odesa, January 4.

A Frenchman just arrived here from Tabriz, where he has commercial interests, to-day said to me that he frankly did not believe the recent official announcement that Russia was about to withdraw certain of her troops in Azerbaijan to the Caucasus. It was, he said, a stereotyped and empty official intimation to which they in Tabriz had become accustomed during the last three years. The reason for the partial withdrawal given in this latest announcement was that the Persian Cossack force in the capital of Azerbaijan is to be increased by 600 or 800 men, commanded, of course, by Russian officers. But even supposing said my informant, that these additional Persian Cossacks were to relieve the same number of Russian troops in Tabriz, permitting their withdrawal to the Caucasus, that would not essentially or appreciably deplete the Russian garrisons in Northern Persia, which, all arms included, number 17,400 men. Such periodical announcements of the pending withdrawal of Russian troops, further remarked my informant, were intended, not for the Russian but for the British Press; they make agreeable reading for Englishmen who, with all their admiration for the astute diplomacy of their Foreign Minister, are by no means quite content with the role of "second fiddle" which England plays to Russia in Persia. To-day Northern Persia is de facto a Russian province. As my French informant added, Russia in Azerbaijan has adopted the motto of Macmahon at the Malakoff, but in a more literal sense J'y suis, j'y reste!"

1914—The Sword of Peace.

In the course of an article in the Nineteenth Century and after, Major-General Sir William G. Knox, K. C. B., writes:—

1914! What a blood-red track of war has the twentieth century so far painted upon history—and does the colour promise to be fainter in the year before us? We may doubt it with reason, for the march of our so-called Civilisation has in the past Christian year of 1913 increased the already existing military burden placed upon the white man's shoulders on the Continent of Europe; the penalty due to race hatred, greed, and envy, signs of a veritable slump in Christianity. Never in history has the cradle of civilisation offered such a picture of instability, distrust, rivalry, and rancour. Not a stone has yet been quarried for the foundation of a real Temple of Peace. The world awaits with trepidation the great expenditure of blood and gold which alone will terminate the never-ending threats and rumours of war, the commercial conflicts, the political complications that periodically befog the atmosphere. Armies and fleets redoubled in numbers and efficiency are sad commentaries on Christianity's failure and inefficiency. In any future dispute an appeal to arbitration by a weakly armed nation will find no favour in this twentieth century. 'Forewarned is forearmed' has passed into more than a proverb, and no sympathy can be wasted upon a nation that draws the sword without knowing that its manhood is able and trained to grasp the hilt. Diplomacy may avert the storm for a time, but the rumbling of the thunder seems to return with marvellous regularity, and on each occasion with louder warnings of danger. War preparations have been so perfected and thought out that the flash and the crash are practically simultaneous. The aim of military war staffs is now to attain to such perfection that the armies they direct can deal a 'knock-out' blow to an adversary in the shortest possible round.

Further, so low has the code of honour fallen among some nations that a stouter material than parchment must be found upon which to write future treaties. A people thus dishonoured by tearing up solemn obligations have surely no right to be called a nation. In the honourable comity of nations they are an abomination. The example of a Great Power compounding the felony by an ally of the theft of two fair provinces from a weak neighbour was not lost upon the Kinglets of the Balkan Peninsula. Into what shreds is the Berlin Treaty not torn?—and yet in our simplicity we claimed indestructibility for the recent one of London. Would it be inapt to describe the recent Treaty of Bucharest as a mere paper cone placed upon the summit of a newly raised volcano in the Near East? How can we expect that puny kingdoms which keep their flags flying under the shelter of a slender thread of guaranteed neutrality will receive consideration in the future?

It is this new interpretation of the word honour as a solemn obligation that tends to weaken the recognised chords that should go to make harmony in the Concert of Europe. A string or two may snap at any moment at the bidding of a populace blinded by rapacity or jealousy to the codes that govern chivalry and honour. Discord, the results of the break, clangs into war, and with war and in war nothing is impossible.

The Albanian Throne.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Berlin, Jan. 3.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung declares that Izzet Pasha's resignation of the post of Minister of War was due to the proposals of the Albanian Mohammedans to make him prince of Albania, and says that he will go to Avlona next week with the Albanian deputation which is at Constantinople. He is said to have expressed his willingness to accept the Albanian offer upon condition that Albania becomes not a kingdom, but a principality, and for at least ten years is placed under the control of Austria-Hungary and Italy. The campaign in favour of Izzet seems to be taken seriously here.

Prince William of Wied, who has been spending Christmas and new year at Newwied, returned to Potsdam to-day.

Rome, Jan. 7.

The Tribuna finds comfort in the reflection that the Provisional Government of Albania had evidently no part in the attempt on the part of the Turks to instal Izzet Pasha as Sovereign, and that Ismail Kemal Bey and his gendarmerie have been fully equal to the occasion. On the whole the journal is not disposed to attach much importance to this unsuccessful enterprise or to retreat from its statement that the Eastern situation has much improved in these last days.

Rome, Jan. 7.

A telegram from Avlona of to-day's date says:—

Yesterday evening an Austrian steamer arrived here from Constantinople with 200 Turkish soldiers and six Turkish officers. The intention was to land the troops by night, raise the population and proclaim Izzet Pasha as Sovereign of Albania. The Provisional Government, in agreement with the International Commission of Control and the Dutch gendarmerie officers, immediately proceeded to arrest the Turkish troops. The incident has created a profound impression here.

Paris, Jan. 7.

The rumours as to Izzet Pasha's designs upon the Albanian Throne are treated here, as in Berlin, with seriousness. It is thought that the Turkish Government can scarcely be ignorant of the Young Turkish agitation in Albania, and the rumour that bands dispatched by the Committee of Union and Progress are on their way to San Giovanni di Medua is regarded as a further indication of the aggressive policy of the present Ottoman Ministry.

The Avlona correspondent of the Temps states that the International Commission of Control has received trustworthy information to the effect that Young Turkish bands are preparing to land at San Giovanni di Medua. In view of this information it has been decided, after consultation with Colonel Philipps, who commands at Skutari, to obtain the consent of the Powers for the dispatch of a company of international troops to the Alessio region. Avlona was placed under martial law last night.

Constantinople, Jan. 7.

The Turquie to-day published a sensational announcement to the effect that Izzet Pasha, a former Cabinet Minister and now an Inspector-General in the Army and a Senator who is of Albanian origin, has been proclaimed Prince of Albania at Durazzo. Turkish official circles deny all knowledge of any such event, or of any such intention on the part of Izzet Pasha, who was recently reported as being about to proceed on a journey to an unspecified portion of Europe. The language of a section of the Committee Press, which has never ceased to express regret at the appointment of a Christian Prince to the Albanian Throne coupled with the fact that an Albanian deputation recently visited Constantinople with the avowed object of interesting Izzet Pasha or other prominent Turkish officers in the situation of the Albanian Moslems, certainly produce the impression that the Committee of Union and Progress, or at all events an influential section of that body is inclined to support any move calculated to strengthen Albania against Greece, or at least to embarrass the latter country. Whether the Powers are regarded as serious factors in the future of Albania is another question. It is certain that not a few well-informed Turks and Europeans are very sceptical about the ability of the European Concert to lend any real support to its candidate for the Albanian throne. One may add that predictions of the appearance of Albanian, Bulgarian, and Turkish bands in Macedonia in the spring are uttered with such conviction in well-informed Turkish circles to-day that one is inclined to wonder whether these Ottoman prophets prophesy because they know.

Vienna, Jan. 7.

The proclamation of a state of siege in Avlona by the Provisional Government and the attempted landing of Turkish troops in the supposed interest of Izzet Pasha have produced an unpleasant impression here, where it is believed that the Turkish Government was cognisant of Izzet's intentions.

As an argument in favour of the probable failure of any attempt such as that ascribed to the ex-Minister of War it is repeated that the candidature of Prince William of Wied has met with the unanimous approval of Christians and Mohammedans alike. It must, however, be observed that the Prince himself has not yet officially announced his acceptance of the Throne, which was made dependent on the fulfillment of certain conditions. All these, more especially the financial conditions have not yet been fulfilled, and in well-informed quarters the belief is gaining ground that the delay in regulating these preliminaries is tending to diminish what slight inclination Prince William himself may have possessed to ascend the Throne of the new Albania. To Austria-Hungary and Italy his withdrawal would be unwelcome, and it is believed that these two Powers are determined to uphold as far as possible his candidature in the face of any attempts that may be made in other quarters to set up a rival ruler.

Constantinople Jan. 8.

Izzet Pasha absolutely denies that he had any knowledge that an attempt was about to be made to place him on the Throne of Albania, or that he was party to the Avlona affair. He declines, however, to define his attitude in the event of his being offered the title which the Powers have reserved for Prince William of Wied, and explains that his resignation of the post of Minister of War was due to reasons which he is not yet at liberty to make public. Such is the substance of statement communicated by the Pasha to a representative of the Tribuna, which is published to-day by the Turquie.

Meanwhile the telegram from Rome describing the recent attempt upon Avlona are very curious reading, and suggest to some observers that, whatever may have been the attitude of the Turkish Government towards the affair, Turkish extremists have played a part in attempting to cause a revolution in Albania. Those who hold this view point out that rumours that an attempt of this sort might be made reached several Embassies before Izzet Pasha had resigned, that Ismail Kemal Bey and other members of the Provisional Government are anathema to the Committee of Union and Progress. They point out, moreover, that the departure of 200 "Albanians" on board the Austrian Lloyd steamer Meran was public property some days ago, but was explained, semi-officially, as being in consequence of the activity of the authorities, who for some months past have been ordering Albanians who lack visible means of support, or are believed to be disaffected, to quit Constantinople. Had the attempt been successful, so argue these observers, the Committee would have been able discreetly to inform its supporters that its efforts had established a Moslem Prince on the Throne of Skanderbeg. If it failed no one, with the exception, perhaps, of Izzet Pasha, would be much the worse. Altogether it was a very spirited and hopeful adventure.

On the other hand, it must be stated that not only do Turkish statesmen deny all knowledge of the affair, but that many politicians, since the news of the Avlona incident reached Constantinople, have been at pains to assure foreigners of their complete indifference to what happens in the Albanian State.

Vienna Jan. 8.

News was received here yesterday evening that a further detachment of 300 Turkish soldiers and officers in multi had landed at Avlona. They were arrested and will be sent to Trieste, where they will be handed over to the Turkish authorities.

A telegram from Avlona states that one of the principal promoters of the movement which led to the proclamation of a state of siege was arrested at that port to-day on his arrival from Brindisi.

Hilmi Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador at Vienna, has stated to a representative of the Press that the change in the person of the Minister of War had nothing whatever to do with Albania, and that if Izzet Pasha were to assume any post in that country he would cease to be a Turkish subject and Turkey would have no authority over him. The Ambassador added that at one time proposals were made to Turkey that she should extend her influence over Albania and nominate a Turkish Governor. These suggestions were not, however, listened to, and there is no reason to suppose that the Turkish Government has since changed its policy.

The Hindieh Barrage.

The inauguration of the Hindieh Barrage on the Euphrates, which took place on December 12, 1913, marked the beginning of what will, it is to be hoped, prove a new era of prosperity for this region. Sir John Jackson, Limited, had issued invitations to the Governor-General, chief Government officials, foreign Consuls, and the chief people residing in and about Baghdad, a few days previously; and most of the guests, including the Governor-General, arrived on the scene on the evening of the 11th.

As the waters had already been diverted through the Hindieh Barrage in order to allow the dam across the old bed of the Euphrates to be completed, the ceremony was arranged to take place at the Hilla Canal, whose head is about 450 metres above the Barrage. Across this canal, short distance below the regulator had been built a temporary earthen dam, which, on being broken, would supply the first waters to the Hilla Canal.

Early in the morning of the eventful day, the Governor-General, his staff and guests, accompanied by the Military and a military band, proceeded to the Hilla Canal, the banks of which, at the site where the ceremony was to take place, were lined with soldiers, Arab Sheikhs on horseback, and crowds of Arabs. Opposite the dam was erected a maqnee, to which the Governor-General and guests proceeded. Here, Mr. Arthur Whitley (chief representative in Mesopotamia for Sir John Jackson, Limited) made a speech.

SIR W WILLCOCK'S SURVEY.

After thanking the Governor-General, his emirs, and guests for having come there to perform and assist at the inauguration of the first completed irrigation work, Mr. Whitley went on to say that the work was destined to bring back to the Babylonian realms the prosperity which had so long been lost through want of water. It would assure a perennial supply to the district affected; and he thought that day would become historical in the annals of Mesopotamia as marking the first step towards revivifying a country which in past times was celebrated for its productiveness. He then sketched briefly the history of the undertaking. By the sage advice of the Minister of Public Works at Stamboul, Sir William Willcocks was commissioned by the Ottoman Government to survey and prepare plans embodying irrigation schemes for the whole of the delta of Mesopotamia. The majority of these plans were ready in 1910, and it was at once decided to commence the works of the Hindieh Barrage and the Habbaniya Escape—both on the Euphrates. The former was for the purpose of distributing water from the Euphrates to the various canals above its site, and more particularly to the Hilla Canal (the old bed of the Euphrates); while the Habbaniya Escape was designed for the purposes of taking off and storing the flood waters which were the cause of disastrous floods during the months of April and May each year. So pressing was this necessity that Sir William Willcocks commenced these works while the Ottoman Government made arrangements with a firm of contractors for their construction. In February, 1911, the Ottoman Government made a contract with Sir John Jackson, Limited, of London, for the works mentioned, and this firm commenced operations immediately.

The works at the Hindieh Barrage (the speaker continued) comprise thirty-six openings, each five metres wide by seven metres high, provided with steel gates for regulating the distribution of water. There is also a submerged barrage, which replaces the old rubble barrage, situated about seven hundred metres below the new works. There are two navigation locks, head regulator for Hilla Canal, and various other subsidiary works. That day witnessed the completion of the essential part of this work, there remaining still the strengthening of the earthen dam across the Euphrates and smaller works.

CONSTRUCTION DIFFICULTIES.

Mr. Whitley could not say that they had arrived at this stage without having encountered difficulties—he did not refer to difficulties of construction, which every engineer expected to meet and overcome in the course of such works. It was only necessary to cast their minds back over the last two years to understand that this had been a very difficult period for the Ministers at Stamboul; but, in spite of all, the works had made progress, and to them the country should offer thanks and congratulations as well as to the Governor-General and officials of Baghdad for having overcome obstacles which sometimes appeared colossal. He did not doubt that those who had participated in bringing matters to their present state would forget the anxieties and troubles met with in remembering that to them belonged the honour of having been the means of bringing to this part of the Ottoman Dominions a boon so large and beneficent.

The speaker concluded: "The firm of Sir John Jackson, Limited on the other hand, have the honour of being the first in this country to bring such a work to a successful conclusion, and bearing in mind that the designer, Sir William Willcocks, attaches great importance to the fact that the Hindieh Barrage and Habbaniya Escape should be operative at the same time, it is hoped that circumstances will permit of our soon handing to the Government another work ready to render such services as will eliminate the yearly catastrophes occasioned by the floods of April and May.

THE VALI'S SPEECH.

To this speech, delivered in French, the Governor-General replied, in Turkish. "We all know," he said, "that the Sanjak of Diwanis is one of the most important parts of Irak. The present state of neglect is due to the change of course of the Euphrates, which formerly assured the prosperity to this vast tract. In spite of the difficulties it has encountered, the Government, in order to turn the river back into its former course to give the inhabitants of this Ura the water they require, and to restore life to these regions, has struggled to provide the money necessary for the carrying out of these large and important works. It has persevered in the execution of this work of good-will on behalf of the people." After referring in terms of appreciation to the technical administration, His Excellency went on to say that the works already completed not sufficing for the irrigation of the whole district and the needs of its people, he promised to spare no effort to bring about the execution of what was yet lacking in order to assure the welfare of the Ura. He concluded by thanking the Company assembled to take part in the inauguration.

The Governor-General, followed by the principal personages present, then descended the river bank by a special staircase, and proceeded along a narrow bank of earth which held back the water of the Hilla Canal. Prayer was then offered up, the Moslems present standing at attention, with the palms of their hands extended upward, until it was finished. Then the labourers sacrificed twenty sheep on the dam on which the Governor-General stood. Thereafter the Governor-General removed a little earth from the bank with a native spade, as did the Engineer-in-Chief, the Resident Engineer and other persons.

THE DIVERSION OF THE WATERS.

About twenty labourers had been stationed on the bank ready to cut it away; and now, at a given signal, they began to work furiously to remove the last obstacle to the progress of the water towards Hilla. In about five minutes this was accomplished—photos being taken meanwhile—and then, amidst cheers, the shrill order of the Arab women, and the firing of shots into the air, the water broke through and proceeded down the canal. A few Arab women rushed into the water and bathed—"for good luck," it was understood. The assembly lining both banks, numbering about 6,000, then dispersed.

After the ceremony Sir John Jackson, Limited entertained the chief visitors at lunch to which about one hundred and fifty persons sat down. Monsieur Edmond Bechara, the Ottoman Government Engineer-in-chief for irrigation in Mesopotamia, made an interesting speech, in the course of which he remarked that the day of Irak's misfortune were passed, and urged his compatriots to face the future with confidence. The Barrage, he said, was a gift of the Constitution; and he paid homage to the Ministers of Public Works—Nouradoughian Effendi, Haladjian Effendi, and Nizami Pasha—who had worked so hard on its behalf, and to the different Valis who had ably seconded their efforts, especially to Colonel Jemal Bey, to whom the speaker was indebted for having been chosen as head of the Irrigation Service of Irak. Sir William Willcocks, the contractors, Sir John Jackson, Limited, their resident engineer, Mr. Whitley, and his able assistant, Mr. Warbrick, were also warmly thanked; and the speaker declared that if the opening of the Habbaniya works could be accomplished within two years the debt to their British helpers would be all the greater. He concluded by urging the people of Irak to take full advantage of the opportunities afforded them by the construction of the Barrage, and to unite in restoring the historic land to its former state of verdure and fertility, quoting from the Koran the words: "And by means of water hast God given life to all things."

Meissner Pasha, Engineer-in-Chief for the Baghdad section of the German railway, congratulated Sir John Jackson, Limited, on the excellence of the work he had seen.

Mr. Arthur Whitley thanked M. M. Bechara and Meissner Pasha for their kind references and took the opportunity to thank the Ottoman Government for the courtesy and good-will shown by their representative. He said that it had been a great help to recognise that the Valis had soon after their arrival in this country understood the importance of this work, and in the interests of the country had done all that was possible to further the work confided to Sir John Jackson Limited. To the Treasurers were due thanks and congratulations for having found a way out of extraordinary difficulties which sometimes had arisen, and he had no doubt that the gentlemen referred to would bear him out when he said that his firm had rendered them some assistance during the critical periods. He expressed sincere thanks to Mons. Bechara and his staff for their technical aid, which was always gladly offered. Sometimes they (Sir John Jackson, Limited) had thought that the inspection had been perhaps a little rigorous, but he had to admit that their decision was honourable and just. Before sitting down, Mr. Whitley thanked his colleague, Mr. Warbrick, and his staff for the loyal way in which they had worked and said, that if at times they had felt things were not quite like an ordinary contract it was, felt sure, all forgotten now in the knowledge that they were the pioneers for the firm in a new country. After Mr. Warbrick had replied the party broke up, the Governor-General and most of the visitors returning to Baghdad.—The Near East

Turkey's New Loan.

During his stay in Paris, Rifaa Bey, the Turkish Minister of Finance, was interviewed by a representative of the Financial Times, in the course of which he denied that his presence in Paris was connected with Turkish loan negotiations. With respect to the various rumours circulating on the subject of a Turkish loan of 700 millions of francs (or £28,000,000), and more especially with reference to the criticism that such a sum was very far from sufficient to put the finances of the Ottoman Empire in order, and that if Turkey really wished to set her house definitely to rights £80,000,000 would be required, the Minister replied as follows:

"In order to pay the salaries in arrears of a number of officials and to pay a number of outstanding debts to contractors, we require about £75,000,000. The remainder of the projected loan is intended to be used to pay off the Treasury bonds now held by foreign bankers and to construct the Black Sea Railway."

"With regard to the assertion that if Turkey wished to set her finances completely in order a sum of £80,000,000 at least would be required, the only reply I can give you is that, having made such an assertion and not at all acquainted with the financial position in Turkey."

"The economic development of Asia Minor can only take place progressively. This part of the Empire cannot be turned into a flourishing and rich country from one day to the other, but requires many long years of steady and persistent efforts. There is, therefore, no immediate necessity to provide all the capital necessary for the 'putting into value' of Asia Minor. The money could be provided as the economic conditions of the country gradually develop."

MILITARY EXPENDITURE.

Asked whether it was true that a portion of the loan of £28,000,000, projected to be raised in France, was destined to military expenditure, and especially to the purchase of a super-Dreadnought, the "Rio de Janeiro," the Minister replied: "It is quite untrue to assert that any portion of this projected loan to be raised in France will be applied to the payment of the super-Dreadnought from Messrs. Armstrong or for military supplies from Messrs. Vickers or any other foreign firm. Allow me to repeat that the £28,000,000 in question will, as I have already told you, be applied to paying the old debts of the Turkish Government, now in suspense, and next to constructing the Black Sea railways the concessions for the working of which are about to be granted to various French syndicates."

Rifaat Bey was most positive in insisting that the Turkish Government would never fail to respect the engagements it had contracted with its foreign bond-holders. He added, "even if Turkey were obliged to deprive herself of her most pressing home requirements she would still honour the interest due on her foreign debts, and nothing in the world would induce her to bring discredit on the service of the public debt." "You may," he added, "formally and officially deny the statement that the Grand Vizier ever made the statements attributed to him."

THE BUDGET.

Referring to the budget, he said that the receipts are expected to total £127,384,300, and the expenditure is put at £132,740,000, thus leaving a deficit of £5,406,000.

All nations, except Russia and the United States, have agreed to Turkey's increasing her ad valorem duties from 11 per cent to 15 per cent., and if Turkey should be enabled to carry this proposal into effect, the increase of 4 per cent., it is estimated, will produce an additional revenue of £2,000,000, which would thus reduce the deficit to £3,506,000.

The Porte hopes that the Balkan States will, as arranged, take over such a portion of the Ottoman Debt as is represented by the territories conquered from Turkey, which would take the form of an annuity of about £1,250,000. In this way, if the amount of such annuity be deducted from the estimated expenditure, it is hoped to be submitted to the Turkish Parliament two months hence, the Budgetary deficit will not exceed £2,500,000.—The Near East.

Two years of Italian Imperialism.

The Italian General Elections, which took place on October 26th and November 2nd, resulted in the enormously increased number of seats and votes gained by those parties, leaders and personalities who most consistently opposed the Libyan war: and this chiefly in the great manufacturing towns and the best educated rural areas of Northern and Central Italy; it cannot therefore be attributed to the recent enfranchisement of illiterates. Signor Luigi Villari's account of the matter in your columns last November is obviously at fault. I propose to try a complete one based on accessible sources and designed also to correct the accounts of some British writers, who either too naively trusted Italian official information, or, as it would seem, have been more anxious not to displease the official and fashionable circles of Florence and Rome in which they move, than of attaining to historical truth.

Readers only moderately acquainted with its history, and the garbled of British song it inspired, will agree that the Italian Risorgimento is not surpassed or even equalled by any other national movement in lofty idealism and heroic loyalty to principles of individual and national rights and of human solidarity between nation and nation. As soon, however, as social problems began to claim the hitherto undivided attention demanded by the process of national unification, a new spirit began to make itself felt.

Mr. Bolton King and Mr. Thomas Okey have well described in Italy To-day the spring-tide of Italian socialism and its undeniably great work in teaching workmen and peasants the use of the vote and of organisation; in promoting social legislation; in raising wages; and more especially in abolishing electoral bribery in most southern and central manufacturing towns and in widely scattered rural areas. Unfortunately since 1902, when the Socialist Party began to exert a great and often decisive part in Parliamentary affairs (a part whose climax was reached in 1911, on the eve of the vote for the granting of a widened franchise, including even illiterates, and the creation of a State monopoly of life insurance); the party became bitterly divided on the question of lending support to, or withdrawing from, Liberal Ministers. These quarrels, and the crisis of the Revision theory of social evolution, the appearance of syndicalism, the abuse of national and local general strikes in public services, often from trifling causes, brought about a falling-off of enthusiasm and energy, and the timid became alarmed at the great influence of Socialism.

University students, hitherto attracted to Socialism, began to be influenced by new philosophical and sociological tendencies. They studied social Darwinism, Nietzsche, pragmatism, while the press echoed the mighty rivalries of world-wide empires for naval supremacy and economic expansion. These studies produced in many minds that confusion of thought so skillfully analysed in Mr. Hobhouse's Democracy and Reaction, and resulted in a non-ethical, aggressive view of life and history. It seemed such a relief to shake off the yoke of naturalistic fatalism and the nightmare of the inevitable superiority of the Teutonic over the Latin race. They sunned themselves in joyous anarchy. They felt themselves participants in a creative historical evolution. Then, if other nations were coveting colonies, why should not Italy too, from whose shores yearly swarms of four hundred or even eight hundred thousand men sailed to earn their bread abroad, often only to forget their sweet native tongue and to become citizens of foreign lands? In this spirit the spring of 1911 witnessed the celebrations of the jubilee of national unity. The great turning-point had come; the ideal impulses which had hitherto fed the Socialist movement began to flow into imperialistic channels; and it may be said with some truth that those who started the Press campaign for the Libyan war did it not without hope of preventing the advent of the widened franchise and of the State life insurance monopoly, and perhaps of dealing also a mortal blow to the Socialist Party.

But all this would fail to account for the popularity of the war apart from the influence of the Press. In Italy almost everybody reads one paper only; independence of printed matter is a very rare thing; there is practically no independent Press; all the greatest dailies are supported by powerful private interests or are owned by trusts and they promote the interest which support them by systematically discouraging habits of thoughtful criticism, by exploiting the native aestheticism of the Italian people and ceaselessly cultivating frivolity, sensationalism, gloating over details of crimes and scandals, evoking, according to the subject, either the sceptical or the arrogant mood, and chiefly bent, not on speaking but on manufacturing truth. Such a press, otherwise technically excellent and well written, is not infrequently served by unscrupulous men ever ready to sell themselves to the highest bidder, ambitions of worldly success by subserving powerful coteries. As a rule, each paper voices only its owner's views; no letters to the editor or opponent's articles are, except on trifling matters, admitted to give readers the other side of a question. Therefore, it is the barest truth to say that in Italy, as in France and Germany, Public opinion is a Press-created opinion. The Libyan war was essentially a Press-organised war, the work of literati, aesthetes, and self-styled INTELLECTUALS of all sorts, exploited by the military and naval classes and the industries dependent thereon, and knavishly thought to be a crusade, all whose cost in money and blood was paid for by the people at large. Therefore, when the war broke out, public opinion was worked up to acclaim it and to silence, as Signor Villari humorously puts it, opposition. Four or five months before the war, a band of unscrupulous writers from Tripoli sent to the most popular dailies articles magnifying every little misdeed of Turkish administration, sketching fancy pictures of the country they dared call The Promised Land. They distorted and falsified Strabo and Pliny to prove that Libya was a second granary of Rome; that water was abundant; the land rich in phosphates and sulphur mines, capable of diverting from America the big stream of Italian emigration, of renewing the miracle of the colonization of the Pampas, and redeeming Italy from the necessity of buying her cotton from the United States. In vain some of the best authorities on the geography, geology, history, and economy of Libya and Islam, such as Prof. Gaetano Mosca, Arcangelo Ghisleri, the Prince of Teano (a Conservative M.P., author of the world-renowned Annals of Islam, and for twenty-five years traveller and student of the coveted land), uttered warning against these illusions, which are still shared by Italian writers such as signor Villari, and tried to stem the flood of geographical, economical and historical errors poured forth from the columns of the Corriere della Sera, Tribuna, Stampa, Giornale d'Italia, Mattino, &c., by a self-constituted university of omniscient professors; it was deemed unpatriotic to hint at their possible untruth. They were, however, systematically collected and exploded in the Unità of Florence, and have been mercilessly shattered by the publications of the official scientific commission sent by the Government to Tripoli, on whose report the war Press is astonishingly silent. Not the slightest trace of phosphates or sulphur mines; no hope of successful introduction of Italian agricultural methods; no superficial or deep-rising artisan wells; the problem of drinking-water for possible Italian settlers still awaiting solution; no actual or possible analogy between Libya and the American Pampas owing to the essentially different climate.*

(1) Primi studi agrologici sulla zona di Tripoli, Bergamo, 10 lire.

Moreover, every bit of cultivated land is already owned, and properties are much sub-divided. The present form of nomad agriculture is the only one adapted to local conditions, which are incompatible with agriculture of the Italian type; and the returns are always lower than the lowest in Italy. The most profitable industry appears to be cattle-raising. But given the climate and the mountain system of Tripolitania, which both preclude the existence of varying zones of cultivation, nomadic life alone is possible. Signor Ghino Valenti, one of the best agrarian economists in Italy, states that while America allows the Italian emigrant to accumulate a capital, Libya will require the immigrant to be in a position to risk a capital already in existence, in order not to relapse into a condition far worse than that which compelled him to leave his native land. Moreover, it is not true that Italian emigrants are badly paid, since their forward to Italy about twenty millions sterling yearly; and if we remember that many of them are peasant proprietors whose meagre fields do not enable them to live on their native soil, it is absurd to think that Libya will ever take the place of America. The writer of this paper has heard Italian emigrants, who joined the ranks destined for the conquest of Libya, express their utter disappointment with regard to the hopes so irresponsibly kindled in them, and deny any possible analogy, from the emigrant's standpoint, between Libya and America. What Signor Villari says in regard to emigrants anxious to settle in Libya may have been true at the beginning of the infatuation; now it is most emphatically true that the keenest critics of the war and its illusion are the soldiers returning to their native land. Moreover, the problem is complicated by the fact that since Libyan products are similar to Italian, they must compete with those of Southern Italy and Sicily. Finally, with regard to the alleged necessity of colonies to prevent the denationalisation of emigrants and their despised condition in foreign lands, the obvious reply is: first, that they would not be so despised if what to them is only ironically a motherland provided them with good education, developing their rich natural endowments so as to make the world feel their unique and inestimable value; and, secondly, that if the sense of organisation were duly cultivated they might, without war, slowly and insensibly impress their genius on and become the governing élite of those countries wherein they are already, or are approaching, a numerical majority.

Not unaware of the feeble, fanciful character of all these prospects, the supporters of the Libyan expedition emphasised arguments relating to its political and strategical character. The conquest of Libya, it was said, was necessary to prevent Italy being expelled from the Mediterranean and isolated and cut off from the work of civilisation; to obtain from Turkey, who only gives way to force, favours on behalf of our Levantine trade; or to raise our prestige in the world, which had fallen since the defeats of Lissa (1866) and Adowa (1896). Tripoli, others added, would then form the nucleus of a new Empire destined, in process of time, to absorb Tunis and Algeria and Egypt as far as Abyssinia. Otherwise, sooner or later, England and France might advance from the hinterland to the sea-shore, or some German interest might establish itself in Tripoli or in Cirenaica. And it would seem, indeed, that the real pretext or final determining cause of the Italian expedition was really a vague hint that some German interest was about to obtain concessions from Turkey, till then reluctant to grant similar concessions to Italy. This explanation appears the more probable since all were agreed that the occupation was to be a military promenade without the sacrifice of a dead or a wounded soldier; that the Arabs were anxious to receive the Italians with open arms, and the whole business, according to the Prime Minister's statement to the New York Herald, would not cost more than four millions sterling. No wonder, therefore, if in a year filled with patriotic celebrations of the Nation's Jubilee, the whole country, worked up as it was, applauded the prospect of crowning the year with one fait more, only just a little more dramatic? Does Signor Villari think that without the fables concerning the Promised Land and the belief in its peaceful occupation, the enthusiasm would have been so unanimous?

Now, so far as these arguments are concerned, it may be said: (a) It is obvious that, to prevent another Power obtaining exclusive privileges in Turkey, it would have been sufficient for Italy to conclude an alliance or an entente with Turkey in exchange for the coveted commercial concessions; or that, in joint action with other Powers, Italy might have asked for the open door and equality of opportunity in Tripoli: for, all that was worth obtaining commercially in Tripoli would have been obtained without the cost of a military occupation, which has absorbed the value of such trade for perhaps more than half a century. (b) In regard to the strategical and political value of the occupation, it is now admitted that, at least for the present, the nation is weakened in its European influence, owing to the army kept in Libya, and that this is one cause of the increased military armaments in Germany; it is also admitted that as soon as possible Italy must increase her army and navy: this much was admitted by the Tribuna and Corriere della Sera of April 3rd last. And even the blind can see that it is more difficult and costly to defend a widely extended coast than to defend the already long and exposed coast of the peninsula and its two greater islands; indeed, there are naval experts who believe that the national defence has been permanently weakened, and there are economists who think that the Libyan war has permanently increased the annual national expenditure by more than ten millions sterling. (c) In regard to the increased prestige, it may be safely said that for many years Italy has not suffered such an affront as the recent decrees of Austrian governors in the yet unredeemed provinces of Trent and Trieste, who dismissed all Italian subjects from employment in the municipal offices of these provinces, independently of the length of their service; decrees as yet followed by no satisfaction. Moreover, neither in Italy among the multitudes feeding on emigration, nor in the lands receiving them, can such prestige be increased by the fact that this year only a miracle seems likely to prevent emigration statistics exceeding 800,000.

Signor Villari feels indignant at the severe attitude of European public opinion with regard to the officially denied Italian atrocities, and explains such attitude as an expression of hostility towards Italy, by powerful international financial interests, through salaried war correspondents. I will briefly remark on this painful topic that in the war correspondence of some Italian dailies (see Luigi Lucatelli in Secolo, 8 November) and in soldiers' letters printed in the provincial press, less muzzled, and even inclined to take such feats as acts of bravery, such things can be read as surpassing in atrocity everything written by foreign correspondents. Several of these letters have been collected for posterity by Signor Ghisleri in his leaflet on the Libyan War and the Law of Nations. The official explanation of such excesses is simply untrue. Readers of the Turin Stampa (29 December, 1912) and the Naples Mattino (31 December, 1912), and even of the Giornale d'Italia (23 October, 1912), all three Jingo papers, besides readers of Signor De Felice's articles in Sicilian papers (he is an M.P. who went to Tripoli as war correspondent), will have received from eye-witnesses the true and heretofore unchallenged account of the Shara-Shat misdeeds. There was neither rebellion nor treachery by the Arabs, simply an encircling operation, against which the Italian military authorities took no precautions, and which caused a terrible panic among the Italian troops. There was nothing to punish; the oasis slaughter stands unjustified; nor do the Turkish atrocities affect the point, for they were only discovered later; and, after all, if you worry wasps it is silly to complain of being stung. The strictest official censorship controlled the Press, so that that alone should be printed which the Government desired should be believed; and correspondents who reported the true facts were mercilessly expelled. It is indeed difficult to find in modern history another such successfully organised deception of a whole nation; of a whole nation so perfectly hypnotised, now into ecstatic passiveness, now into hysterical enthusiasm or indignation by the systematic daily and hourly elaboration of new lies by the Press.

Was the war of any moral or spiritual value? Its first effect was to relax the already rather loose control over the Administration; Parliament was not re-opened, and remained closed for an unusually long period. When re-opened, opposition was silenced or abdicated its functions; in the Press, criticism was suspended; to Socialists alone was left the rare honour of standing alone against the all but universal infatuation. The naval and military industries regained the uncontrolled mastery of the State purse, which the Parliamentary enquiry of 1906 had shaken, and the war expenditure was conducted by methods which no Court would approve of in the case of private individuals; and a greater sincerity in the compilation of Budgets was declared desirable in his election programme by no less a statesman than Baron Sidney Sonnino, the leader of the old Conservative Party. The figures given by Signor Villari represent only money actually paid by the Treasury to the Army and Navy Department, exclusive of pensions, repairs, &c., the total cost of the war is by experts put between forty and sixty millions sterling. The war, though officially ended at Lausanne, really continued at a cost of forty thousand pounds daily. Nobody now denies that either a foreign loan or new taxes will be urgently needed; and though the Prime Minister declared that new taxation must fall on the wealthy alone, he did not explain how, under the present extremely defective Italian methods of ascertaining incomes and the ultra-protectionist fiscal system, such taxation could be prevented from weighing in the long run chiefly on the working classes.

Owing to the world-wide boom in trade, existing taxes have yielded exceedingly well, but surpluses cannot go on for ever, and these taxes weigh heavily on bread, salt, sugar, clothing, and other necessities. Owing to protection, the cost of living in the Continent has increased by about 10 per cent. more than in England. Surpluses ought, therefore, either to lead to a permanent reduction of existing taxation, or be employed in building better roads, in opening new schools, or raising the shamefully low salaries of elementary and secondary teachers. Meanwhile, it is certain that in the proportion in which money will be wasted in more and less useless public works in Libya, pro tanto urgent needs in the peninsula, and chiefly in the south, will be neglected. It is now fashionable in Italy to resent the assertion that Italy is not rich, and that, though in fifty years united Italy has worked marvels, there still exists in her midst such misery, such illiteracy, such lack of civilisation and political education, chiefly but not exclusively in the south, as to make it almost incredible that she should boast of exporting to Libya a commodity of which so many among her own people are so sorely in want. But recent elections prove conclusively that these words are not too strong. Nobody in Italy, even among so-called Radicals, feels as an anomaly the direct interference of the Government through the local authorities to obtain a majority or to ask Government support in the elections. In the south, chiefly in Molletta and Bitonto, Government representatives, in obvious alliance with hooligans, made it quite impossible for thousands of opponents, through sheer terror, to leave their homes on election day, or allowed them to be bullied, kicked, and robbed of their certificates before the polling stations. Police delegates organised and guided hordes of hooligans, who attacked the opposition candidate not only with stones and sticks, but even with pistols and bombs. One of the commonest practices of the State police, as proved recently in a Milanese court was employed on a wide scale in the South during recent elections: knives were placed in people's pockets during meetings and processions, who were arrested and brought before the court as bearers of illegal weapons. Needless to say, judges always accept police evidence as final.

Intimidation on behalf of Ministerial candidates was unprecedented, most of whom owed their success to a compromise with Clericals. The elections, nevertheless, resulted in the moral defeat of the Ministry; the anti-war parties, chiefly Socialists and their discredited leaders, as Signor Villari has it, more than doubled their numbers and polled more than a million votes. The leading free trader and pacifist, Signor Giretti, who unlike more faint-hearted pacifists, did not shrink at the Peace Congress at Geneva from condemning the war, triumphed in spite of unexampled Governmental pressure. The country, owing to its moral and economic strength gained during the peaceful period of 1896-1911, has supported the war with energy and resource superior to expectation unhappily, however, squandered in a futile enterprise.

But the country is now wearied by a wasteful, arrogant policy, which destroys its reputation for Liberalism and promotes a dangerous rivalry in naval armaments in the Mediterranean, with its danger of further imperialistic ventures. Already the present Ministry is in difficulties and their successors' task will be a heavy one; already an adequate defence of Libya by sea and land threatens to involve a further expenditure of some forty millions sterling; and the working classes and the awakening South are demanding a better and worthier lot. . . . Surely it is yet too soon to draw the whole moral of the Tripoli raid.

My countryman who share Signor Villari's views will denounce as unpatriotic his account of Italian policy in a foreign periodical. But truth knows no barriers, and, moreover, it is very unfair that supporters of the now prevailing Italian policy should alone claim the privilege exalting it and of sneering at its opponents in the foreign Press, while at the same time claiming to impose on them the duty of patriotic silence, thus levelling down patriotism to an enlarged form of loyalty among associated evil-doers. Surely those who to promote this war did not shrink from organising the systematic deception of their countrymen, and now appear as having offered to the world an unprecedented example of corporate stubborn mendacity, have sinned against Italy's good name and majesty far worse than anyone humbly endeavouring to show how, after all, she was not wholly deceived and is already on the way to regaining her better self.

ANGELO CRISPI.

References: The invaluable collection of the Unità of Florence, edited by Prof. Salvemini, and containing the best concrete discussions of the most pressing Italian problems. Via Lungarno Vespucci 12b.

Arcangelo Ghisleri: Tripolitania e Cirenaica dal Mediterraneo al Sahara, 3rd edition, Bergamo, Istituto d'artigianato, 1913; by far the best study of the region.

Arcangelo Ghisleri: La guerra libica e il diritto delle genti. Libreria politica moderna, Roma 1911; contains a valuable bibliography.

See in Comrade 22nd No. of November 22nd, Signor Ojetti's letter on the Government police's brigandage in Molletta. The Bon rbons are almost rehabilitated; the Corriere is a Jingo conservative paper, and therefore the letter is all the more significant.

Cynicism Old and New.

Cynicism is not fashionable nowadays either as a philosophy or as a method of humour. We no longer take any pleasure in talking scandal about human nature, at least we leave it to men of science to do that, and they do it without any of the gusto of the humourist. The old humorous cynicism was a mischievous attack upon human prestige and dignity. When men were supposed to be a little lower than the Angels, there was some fun in showing their likeness to the beasts. But when that likeness has become a commonplace of science and man has been dethroned by his own thought, cynicism is merely platitude and has as little liveliness about it as copybook morality. No doubt there was a time when the saying that no great man is a hero to his valet seemed both wicked and surprising. But that epigram has been expanded into stout volumes about the connexion between genius and epilepsy, which make us almost thankful that we have not the misfortune to be great. It was possible once to be cynical about Joan of Arc, to prove with some vivacity that she was an impostor supported by priests and statesmen for their own ends, and wit could sparkle over the contrast between this imposture and the splendour of the national legend that it produced. But when medical science takes the matter up and tells us that Joan herself was only the most hysterical person in an age of hysteria, then we have no spirit left to be cynical. Rather we become hypochondriacal about humanity and are tempted to feel that a rest cure is the proper remedy for all its conflicts and glories, for all the illusions which the flesh imposes upon a non-existent spirit.

There is a kind of confidence and security in cynicism which we lack nowadays. Doctor Johnson said that any man who depreciated himself only did so to show how much he had to spare. After all the discoveries and theories of the last hundred years we do not feel that humanity has enough to spare for cynicism. We have scientific formulae for all the old jokes that were made against it, and so the jokes sound to us too much like truth to be amusing. There was a kind of cynical rage in men like Swift which came of disappointment. He felt that he had been taken in by the pretensions of humanity and he revealed them as impostors who might be chastened by the revelation of their own baseness. To him also the animalism of men was mere perversity. His yahoos were bestial by their own fault and therefore lower than beasts; there was something devilish in them which he hated and which he hoped to punish by making them hate themselves. But if Swift were alive now he would leave the description of yahoos to conscientious naturalists such as Zola. His genius, however fierce and unhappy, could not ease itself with cynicism, for it would find no pretensions in humanity to destroy. Nowadays a Swift, writing as he wrote, would have all dull men on his side, and that would be intolerable to him. His rage could not vent itself in scientific platitudes, and it would have therefore to find a vent in some kind of rebellion against them.

Samuel Butler was the last of the cynics; and his behaviour proves how difficult it is to be a cynic in the modern world; for he saw that if he was to escape platitude, he must always keep his temper with mankind. To fall into a rage with humanity was to confess that you had harboured obsolete expectations of it, that you were making discoveries which every one else had made long ago. He therefore remained perfectly calm and treated human beings as if they were rather amusing creatures who might enjoy themselves as much as he enjoyed them if only they would not take anything too seriously. He was, indeed, the first to be cynical about modern science; for he refused to take that any more seriously than any other human product. He smiled at our modern discoveries as much as at our old pretensions. Thus he pointed the way out of the depression which those discoveries have caused. For after all, if we take our own discoveries about ourselves too much to heart, it must be because we have an excessive opinion of our own wisdom. It is conceit that makes us sure of our own insignificance, for if we were not conceited we should be sure of nothing. We are still trusting in our own understanding of the universe even when we give ourselves a very low place in it. He therefore was cynical about that understanding; and in this ultimate cynicism of his there was the germ of a new mysticism, a mysticism which smiles at the self-confidence of man when he declares himself to be nothing but matter. If we have a very low opinion of ourselves we are not likely to be right, for there is an evident inconsistency between that opinion and our confidence in it. So cynicism begins to comfort us when there remains nothing discomfiting for it to say.—The Times.

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HERKE, CONSTANTINOPLE.Turkish Fezes made in Turkey

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpacks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

11-5-14

Sole-Agents for India

for Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople

SHAIDA & KHURSHED,

COMMERCIALISTS, BADAUN.

- (1) CIGAR and CHEROOTS.
- (2) CIGARETTES:—Turkish and Egyptian (by direct Importation) and others.
- (3) TOBACCOS:—All the best known British, American and Turkish.
- (4) Towels, Banyans, Stockings and Handkerchiefs Embroidered.

KHUDAM-I-KAABA ON IT.

- (5) Cooking Stoves, Soaps, Powders, Lavenders, etc.
- (6) Stationery. (7) Fancy Articles.

SUMMONS FOR DISPOSAL OF SUIT.

(Order V, rules 1 and 5, of Act V of 1908.) -

Suit No 271 of 1913.

IN THE COURT OF THE MUNSIF OF FYZABAD.

Gharib, son of Durga, Kalwai of Mohalla Fatehganj, Dal Mandi, district Fyzabad Plaintiff, versus

Mahabir Baqqal, etc. Defendants.

To Raghubeer Baqqal, son of Sital, of mohalla Khodaganj, city Fyzabad, at present residing at Amra Tola Bazar, city Calcutta, as Palladar, through Madho c/o Parag Maharaj, Dal seller of mohalla Emami Basta, city Calcutta, No. 248 and 3, defendant No. 2.

WHEREAS, the abovenamed plaintiff has instituted a suit against you for foreclosure of decree, you are hereby summoned to appear in this Court in person, or by a pleader, duly instructed and able to answer all material questions relating to the suit, or who shall be accompanied by some person able to answer all such questions on the 4th day of February 1914, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to answer the claim; and as the day fixed for your appearance is appointed for the final disposal of the suit, you must be prepared to produce on that day all the witnesses, upon whose evidence and all the documents upon which you intend to rely in support of your defence. Take notice that, in default of your appearance on the day before mentioned, the suit will be heard and determined in your absence.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Court, this 23rd day of January 1914.

By ORDER,

(Sd.) SHIAMJI LAL, Munsarim,
Munsif's Court, Fyzabad.

NOTICE.

- (1)—Should you apprehend your witnesses will not attend of their own accord, you can have a summons from this Court to compel the attendance of any witness, and the production of any document that you have a right to call upon the witness to produce, on applying to the Court and on depositing the necessary expenses.
- (2)—If you admit the claim, you should pay the money into Court, together with the costs of the suit, to avoid execution of the decree, which may be against your person or property, or both.
- (3)—A* accompanies this summons.

NOTE.—If written statements are required, say, — You are (or each a party is, as the case may be) required to put in a written statement by the day of
*Fill in "copy of the plaint" or "concise statement of the nature of the claim," as the case may be vide Order V, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure.
Hours of attendance at the office of the Munsif's Court at Fyzabad from 10 A.M. to 4 P.M.

Saharanpur District Fair.

The Saharanpur District Fair will take place from March the 3rd to March the 9th, 1914. Exhibits must be in their places not later than February 25th. Exhibition includes Agricultural, Machinery and Industrial Courts, Horse, Cattle and Poultry Shows, Races, Wrestling, etc. etc.

J. R. W. BENNETT, I.C.S.,

Chairman.

Dehli Directory, 1914.

Published by the Municipal Committee, Delhi, showing names of the Members of the Viceroy's Executive Council, the Government of India officials, Military Forces, Civil Officers, and all departments. Full accounts of Delhi with new maps of capital and roads. Price Rs. 1/8/- post extra. Apply to:

The Manager,

The General Newspaper Agency & Book Depot, Delhi.

Matrimonial Notice.

An Europe return young Mohammedan Engineer at present holding a very respectable position in India invites correspondence from young ladies of good education or their guardians with a view to matrimony.

Z. A.,

C/o "The Comrade".

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to naughty diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

THIS YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the virile power and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say so that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that it is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which doctors prize of its own accord. Price per tin containing 30 pills, Rs. 10/- only (12s. 4d.). Postage extra. No. 10, Bala Ganga, Calcutta.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, B.A., B.L., Rajkot, India.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER RECEIVED FROM THE
BOMBAY MUNICIPALITY PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

ESANOFELE and MALARIA.

" Treatment with ESANOFELE controlled with quinine in most cases was recently given a fair trial. The majority of the cases belonged to the Parel Hindu Orphanage, where MALARIA OF A PARTICULARLY SEVERE TYPE raged this year. 48 cases of Malaria were treated of which FIVE WERE CHRONIC, with considerable enlargement of spleen and General Malaria Cachexia." Result :

REDUCTION IN THE SIZE OF THE SPLEEN	+	+
DISAPPEARANCE OF PARASITES	+	+
INCREASE IN THE HAEMOGLOBIN VALUE	+	+
GENERAL CONDITION OF PATIENTS VERY SATISFACTORY.

Writing on the result of chronic cases the report states :—" Quinine would not have worked equally well in these cases and one is especially emboldened to give this opinion from the case of a Sukharam Jivaji, who was a chronic sufferer and ALWAYS TOOK QUININE OR QUININE AND ARSENIC MIXTURES WITHOUT MUCH BENEFIT.

" On the whole, ESANOFELE appears to have VERY GOOD EFFECT ON CHRONIC CASES.

ESANOFELE is obtainable from all Chemists and Dealers throughout BRITISH INDIA, BURMA AND CEYLON.

General Agents:—

Messrs. B. G. GORIO & Co.,
3, Wallace Street, BOMBAY.

FOR INFANTS
"ESANOFELINA."
AFTER MALARIA.
FERRO CHINA WINE.

MANUFACTURERS:—

FELICE BISLERI & Co., MILAN, ITALY.

For Stationery write to—

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper,
Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

Don't shout but ring.
The Standard Electric
Bell sets, mounted on galvanized stand, 20 yds.
wire and 6 months
battery. Rs. 7-5
10 yds. 1 year Rs. 11-0
20 yds. 2 years Rs. 20-0
EAST-WEST CO.
Chandni Chowk,
DELHI.

EVERY KIND OF
PRINTING DONE
IN THE "COMRADE"
PRESS, DELHI.

The Manager,

"THE COMRADE" Press,
Kucha-i-Chelan,
DELHI.

DEAR SIR,

We duly received six schedule books sent to-day and are quite satisfied with the work. Will you kindly send us as soon as possible three copies of the issue schedule, proof of which was sent to you the other day.

We hope you will endeavour to complete the order at an early date.

Yours faithfully,

Per Pro. THOS COOK & SON,

(Sd.) C. LUES.

DO YOU WANT

TO EARN ANOTHER

Rs. 3 A DAY?

Reliable persons can add another Rs. 3 a day to their present income by making hosiery on the celebrated "Durbar Auto-Knitter" at home. Previous experience not necessary. Distance no drawback. Work simple.

Our Proposition Briefly Explained.

Purchase one or more Auto-Knitters from us, according to the number of members in your household who are ambitious to increase their earnings, and we guarantee thereafter to purchase work turned out by you with yarn supplied by us. Our profits do not come through the sale of the machines, but through the success of the operators.

Remittances are forwarded the very day that the finished work is received. The markets of the world are clamouring for hosiery made on the "Durbar Auto-Knitter." We are unable to keep pace with the ever-growing demand. We want more earnest workers—we want you. Write to us now for full particulars.

Genz, Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS,

Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay Street, Chowringhee Road, CALCUTTA.

THIS COUPON ENTITLED YOU TO FULL DETAILS.
FILL IT IN, DETACH ALONG DOTTED LINES, AND SEND TO-DAY.

Date

GENTLEMEN,

I wish to take advantage of your offer. Please send me immediately full particulars, whereby I can earn Rs. 3 a day. Enclosed please find Anna Stamp to help to pay postages.

Name

Address

GENZ, WHEELER & CO., Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay St., Chowringhee Rd., CALCUTTA.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 7.

Single Copy

No. 6.

Annas 4.

Delhi: Saturday, February 7, 1914.

Annual Subscription

Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

WEEK	Page	Page.
OUR LONDON LETTER	... 110
TETRA A TETRA—
Air Fazulbhai's Resolution	... 111
Better Procedure	... 111
Conciliation	... 111
The Peace-makers	... 112
Conciliation Boards and Official Critics	... 112
Official Preserves and Non-Official Poaches	... 112
Comparisons	... 112
"Cry Peace where there is no Peace."	... 113
"Hot-Headed Youngsters."	... 113
The Forfeiture of the Zamindar Press."	... 113
LEADING ARTICLES—
The Press Act—IV	... 114
The Indian Moslem's Tasks—IV	115
CORRESPONDENCE—
The Forfeiture of the "Zamindar Press."	... 117
The Far Year	... 118
INDIA AND SOUTH AFRICA	... 119
"THE ROMANCE OF INDIA."	... 119
THREE WEEKS IN THE BALKANS	120
THE POETS' DILEMMA	... 122
WOMAN AND MORALITY	... 122
ADVERTISEMENTS	... 126—128

Italian claims in Asia Minor.

London, Feb. 4.

Reuter learns that Italy is still negotiating direct with Turkey regarding the retrocession of the Aegean Islands. The present pourparlers relate to the Italian desire to obtain compensatory concessions in the region of Adalia (Asia Minor), where they might conflict with Great Britain's interests and prejudice British rights in view of railway extensions, but the matter is the subject of friendly discussion between Italy and the British company concerned.

Peace Propaganda.

Teheran, Feb. 4.

An Americo-Persian Treaty has been signed under which will be referred to an impartial permanent commission for advice all differences which can not be settled through diplomatic channels. Persia is the first Asiatic country to sign such a convention.

Asiatics in America.

London, Feb. 4.

This cancels all the previously adopted amendments providing for the exclusion of Asiatics and Negroes, except where treaties otherwise stipulate.

The Times, Washington correspondent explains that the removal of the obnoxious amendments to the United States Immigration Bill was partly due to pressure from White House, and partly to the realisation of the dangerous folly of the previous amendments. It is hoped that this will counteract the bad effect which certain speeches in the House of Representatives are reported to have exercised on Japanese public opinion.

Washington, Feb. 5.

The Immigration Bill, providing for a literacy test but without the Asiatic exclusion amendments which were previously eliminated, has passed the House of Representatives.

Agra riot.

Agra, Feb. 3.

The Agra Muharram riot case, which was to be heard by the Joint-Magistrate yesterday, has been postponed till Thursday next when Mr. Alston, barrister of Allahabad, will appear for the Crown. Messrs. Habibullah and Aftab Ahmad Khan, barristers, will appear for the defence.

According to the London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, important proposals for a settlement of the Indian question have been forwarded from India for the consideration of the Government of the Union of South Africa. It is understood, however, that no decision on the general question will be come to until the Natal Commission's report has been considered. The proposals, which take the form of amendments to the existing Immigration Regulations, would, while restricting immigration, enable Indians to enjoy all the privileges of British subjects. It is proposed that English-educated Indians who have adopted the standard of living of

The Week.

Albania.

London, Feb. 4.

The trial at Valona of those implicated in the Turkish coup d'etat last month is concluded. Major Bekir Bey has been condemned to death and ten Turkish officers to varying terms of imprisonment, one to fifteen years.

Valona, Feb. 1.

The sentences of the court-martial will be submitted to the Prince of Wied. Meanwhile they will be suspended.

Durazzo, Feb. 1.

An agreement has been reached between the Control Commission in Albania and Essad Pasha, who undertakes to resign within three days. The Commission has authorised him to go to meet the Prince of Wied as a representative of the Albanian people.

Peace in the Balkan

Berlin, Feb. 1.

The semi-official Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung says that the visit of M. Venizelos, the Greek Premier, has produced a most favourable impression, and the conviction has been strengthened that under his guidance Greece will be actuated by the wish to establish peaceful relations with her neighbours and the Great Powers.

Constantinople, Feb. 2.

Diplomatic relations between Greece and Turkey were formally resumed to-day when it is believed direct pourparlers were opened regarding the Aegean Islands.

the middle class of the South African European population should be freely allowed to settle in South Africa as long as they do not exceed a certain percentage of the European population, to be determined by the South African Government in consultation with the Imperial and the Indian Governments; any increase of the Indian settlers over the maximum prescribed due to births alone not to be objected to; and all Indian settlers to be allowed all the privileges of the European population. In return for these concessions it is proposed that indentured Indian labour should be freely permitted in South Africa, with sufficient safeguards for the proper treatment of the labourers; indentured Indian labourers not to be allowed to settle in South Africa after the expiration of their terms of service, but in all cases to be sent back to India. Other clauses are: of the Indians qualified to remain in the country under clause 6 of the Regulations, those who have a greater landed or business interest in it have preference over those who have less; and of others, older members over newer ones; any Indian certified by any two European members of the South African Parliament or any two members of the British Parliament or by any European District Collector in India to have adopted the standard of living of middle class Europeans to be considered as having that qualification; the marriage law of South Africa to be amended so as to recognise the validity of Indian monogamous marriages.

Pietermaritzburg, Feb. 2.

At a meeting of 1,500 Indians, held to welcome the Rev. Mr. Andrews, a resolution was passed endorsing the terms of the provisional settlement between the Government and Mr. Gandhi, and repudiating the right of the Natal Congress as a mere handful of individuals to testify before the Indian Commission thereby repudiating Mr. Gandhi.

Capetown, Feb. 2.

Mr. Munnik, a Transvaal member of the Union Senates, has given notice of a motion to the effect that the presence of the large numbers of Indians within the Union is detrimental to the best interests of the country, and the Government is therefore requested to remedy the evil as quickly as possible.

Telegrams from India.

The Indian Telegraph Department has received information from South Africa, that all telegrams from India, to the Union were subject to censorship. It is not known whether this announcement is only a belated message sent in the ordinary course to every country as a result of the proclamation of martial law, which has now been removed, or marks a new departure in connection with the Passive Resistance Movement.

Indians in South Africa.

Durban, Feb. 1

A number of members of the Natal Indian Congress are protesting against the decision of the Congress to give evidence before the Indian Commission. They maintain that 60 per cent of the meeting endorsed Mr. Gandhi's opinion in the matter, but the chairman ruled in favour of the minority and ignored the demand for a division. It is believed that the dispute will deter some Indians from giving evidence.

Durban, Jan. 31.

The first evidence regarding complaints by Indians was given by a witness from Laneray Estate, who alleged that native constables had assaulted Indians who were returning from a strike meeting. Colonel Clarke, Commissioner of Police said he believed that both parties in the case were to blame. He had desired an enquiry to be held at the time, but the Indians declined to give evidence. Mr. Keen, Surgeon Superintendent of Indian Immigrants, said he had noticed a physical and financial improvement in Indians during their stay in Natal, which they themselves admitted.

Delhi, Jan. 31.

With reference to Renter's telegram that the National Indian Congress had decided to offer evidence before the Commission, thus disowning Mr. Gandhi's leadership, Mr. Gokhale cabled to Mr. Gandhi for particulars, and has received the following reply jointly from Mr. Gandhi and the Rev Mr. Andrew, dated Durban, 30th instant.

"Congress meeting numbered little over a hundred people. Opinion sharply divided. Large majority voted against giving evidence. So far three indentured Indians only appeared before Commission. Congress meeting engineered by men who were opposed to passive resistance at the very beginning of the struggle. No importance attached to the meeting locally. General European feeling growing in our favour. An influential member of the Senate paid a personal visit to Gandhi at Phoenix yesterday and was most cordial. Offered all help towards settlement. Wanted by-gones forgotten. Don't be anxious."

The Reverend Mr. Andrews has started a tour in India and will afterwards proceed to Johannesburg, Kimberley and Cape Town to meet Indian communities. He sails for England on February 21st. He regards the agreement reached during his and Mr. Gandhi's stay of a fortnight in Pretoria as satisfactory, and hopes that it will lead to a permanent settlement of Indian grievances. Mr. Andrews was deeply touched by the kindness and assistance of the European community.

Our London Letter.

(FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.)

London, 16th Jan. 1914.

NEW CONVERTS INTO ISLAM.

Two English ladies have been just converted into Islam by the Khwaja Kamal-ud-din, who is being kept very busy at the Woking Mosque with his spiritual work. Day after day, the Khwaja Sahib is engaged with numerous interviews with persons, who go to see him at no little sacrifice of time and money, some of them undertaking long journeys from different parts of the kingdom in order to meet him, either for the solution of some complicated point in Islamic principles and doctrines, which had been weighing upon their minds or else for the formal adoption of the Moslem faith. Several of these newly-converted Moslems, of course, have been for years privately following the great teachings of the holy Prophet and the rites and principles of Islam, though outwardly they had not formally declared themselves as Moslems. The public announcement of the adoption of Islam by several distinguished personages in this country, it seems, has acted as a stimulus to a good many people, who are now rightly hastening to formally embrace Islam. It is really astonishing to notice the large number of English Moslems, who, though real and earnest Moslems at heart, had not been before identified as such. The Islamic Society has a very large field for spiritual activity before it and I understand that the Managing Committee is paying its most careful attention to this problem. No doubt, the Society is greatly handicapped for want of funds, but an earnest appeal for financial help is being made and it is hoped it will meet with a generous response. The weekly Friday Prayers, held at Lindsey Hall under the auspices of the Islamic Society, are drawing large audiences and the truly international character of the Congregation—the real united Islam—is its most happy feature.

COLOUR AT THE BAR.

A rather unusual dispute in legal circles has led to an offer by Sir John Simon, the Attorney-General, to act as arbitrator. It appears that about a year ago, an Indian barrister, a member of the Inner Temple, had sent in his application for membership of the Bar Mess of the Surrey and South London Sessions Circuit. It is obvious that membership of a mess carries social and other privileges, and already there are several Indian barristers, who are members of similar institutions on other Circuits. In this case, curiously enough, the application was refused.

The applicant took his case before the Bar Council and later endeavoured to interest the present Lord Chief Justice, then Attorney-General, in the matter. The present Attorney General has now offered his services as Mediator.

It is doubtful whether Sir John Simon's offer will be accepted. Some of the barristers seem to resent outside interference on the ground that the mess is only a social club, and that a barrister has no rights of membership any more than he would have in the case of the Carlton or any other club.

On the other hand, it is argued by the Indians that, as only a member of the mess can receive the brief for a Crown prosecution, membership is the right of every barrister on the Circuit. A meeting will shortly be held to consider the Attorney-General's Offer.

THE TURKISH NAVY.

According to the Daily Telegraph's Constantinople Correspondent, the Ottoman Ministry of Marine will shortly proceed to radical reforms in connection with the officers of the Navy. Many old officers in the higher ranks will be placed on the retired list, in order to permit the promotion of capable and well-trained young officers. Several foremen from Messrs. Armstrong's yards have already arrived at Constantinople and are in service at the Admiralty, and a number of Superior English Officers will shortly arrive there to strengthen the staff of Admiral Lympus. The battleship "Messoudieh" is to be converted into a training ship, and her two big guns are to be sent over to England for certain alterations by Messrs. Armstrong.

TETE À TETE

The main principle underlying Sir Fazulbhai's resolution, so far as we can understand, is that the services of leaders of the Hindu and Moslem communities in each locality should be utilized, firstly, in all cases of disputes concerning religious or quasi-religious ceremonies for the purposes of arranging the time, place and manner of their observance and preventing violence or riots connected therewith, and secondly, in all cases of doubt concerning the nature of the premises to be acquired, for the purpose of determining whether they are places of Hindu or Moslem worship or not. At present the police are practically the only counsellors consulted by those responsible for the maintenance of law and order in cases of differences between the two communities concerning the observance of their ceremonies, and as a rule the unaided judgment of the officer desiring the acquisition of land determines the character of places of worship. If it is claimed that the officials even now always consult non-official opinion, then we do not see what objection Government could have had in giving to the existing practice the character of an invariable rule of law. The Hon. Sir Fazulbhai and the Hon. Mr. Sorendranath Bannerjee desired to make the consultation of non-official opinion something more substantial than a pious hope and aspiration. Taking the two considerations together, the principle underlying the resolution may be said to be a compulsory consultation of non-official opinion. So far as we could judge the non-official members of the Council seemed to favour this unanimously. But the way in which the resolution was framed went some way further than the principle of compulsory consultation. Sir Fazulbhai did not ask the Council merely to recommend to Government the formation of a Committee to prepare a draft scheme of legislation for requiring the officials to consult non-officials in cases of dispute about the observance of religious ceremonies and of doubt about the character of buildings alleged to be places of worship, but also attempted to save the proposed Committee the labour of framing the statutory powers of the Conciliation Boards. We are not in love with vague schemes and must confess that the name of Conciliation Boards, which came to India when it was the fashion in England, after Sir George Asquith's first successes as a conciliator in industrial disputes, to talk of them, did not prove as soothing to us as the word Mesopotamia to a certain old lady. Nevertheless we think it is a mistake to make a scheme too definite in the resolution itself. More definition means increased chances of differences of opinion, and therefore more difficulties if a division is called for. Sir Fazulbhai's resolution itself gives to the Conciliation Boards statutory powers to arbitrate in all cases of differences relating to the observance of ceremonies; to take necessary action for the prevention of violence and riots connected with such differences; and to adjudicate upon the nature of the premises to be acquired which are claimed by Hindus or Mussalmans as places of worship. It is quite possible that a practicable scheme of Conciliation Boards with such statutory powers could be framed. But, on the other hand, it is not quite certain and, under the circumstances the deadweight of these conditions is likely to handicap the Committee charged with the duty of framing a workable scheme.

Sir Fazulbhai's Resolution.

To our mind it would have been better to leave the Committee perfectly free to propose what statutory powers it should give to Conciliation Boards, while imposing on it the duty of framing a scheme for the creation of such Boards as auxiliaries to the officials now responsible for making arrangements for the peaceful observance of Hindu and Moslem religious and quasi-religious ceremonies, a scheme which should nevertheless provide that the officials should be required to consult them on all such occasions. As for the adjudication of the nature of premises claimed by people as places of worship, obviously the matter is one in which only members of the Board belonging to the community which claims the premises in question as a place of worship can be entrusted with jurisdiction, and equally obviously here they must act as sole judges and not as mere auxiliaries to officials who may not be of the same faith. The Hon. Sir Fazulbhai defined the proposal still further in the course of his excellent speech. He explained that the seats on the Boards should be equally divided among Hindus and Mussalmans; that residence in the locality must be necessary as a qualification of eligibility for election; that the Boards should be permanent organisations with a corporate existence, but the members must change periodically; that, unlike arbitrators, they should have statutory powers to take cognisance of disputes upon information irrespective of the wishes of the parties; that in taking precautionary measures for the prevention of violence and riots the initiative should come from the Boards; and that they should guide the executive with their counsels and share in this matter the responsibility of the executive. These, we take it, are the personal views of Sir Fazulbhai, and he did not wish the Committee which he proposed to be bound by them though they deserve its best consideration. Had he, then, also included some of the details of his resolution in the category of his personal views it would have been equally wise, as it would have deprived the resolution of its cast-iron rigidity. In view of the result of the resolution we think Sir Fazulbhai, or, if necessary, some other hon. member should move for the formation of a Committee requiring it to frame a scheme of Conciliation Boards for the general purpose which we have suggested, while leaving the Committee greater scope for its constructive talents than Sir Fazulbhai's resolution left it. And we do not think it necessary to confine the Committee to members of the Imperial Legislative Council, for the inclusion of some members of Provincial Councils and some distinguished Indians, not necessarily Hindu or Moslem, who are not members of any Legislature, would be a distinct improvement.

Better Procedure.

The Hon. Sir Fazulbhai Currimbhai Ebrahim on the 4th instant moved in the Imperial Legislative Council a resolution for the appointment of a Committee of the Council, composed of Conciliation.

Hindu and Mahomedan members for preparing a draft scheme for the formation of Conciliation Boards with statutory powers to arbitrate in cases of differences between the two communities as regards the observance of religious and social ceremonies, to take necessary action for the prevention of violence and riots connected with such observance, and to adjudicate upon the nature of premises proposed to be acquired by public bodies or companies and claimed by either Hindus or Mahomedans as places of worship. Whatever one may think of such a proposal, it cannot be gainsaid that it is one more sign of the times, indicating unmistakably that both communities have had enough of fighting with each other and are desirous of a rapprochement. The hon. mover quoted the authority of the Imperial Gazetteer to show that Hindus and Mussalmans have lived peacefully together. "By degrees the fervid enthusiasm of the 'early raiders' was softened down; the two religions learned to live 'side by side.'" He also cited the testimony of Sir John Strachey in proof of the religious tolerance of Moslem rulers. "The Mahomedan sovereigns usually treated their subjects, in matter of religion, 'with great tolerance.'" Considering that the contact of Islam with Hinduisms commenced early in the eighth century, and that after eight hundred years of Moslem rule, we found the Hindu community in a fairly flourishing condition no whit behind the Moslem subjects of the Great Moghal in moral qualities and material possessions, thus indicating better than the mere words of a chronicler an era of substantial equality of rights and privileges, and considering that there exist to day innumerable Hindu temples dating from ancient times untouched by iconoclastic hands, it would have been superfluous for the Hon. Sir Fazulbhai to quote the Imperial Gazetteer and Sir John Strachey, had not a school of politicians, masquerading as latter-day historians, considered it a religious duty to give a wrong perspective to every intolerant action of a Moslem King or governor and to misinterpret others and of a wholly different character as intolerant actions. Maulana Shibli, whose just and able interpretation of Aurangzeb's character and administration deserves amplification and an English garb could not tolerate these false charges of intolerance. After painting an exquisite word-picture of the marriage procession of Jodhbai whom Jehangir, then heir to the throne of Akbar, had married in order to obliterate the differences between rulers and ruled, he scornfully says to the Anglo-Indian "politician-historian" :

دلہن کی بالکی خود اپنی کندھوں پر جولای تھی * وہ شہنشاہ اکبر اور جہانگیر اکبر تھا
ہی میں وہ شہیم انگیزان عطر محبت کی * کہ جن سی بوستان ہند برسوں تک مسطر تھا
نہیں لی دیکھی ساری داستان میں یاد آتا ہے کہ «عالمگیر ہندو کشن تھا، ظالم تھا، سنگوٹھا»

(Those who had carried the bride's palanquin on their shoulders were the Emperor Akbar and Jehangir son of Akbar. Thus was scattered the fragrance of the essence of love on account of which the Garden of India was for years and years afterwards fragrant. But all that you remember out of the entire story is this, that "Alamgir was the destroyer of Hindus, was oppressive, and was cruel") We need not, however, live long in the past, for the present is with us and we must so shape it as to evolve for the future a unity of feeling and purpose unknown even to Akbar.

PARTLY as a result of the Hindu consciousness of newly-acquired power, which made a certain amount of ostentation as natural as it was needless and even capable of producing mischief, and partly as a result of the consequent Moslem resentment, and the unjustified Moslem ascription of most of their misfortunes to the deliberate actions of "the rival community," the two communities began to drift apart, and, much as we should like to commend the actions of English officials as the blessed peace-makers, we regret we cannot endorse the testimonial that Sir Reginald Craddock gave on the 4th instant to "every Local Government, Commissioner and District Magistrate" for aiming at "holding the balance even between the conflicting claims of various religious communities." At any rate, whatever the aim of "every Local Government, Commissioner and District Magistrate," we know better than Sir Reginald Craddock what the people themselves have on occasions thought about the inclinations of individual officers. This even Sir Reginald cannot deny that the relations of the two great communities of India have been deplorable during the last quarter of a century. But we have reason to believe that in this case also the darkness is the greatest because it just precedes the dawn. Both communities eagerly await the dawn, for the night has been long and dreary. Whether the sun breaks through the dark clouds sooner or later depends for the most part on the two communities themselves and on the intensity of their desire for the dawn. But it will be nothing short of political prudery if we shrink from saying that British officials are also expected to show greater keenness in desiring an early consummation and more practical good-will towards projects of conciliation. It was, indeed, kind of Major Blakeaway to suggest that a request needs to Government to intervene in the manner proposed in Sir Fazulbhai's resolution cast an undeserved reflection on the two communities as it implied that they were incapable of arriving voluntarily at mutual agreement on disputable questions. And the resolution suffers from the apparent defect of asking Government to appoint a Committee of the Council for devising a scheme of Conciliation Boards when the Councillors could do it for themselves. But without being unkind enough to cast an equally undeserved reflection on the officials by supposing that they believe in the old maxim of "divide and rule," we can say that a participation of Government even in the appointment of a Committee such as the Council is could themselves appoint would give additional proof of the good-will of Government towards the object which every right-thinking man, whether Hindu or Moslem, English or Indian, must have in view.

The Peace-Makers.

It would be foolish to pretend that the problem for which the Conciliation Boards and Official Critics.

suggested a method of finding a solution presents no difficulties. It bristles with difficulties at every turn and it would heavily tax the good-will as well as the talents of all that desire a happy solution of the problem. We have ourselves pointed out in a general manner the weakness of the resolution moved in the Council and we do not deny that some of the views expressed by Sir Fazulbhai in the course of his speech are open to criticism. But we must confess we did not think the Government would be so bankrupt in criticism as to press into service such objections as the Hon. the Home Member pointed out in the course of his official pronouncement. That the appointment of a Committee of the Council for drafting a scheme of Conciliation Boards would be unconstitutional; that disputes were not confined to large centres where the hon. Mover sought to establish the Boards; that there was no standard Municipal model on which the Boards could be established; that the hon. Mover did not say what sort of franchise there should be for the election of members of the Board; that where there was great numerical disparity between the communities the numerical equality of the two in the composition of the Boards would give rise to accusations of ignoring the relative interest of the parties; that disputes were not confined to Hindus and Mussalmans alone; that Boards qualified to deal with observance of religious ceremonies would not necessarily be qualified to deal with the observance of social ceremonies, and vice versa; that arbitrators in the Boards would not be wholly disinterested; that the Boards had no executive; that the police and Magistrates could not be divested of their powers with a view to bestow them on the Boards; that Hindus could not pronounce on the sanctity of Moslem places of worship and vice versa; that if the heads of communities concerned could arrive at an agreement there was no need of statutory powers, and that if they could not, the statutory powers could not give them the necessary agreement; that in disputes sober and moderate men alone could act as arbitrators, but by election most probably the hot-heads would be selected—this long array of objections can only deceive the unthinking and the indifferent with their apparent strength. In the first place, Sir Fazulbhai was moving a resolution for the appointment of a Committee to frame a scheme, and not moving the adoption of a set and dried scheme itself. Hence it was useless to expect him to give details of the franchise or even to object to the resolution itself on the ground that in his speech he expressed certain personal views about which differences of opinion could legitimately exist. And in the next place, it is absurd to believe that any scheme could ever be evolved for anything in the wide wide world which would present no difficulties. What is certain is that the existing arrangements satisfy neither the Hindus nor the Mussalmans as the speeches of non-official members clearly showed, and what was demanded of us at the present moment was not even to compare the present unsatisfactory conditions with the prospective benefits of a conjectural scheme to be framed in future, but merely to judge and determine whether a Committee such as Sir Fazulbhai had proposed could with any hope of advantage and with any confidence be entrusted with the task of framing an alternative scheme. This being so, let us examine a little the objection that the Mover was asking Government to take an unconstitutional step.

We fail to see what is unconstitutional in the appointment by Government of a Committee of Hindus and Mussalmans to frame such a scheme. Have Official Preserves and Non-Official Poachers.

Government no power to appoint Committees for advising them as to the best solution of an important administrative problem? And if they have what is there to prevent their confining the personnel of such a Committee to Hindu and Moslem Members of the Imperial Legislature, although we ourselves are opposed to this suggestion? But the question is obviously not one of the powers of Government which no one knows better than the Hon. the Home Member to be ample for all purposes. The question is whether the Executive Government approves of the desire of "the chosen representatives of the people of India", as His Majesty the Emperor himself called the non-official members of the Council, to share with the Executive the responsibility of administration and the initiative in legislation. The Hon. Member for Commerce showed fairly clearly what the Executive thought of these "encroachments" when Sir Fazulbhai desired that a Committee of the Council should examine the whole subject of the English Mail arrangements, although Mr. Clark did not wish to insist on this aspect of the matter. Sir Reginald Craddock stands on less firm ground, for this is not merely an administrative question but if it had been desired to alter the existing arrangements, it would have necessitated legislation. Nevertheless the Hon. the Home Member was far more insistent than the Hon. Member for Commerce, and if we heard him aright he would deny all initiative in legislation to non-official members. That is obviously unconstitutional, for Private Bills have been brought in before, and will continue to be brought in, and it shows how reasonable non-official members are that before they bring in a Private Bill they desire to take steps to throw out the whole question in a Committee of their own instead of leaving such a difficult and many-sided problem to the unaided judgment of an individual. We trust some non-official member will raise the question of the alleged unconstitutionality and obtain the deliberate judgment of the entire Government of India on this subject.

As regards the other objection raised, let us assure Sir Reginald Craddock that in all matters a beginning has to be made, and, if any scheme of conciliation succeeds in preventing shameful quarrels between Hindus and Mussalmans over religious or quasi-religious ceremonies, it will not be merely an ordinary beginning but the beginning of the end. As regards the composition of the Boards, we can well understand that some wiseacre may talk of "relative interests" of the communities, and that perhaps another wiseacre may refer to "political importance." But a Government which can boast that every District Magistrate aims at holding the balance even could have been trusted to refer such wiseacres to the maxims of common-sense and the every day experience of mankind which give a perfect equality to each party in a dispute. At present Sir Reginald Craddock's objection may possibly be the proverbial red rag to a sufficiently enraged bull. Nevertheless we trust there is enough common-sense in the two communities to abjure all ideas of "relative interests" and "political importance" in connection with matters which if not subjected to arbitration would have to be fought over in law Courts where neither "relative interests" nor "political importance" are recognised. As for the qualification of the Boards to deal with social as well as religious ceremonies, and Hindus determining the character of Moslem places of worship, surely Sir Reginald's objection applies with tenfold force to the eligibility of the European official as the arbitrator in these matters, for he, as a rule, understands neither social nor religious etiquette. Is the Competition Wallah to be regarded as the Sab-janta Walla also? Perhaps the redoubtable Mr. Sin would vouchsafe a reply to this. And as for the disinterestedness of arbitrators, it is dangerous to deal frankly with the question after knowing the fate of the Zamindar and its criticism of the two pictures of Ajudhia at the Bakar 'Id, in 1912 and in 1913.

With one sentiment of Sir Reginald Craddock however, we can express our entire agreement. It is of no avail to cry Peace where there is no Peace. This advice is needed by the sentimentalist as well as the charlatan, for the sentimentalist stultifies himself by preaching unity when he asserts at the same time that what he would create is already in existence. Such efforts at self-deception and deceiving others we have consistently opposed even at the risk of appearing to revel in existing discord. But we also believe that by familiarising men with the idea of unity we also make them prone to reduce the feelings of discord which they themselves cherish. At any rate a great wave of conciliatory feelings has recently passed over the people, and if Sir Reginald Craddock also whole-heartedly joins in the cry of peace we feel certain there will be peace even if it is not. But surely the argument that if there is agreement between the leaders of the community statutory powers are superfluous and if there is no agreement such powers are of no advantage is one of the spaciousness of which needs no arguments to-day when in New Zealand compulsory conciliation has been tried with success, and in English and Irish industrial disputes every effort short of compulsion is made to bring the disputants together and create peace where peace does not exist. For instance, when we know that there is no agreement between the Orangemen in Ulster and the Irish Nationalist, nor between the English supporters of the two, or it of no avail to try to bring agreement about by a round table Conference of the two of which we have heard so much? The fact is we are apt to magnify small differences from a distance, and it is only by bringing disputants together that we discover how petty they are and how easy is the solution of such exaggerated difficulties.

One word more and we have done. Has not the time come for the officials to discover some other pot than the champions of "sobriety and moderation" and some other bogey than "hot-headed youngsters"? Surely they have now become only too stale, flat and unprofitable. If anybody of people is young in India it is the bureaucracy, which often places its babies and sucklings in charge of whole districts and does not permit any one above the age of 55 to remain in the country, though we must confess heat seems to increase in this case with age, as if a Sinking Fund of bad temper had been established and the annual accumulations were at 55 in excess of the maximum fixed for the boiler. Indian experience shows that the champions of "sobriety and moderation" are the worst bigots, and official pets have only to be named to prove them guilty to the hilt of fomenting quarrels between Hindus and Mussalmans, and Sannies and Shiaks. If we seek guidance from English experience, the ages of Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Churchill and Mr. F. E. Smith will only prove that howsoever hot-headed youth may be, no outstanding differences can be finally settled unless these real representatives of the people who are keenly interested in their welfare and understand the nature of the differences can agree on some plan of settlement. The "sober and moderate" are only too often synonymous with the "ill informed and the indifferent," and it is of no avail if only they cry peace!

We publish elsewhere a letter (from Mr. Zafar Ali Khan which he has sent to us from London and in which he describes the vigorous of the Indian Press Laws and the efforts he is making in England to have them softened in some measure. The Press Act in its existing shape especially in view of the manner of its actual working, has created widespread dissatisfaction in India. Its safe-guards have been declared to be illusory, and unless better provision is made for discriminating between the guilty and the innocent, there will be no reasonable certainty of its judicious application. As ill-luck would have it, several Moslem papers have been dealt heavily by the Press Law and legitimate grievance has come to exist. The case of the Zamindar is an exceptionally sad one. We need not pronounce on the merits of the order forfeiting the Zamindar Press, but we are sure the Punjab Government is aware by this time that profound sympathy is felt by the Mussalmans for the proprietor who has had to bear misfortunes in rapid succession. The meeting of sympathy held in Delhi on Friday last was a great success in every way. Rs. 500 were subscribed on the spot for the fund that is being raised to resuscitate Zamindar and the organisers of the meeting expect to raise Rs. 5,000 from the people of Delhi. It was at the same time resolved to approach the Lieutenant Governor of the Panjab with an all-India memorial requesting His Honour to kindly reconsider the order of forfeiture. This is a line of action which we have ourselves followed and we are glad to find that others are equally desirous of following it. As regards the Press Act, we think that, although the education of British public opinion is in all matters a very desirable undertaking, efforts may with greater advantage be made in India also. The case for the necessary amendment of the Act if not its repeal is incontestable, and we are sure the considered judgment of the whole country will weigh greatly with a statesman of the broad minded sympathies of Lord Hardinge. We have not yet lost faith in the Government of India eventually realising the justice of our demand, and in the meantime it is our duty to go on pressing it in a reasonable spirit and without importing unnecessary heat into the controversy.

The Forfeiture of the "Zamindar Press."

We have already noticed at some length the secrecy that surrounded the coming of the Ottoman Consul-General to Delhi and the way in which the carpet was smuggled into the mosque. We have also made it clear that the Mussalmans of Delhi felt deep indignation and disappointment when they learnt that somebody had made them the victims of a practical joke. The whole affair seemed to have been stage-managed from start to finish—only the Deputy Commissioner's chaprassi and the invisible mosque authorities had the stage and the auditorium completely to themselves. Whether such a thorough going measure of secrecy was at all justified in the circumstances it is hardly worth our while to discuss. If the Mussalmans had been allowed to carry out their own arrangements for a public demonstration in honour of the Consul-General and receive the gift of the Caliph with all due ceremony, they would have felt deeply grateful. It is worth remembering, however, that the sympathies of the Indian Moslems for their Turkish brethren or their sentiment of reverence for the Caliph cannot be chilled by cold douches administered in any inopportune manner. Hundreds of the Delhi Moslems went to the railway station as soon as they heard late in the afternoon that the Consul-General was coming. The exact time of his arrival was, however, not known, and many of them not being certain whether he was coming at all, besides being hungry after a long and hot day's waiting, went back disappointed to their homes. When the Consul-General arrived at midnight, there were still a few hundreds of people on the platform to greet him. In the mosque the following day the large congregation of some fifteen thousand people that had assembled for the Jum'a prayers and in evident expectation to see the representative of the Caliph, burnt with eager desire to express their feelings of brotherly love for his nation and their sentiments of respect and reverence for his Sovereign. The Consul-General, however, owing to the extreme delicacy of his official position, naturally wished that there should be no demonstration that might be embarrassing to him. He could not shake hands with every body, but there were still hundreds who pressed forward eagerly to kiss the hem of his garments. There is no danger whatever if these harmless feelings are allowed a natural outlet. In fact a frank and open acceptance of a natural sentiment and even more so its appreciation would endear England to the Moslem masses.

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

IV.

To-day we turn to the debate in the Imperial Legislative Council initiated by the Hon. Mr. Surendra Nath Bannerjee on the 9th January, on the subject of the Press Act and our explanation for the delay in commenting on the discussion is that the majority of the people the points discussed would have been far from clear if we had not previously discussed the main provisions of the Act as interpreted by so competent an authority as a Bench of the three seniormost Judges of the Calcutta High Court.

We have explained in the earlier articles on the Press Act what was claimed for it by the framers of the Press Bill when they enacted it in 1908, and how badly the theory has fared in actual practice, and more particularly we have shown in the last article how devoid of all reality is the reference to the judiciary. It is, however, necessary to begin our review of the Council debate by stating what the resolution of Mr. Bannerjee did not demand before we discuss what it actually demanded, for the omissions of the resolution are even more important than its modest demand.

Now the mainspring of the whole Act is section 4 sub-section (1) which was designed to indicate what constitutes an offence under the Act. It is the publication of words, signs or visible representations of a certain character described in this part of the Act which makes the keeper of a Press liable to forfeit his primary security and his secondary security together with his entire Press. It is such a publication that makes the publisher of a newspaper liable to forfeit his primary and secondary securities. Again, it is such a publication that makes the possessor of a book, newspaper or other document liable to forfeit his book, newspaper or other document, whether he may have only a single copy thereof or a hundred thousand. These are punishments, obviously enough and fairly severe at that, though it was claimed for the Act that it was a preventive and not a punitive measure. If a man is to be punished for an offence it will be readily conceded that he should know wherein he has offended; but when a measure is enacted to prevent offences it is all the more necessary to make it clear wherein lies the offence. This is too obvious to need further insistence, for even a dog-fancier would not punish a puppy without previously making some crude efforts at least to teach it what to do and what to abstain from doing. But here we have not a punitive but a preventive measure, an enactment, which, as the Hon. Mr. Vijayraghavan pointed out, was intended by its sponsors to take the place of public opinion in India and was expected to prove to be a "wholesome and beneficial measure of national education;" and yet even the three seniormost Judges of the Calcutta High Court cannot say what kind of publications are offensive under the Act and what inoffensive and innocuous. "The section embraces," in the words of the great Chief Justice of Bengal, "the whole range of varying degrees of assurance from certainty on the one side to the very limits of impossibility on the other."

Sir Reginald Craddock referring to our Pamphlet Case, takes comfort in expressing the thought, if not in the thought itself, that the learned Chief Justice "committed himself to no specific statement that the interpretation placed upon the document then before the Court by the Government was itself far-fetched or arbitrary." Surely it was of no avail for the Chief Justice to "commit himself to any specific statement" of the character about the particular pamphlet when he had already committed himself to half a dozen statements, each more specific than the other, about the general character of the law describing the offence, which made it an almost hopeless task for the most innocent applicant to prove the negative which the law required him to prove. If every thing is an offence, and no applicant can succeed in having the order of the executive upset by a judiciary left impotent in practice, whether by design or accident, why should the judges waste time ever adjudicating elaborately on the degree of assurance between the polar opposites of the certain and the impossible with which a publication can be called offensive according to the Act? But the Chief Justice expressed his opinion about the pamphlet quite clearly for all the world to see—except those, of course, of whom it is said: "None are so blind as those who will not see"—that the order of forfeiture was arbitrary and far-fetched. "The pamphlet," said the Chief Justice, "would doubtless bring into hatred the un-Christian Christians whose deeds of atrocity are described. The theory presented is that the reflection of this hatred might fall, not indeed on the Government, but on His Majesty's Christian or English subjects in British India. If this is the Government's view, with all the information at its disposal, the Court, no more informed than the man in the street, cannot (in my opinion) affirm this could not be so, and affirm it with a degree of assurance that would entitle it to set aside a measure of safety on which the Government had solemnly resolved." This judgment has to be taken in conjunction with Sir Lawrence pointing out of the absurd anomaly which in his opinion "leads to a curious result." It is the omission (probably due to "an oversight as the Chief Justice says,") of the Explanations to section 158A of the Indian Penal Code, though the Explanations to section 124A have been incorporated in the Press Act. The result is that if certain writings are alleged "to bring into hatred or contempt His Majesty or the Government by law established in British India," or "to excite disaffection towards His Majesty or the said Government," it may be urged in the defence of such writings that they were only "comments expressing disapproval of the measure of Government with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means, or of the administrative or other action of the Government without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection," and therefore "do not come within the scope" of the law describing the offence; but if they are alleged to bring into hatred or contempt only a "class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India," it is of no avail to urge in a Press Act case, though it is a satisfactory explanation in a case under the Indian Penal Code that the writing "point out, without malicious intention and with an honest view to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce, feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of His Majesty's subjects" and thus "it does not amount to an offence within the meaning of this section." Now the learned Advocate-General had already stated in Court that "he attributes no criminal offence" to us and in the words of the judgment "he was even willing to concede and believe" we were "acting in the highest interest of humanity and civilization." Bearing in mind these considerations the Hon. the Chief Justice wrote in his judgment that "had the Press Act incorporated the explanation to section 158A, it has that to section 124A, we might perhaps have made a very strong case in view of the Advocate-General's admission as to the character of the pamphlet and our purpose and intentions." All this can leave no doubt in the mind of any reasonable person that but for the all-comprehensive words of grounds 4 sub-section (1) and the absence of a statement of the grounds of the Government's opinion we should have not only retained our character but also regained our book. If this does not satisfy Sir Reginald Craddock the fault is not that of Sir Lawrence Jenkins, whose remarkably restrained expression of opinion is in such glaring contrast to the blunt and downright utterances of those who never let slip an opportunity of running down the judiciary whenever it shows its independence. It is true that one of the judges, Sir Harry Stephen, very hesitatingly characterized the gradient from "a hatred of the Allies" to "a hatred of the co-religionists of the Allies" as "but a short step." But is it fair to lace the judgment of Sir Harry Stephen, by detaching this sentence from the one immediately following it and from another with which he commenced his adjudication on the facts of the case? Did not Sir Harry Stephen begin by saying: "Under the circumstances I have no doubt that any opinion I may express will be received by others with the respect that is due to the office I have the honour to hold, but it will be impossible for me to share in this feeling?" And did he not conclude in the same spirit when he said he had no doubts about the distance between the two feelings, "a hatred of the Allies" and "a hatred of the co-religionists of the Allies", but that "the absence of doubt is probably due to the absence of evidence, and cannot be taken as going far towards showing that the opinion is correct."

But it is not our purpose here to play the understudy to that brilliant advocate, Mr. Eardley Norton, who fought for us so valiantly, so eloquently and so generously, and to argue the Pamphlet Case over again. The Hon. Dr. Kenrick will forgive us if we express the universal opinion of the Calcutta Bar that he came off a distant second best in that forensic contest, and the Hon. the Home Member would perhaps disdain even a comparison with mere advocates of the Calcutta High Court instead of minding the opinion that his own arguments against the pamphlet in the Council debate are merely an indistinct echo of the learned Advocate-General's. Our purpose was to show that in the opinion of those competent to interpret the law, the words of the section describing the offence are so wide that practically nothing can escape them. In other words, no one is in a position to know whether anything that he has published in his Press or in his newspaper or that any other person has published in a book or newspaper or other document in his possession is offensive or not, until, of course, a declaration of forfeiture is published in the official Gazette. The first condition of all penal legislation is that it should be certain and clear. That condition the Press Act with the all-embracing provisions of section 4 sub-section (1) on the showing of the three seniormost Judges of the Calcutta High Court does not fulfil. That being the case, we do not see why any such law as the Press Act was ever enacted. Government could have announced in the twentieth century their reversion to the well-known maxim in the Institutes of Emperor Justinian that the will of the ruler has the force of law. Why did the late Sir Herbert Risley offer a long and elaborate explanation of the Bill and its urgent need? Why did Mr. S. P. Sinha, besides the great assurance of his own loyalty at another's offering, give the assurances and pledges that have now proved so inconvenient? Why were three whole days wasted as an interval between the presentation and the passage of the Bill? And why were so many non-official members, including the Hon. Mr. Gokhale, made to generate 'gas'? A plain blunt announcement that, as in the case of deportations under Regulation III of 1818, Local Governments perched on Himalayan heights would fling bolts from the blue from which nobody who incurred the wrath of the gods would be immune, and against which no appeal to any other power would lie, would have spared all the fever and the fret in 1908, all those wranglings in 1913 about mandatory conditions and absence of jurisdiction, and all the idle talk now about offending words or articles or pictures etc. Orientals are generally condemned as fatalists, and had the adoption of Justinian's legal maxim been then announced, whosoever was stricken, surrendering himself to a grim and inexorable fate after, would have quietly lain himself to die. No meetings of protest, no questions asked or resolutions moved in Council. No, not even a groan as the Tauhid died and the Zumindar breathed its last.

But if Government is ashamed of retrogression till it crawled on all fours, then we are entitled to ask that something more should be provided by way of a safeguard than the mere assurance that the Heads of Local Governments are angels that cannot sin even if they would and that they breathe the pure air of a world entirely different from our own where neither the fumes of passion, nor of prejudice nor of pride and prestige taint the atmosphere. The mists that enveloped the gods on Olympus are fast disappearing, and if the gaze of the worshippers below is directed too much towards them, the fear is that they may sink into commonplace mortals, in some cases possibly quite as vulgar and petty at heart, in spite of differences of surroundings, as the devotees themselves. Too much insistence on their divinity may not prove the height of wisdom, for it is just possible that divinity may disappear never to return again, and even ordinary humanity may come to be denied or at least doubted.

So much for the Hon. the Home Members' well meant assurance that "the Acts in the Statute-Book are full of large powers reserved to Local Governments, and it is always assumed that the Local Governments is a responsible body who will exercise those powers with reason and discretion." We have already seen that the reference to the judiciary has at present no reality, and therefore it is equally futile to assure us that "no Local Government is going to publish abroad, or take action which may come before the public or the High Court which is likely to show that it has acted in a very foolish and irresponsible manner." In fact, we propose to show in another article in this series how little these considerations have weighed with the all-wise and responsible Local Governments, and when the facts of the Badr case are published the Hon. the Home Member may perhaps desire to modify his assurance. The fact is that, after Sir Lawrence Jenkins's judgment even more than before, Local Governments feel so secure of an uninterrupted autocracy responsible to none but to their own good conscience as to give rise to grave apprehension. It may be that unless the law is modified they may degenerate into petty despotisms run by Under-Secretaries assisted by the original translators of the C. I. D., a couple of titled "loyalists" and the "smart" Sub-Inspector of Police. If the reference to the judiciary is at least sometimes a necessary check, as even the Hon. the present Home Member must confess, then what needs attention above all else is section 4 sub-section (1) and, para-logical as it may appear, we have to commence our comments on the debate of 9th January by regretting that the Hon. Mr. Bannerjee's resolution left this part of the Act altogether untouched. We reserve for another occasion a discussion of the alterations that must be made before the Act can be considered even presentable, and it should suffice to state here that no scheme of modification can be deemed even modestly good unless section 4 sub-section (1) is materially amended.

The Indian Moslem's Tasks.

VI.

If one could indulge in the dangerous pastime of generalisation without unduly offending one's intellectual sensibilities, it would be only to say that all generalisation is dangerous. This may or may not be the sort of truism that speedily pass through the popular mind and become current coin. But it is all the same the one great fact of intimate experience that meets the humble plodder after Truth everywhere as he comes across error, ugliness and absurdity in human affairs. We need not refer to history, on whose pages the truth of this observation is writ very large, to inquire how some explosive half-truth disguised as a great religious doctrine or philosophical principle has caught on like a paraffin fire and played havoc with the fortunes of man. We would only take an example of contemporary experience which would amply prove how far this insatiable intellectual vice can become a great power for evil in the lives of nations and communities. The relations between the East and the West have an immemorial history. There is nothing so remarkable in the current modes of thought which govern the existing relations between them as the contents of the terms known as "the East" and "the West." They no longer represent the two divisions of the earth originally known to Geography, they are used to mark the gulf of spirit that is supposed to divide the races of mankind inhabiting Europe and Asia. In "the East" or "the Orient" is lumped together at one sweep a whole series of impressions, feelings and judgments that an average European has inherited or acquired about the psychology, character, temperament, mentality and aptitude of the Asiatic, in short, about his whole nature and destiny as man. The mental attitude of the European has been formed in a large measure by the stock generalities which permeate the very air he breathes. These are his indispensable aids and short-cuts to thought, as necessary, in fact, for the sluggish movements of his mind as a crutch to the cripple. They have been devised and fashioned for his use by a large army of industrious triflers—the so-called "experts" who live to prove the paradox that the part is larger than the whole. "The primitive mind with its untutored instincts and child-like curiosity peopled the world with spirits, which were at least human in their likes and dislikes. The modern pseudo-scientist has created a new mythology, and made the universe the sport of new gods—the ruthless, implacable "Laws" and "Principles" whose name is legion. "The East" is one of the myths of the pseudo-science of Europe, one of those breathless and sweeping generalisations, with a host of corollaries, which crib, cabin and confine human spirit and throw a dark and dismal shadow across history. "The East is unchanging and—unchangeable." "The East is East etc. etc." These are a few facets of the Truth whose image is being unveiled in the politico-scientific laboratories of Europe. Democracy and parliament and other social and political institutions that can only flourish in a Western climate, are of course unthinkable in the East. This may be true or false—at least there are no sufficient data to form a judgment, in spite of the European verdicts on the constitutional experiments in Turkey, Persia and China. But even granting that it is true, that the nations in the East cannot imitate Western political institutions with success, the circumstance can have no higher significance than that the lines of human development are chiefly determined by heredity and environment. And Western wisdom has itself pronounced that the influences transmitted by heredity can be modified and that environment is subject to constant change. And yet the mere fact, that in some of its visible social and political aspects Asia differs from Europe, has been flung as an eternal reproach on the peoples of the East. It constitutes their badge of inferiority, the basis of their social disinheritance, the sentence of their political death.

Are the peoples of Asia, after all, so irrevocably and absolutely damned? The question is absurd, but even absurd questions sometimes become menacing problems in the lives of communities. Woman is still suffering from the effects of a man-made social philosophy, and the peoples of Asia are similarly in danger of falling into self-contempt under the spell of the pseudo-scientific dogmas of Europe. Measured by the tests of political power and material affluence the European communities are undoubtedly in the van of progress, and the Eastern races occupy a far lower position. That is no reason, however, why the latter should lose all self-respect or consider themselves eternally stamped with failure and incapacity. They have not followed the line of political development traced by Europe, and this may be taken to be their most obvious failing or misfortune. The causes that account for this are not a part of their character and psychology, but are mere accidents of history. The European races owe their marvellous political consciousness and cohesion to the fact that the earliest experiments in the constitution of the State took their origin among small communities confined within narrow geographical limits. These experiments fixed the type and the ideal for all subsequent ages. Through changes, and revolutions and racial entanglements the ideal endured. The experience of the early races trained in civic duty and active social purpose became a powerful inspiration, and the State with but temporary lapses embodied a conscious or unconscious effort on the part of the people to conform to the original type. Political activity became part of the general habit of the individual. The modern European has naturally inherited the habit in full measure. In the East, on the other hand, the development of the State has been wholly different in character. Asia not only comprises a large portion of the earth's surface, but is itself divided into vast stretches of plains, with fertile soil and genial climate, capable of rearing and maintaining huge populations. These facts—mere geographical accidents, so to speak—have had a profound influence on the political development of the Asiatic races. Vast communities spread over enormous areas and exposed to easy attack and pillage, need strong military forces under the absolute control of capable and trusted leaders. The system contains ample germs for the final growth of autocracy and dictatorship. Successful military rulers, fired with ambition and finding few physical obstacles to the mobility of their armies, overran vast territories and founded dynastic empires. The political history of Asia has been but a sterile repetition of this, of great empires rising and falling with the rise and fall of great military adventurers. Under the weight of sheer vastness of effort and socio-political experiments on an enormous scale the political instincts of the peoples were crushed almost to death. They gradually lost the sense of political responsibility and became, what has been truly said, State-blind. Their spirit became imprisoned within them and sought consolation in intense religious life. The loss of political individuality ceased to be felt when the mind found new values of life and the heart became attuned to the new voices from beyond the grave. Race, nationality, country—all these ceased to have any meaning. Religion became the supreme test of social unity and the foundation of all social life.

These observations form the necessary setting of the most anxious problem that modern India has got to face. Those who talk, sometimes with glib assurance, of the evolution of an Indian nationality forget the magnitude of the process it involves. It means nothing less than that diverse communities, that have been State-blind for centuries, that have owned no master but religion, that have felt no loyalty as exacting as their devotion to their creeds, that have measured their social duty and purpose in terms of the ideals of their faiths, should transfer their allegiance, loyalty and devotion, at least in part, to another abstraction known as "Motherland" and recast their social values in the light of this new secular enthusiasm. The demand, no doubt noble in intent, involves a tremendous change in mental outlook and social temperament. There are only two ways in which it can be met. Either religion itself should furnish the basis of co-operation among the different communities for all secular purposes, or as a supreme motive of conduct and endeavour it should give place to Nationalism. Thanks to the influences and teachings of the West, the demand is growing insistent in India and it shall have to be met in one way or the other. The scope of individual aim and desires is expanding and the pall of inertia is lifting from the spirit of the people. Mr. H. G. Wells in his new story, "The World Set Free," which is continued in the January English Review, describes the "New spirit" of the year 1970 in the following passage which bears some resemblance to the new spirit of the India of to-day:—

There was already dawning the light of a new era. The spirit of humanity was escaping, even then it was escaping, from its extreme imprisonment in individuals. Salvation from the bitter intensities of self, which had been a conscious religious end for thousands of years, which men had sought in mortification, in wilderness, in meditation and by innumerable strange paths, was coming at last with the effect of naturalness into the talk of men, into the books they read, into their unconscious gesture, into their newspapers and daily purposes and every-day acts. The broad horizons, the magic possibilities that the spirit of the secker had revealed to them were charming them out of those ancient and instinctive pre-occupations from which the very threat of hell and torment had failed to drive them.

This emancipation of the human spirit from the thralldom of the rusting traditions of old, which Mr. Wells forecasts with such vividness, is in a not altogether dissimilar sense taking place in India even now. Political consciousness is reviving, people are beginning to think more and more of their present limitations and future possibilities, self is emerging from its retirement within a rarified religious emotionalism and recovering the old human confidence in its powers to create the social and political environment which should breathe the spirit of the ideals that feed pure religious instincts. In a state of absolute political coma the individual found the freedom of his spirit only in religion. But it was not a complete religious life that he could live. All religion postulates social duty and a deliberate effort to organise the wills of individuals into that powerful and effective instrument known as the State. Political despotism in the East, however, maimed and dwarfed the social and political faculties of the individual, and while on the one hand the religious life of communities became impoverished, on the other hand the religious faith of the individual turned upon itself and grew more intensified within him. And now that the breath of freedom has blown into the lives of ancient communities and individuality is beginning to have ampler scope, religion is entering on its fuller sphere of influence and beginning to inspire men with fresh conceptions of social duty and endeavour. In India the process has gone on at a rapid pace. Those who imagined that Western ideas would act like a bomb shell amidst the spiritual lives of the Indian communities and ancient creeds would crumble into dust, had no historical sense and were ignorant of the great truth that it was only religion that had kept the Indian society from disintegration in spite of the utter paralysis that had struck down its political organs. And now that its political organs are stirring into fresh life, religious force is becoming correspondingly active and strong and regaining its natural influence over society and politics. This is a fact of the deepest significance in the life of modern India. An intense spirit of religious reform and revivalism broke forth some decades ago and its force has not yet spent itself. The assault of latter-day agnosticism has made no impression on the citadel of belief in India. This should, we think, dispose of the contention that Indian Nationalism would be a development of free-thinking and would derive its strength mainly from the confusion, decay and death of the religious beliefs amongst the Indian people. According to all present indications, the only kind of Nationalism that India can have would be a natural growth out of her religious consciousness. The Indian Nationality would be a synthesis of the various religious communities that would unite together and act for secular ends. Patriotism would be a part of one's loyalty to one's faith and not a betrayal and an infidelity.

Such, in brief, is the forecast about the future that the present-day tendencies in India would seem to suggest. Indian Nationalism would be a spurious thing if it does not spring from the faiths of the people. The efforts of the best minds of India are being resolutely directed to the building up of a united Indian nationality. This end has been kept consciously in view ever since Western education first led the educated Indians to dream about the future of their country. But the aim has not yet come appreciably nearer to being realised. As a matter of fact, the very framing of the ideal of a united nationality has evoked race antagonisms and the most pronounced types of communal patriotism. In the circumstances such developments were natural. The cry of Nationalism was accompanied with still louder cries about democratic institutions and representative self-government. The inspiration that worked behind them had clearly come from the teachings and examples of the West. The educated Indian, who in his newly recovered political consciousness began to enthuse about the political and social methods and ideals of Europe, unconsciously scared the communities that were numerically weak and offended ancient loyalties of the mass of the people which tugged with remarkable force at the roots of immemorial instincts. The result has been that, though the ideal of Indian unity has continued to appeal with growing force to educated India, the type of Nationalism first preached from the Indian political platforms has given birth to various doubts, misgivings and conflicts. A Mussalman felt as if he were asked to transfer his allegiance from Islam to "Nationalism" and "Motherland." Even the old, conservative Hindu, to whom the Bharat of the Vedas was not an unknown deity, shrank from the touch of such an iconoclast as Democracy and was afraid of admitting the new political gods of the West to his Pantheon. Politicians, that generally use words without wisdom, continued to harp on "Nationalism," and in the meantime their own acts led to the growth of an enormous class of educated men in different communities who dominate the political situation in India and can best be described as communal patriots. The ideal of Indian nationality has undoubtedly grown in attraction, but the Nationalism of the professional politician has alternately challenged and repulsed. As long as Indian Nationalism remains a doctrinaire conception, a measure of stop-gaps and patches, a mere intellectual illusion born of fatuous dreaming in the noon-day sun of Western glory, it would never go to the hearts of the people and receive their life-long service and devotion. Indian Nationalism cannot flourish as an exotic growth. It must derive its seed from the ethos of the people, and find its natural habitat in the spiritual soil of India.

The Hindu-Moslem problem, which in the main lies at the root of Indian unity, is nothing but the doubts and bitternesses engendered on both sides by foolish and fruitless attempts to impose a spurious type of Nationalism on a people whose religious consciousness has yet lost nothing of its primeval intensity. We would not touch on the small and trivial every-day acts in which communal distrust and petulance is expressed on either side with varying degrees of virulence. The problem in its broader aspects needs concentrated attention as its root causes are not very widely grasped and are liable to be obscured in the petty antagonisms of the day. It is no use insisting that the cause of Indian unity is sacred and great. Educated Indians, both Hindu and Mussalman, have no difference of attitude on this score. The real force that has created the gulf and still keeps the two communities apart has come from an incessant and hollow preaching of the type of Nationalism to which we have already referred a good deal. We do not think a conscious deception is being practised by astute politicians for small communal advantage. It is all due to a terrible intellectual confusion that has been responsible for many of the most awful miscarriages of aim in history. It is manifest, however, that growing political experience is producing sanity and proportion in the ideas of all earnest and intelligent men and all practical schemes about the future of India have as their postulates the central, unavoidable facts that neither the Mussalmans nor the Hindus can be suppressed and that both shall have to make a common cause for a common future. The basis of co-operation would be found in communal patriotism itself. Religion would supply the motive for as long a time as the eye can pierce. The common secular ends of humanity would be served through the purest inspiration of tolerant faiths. The Hindu-Moslem problem would be solved when the communal patriot develops this temper, when he makes his religious creed not a perpetual exercise in political hide-and-seek, but a beneficent influence which would address itself to social tasks and give the people purer lives, cleaner purpose and broader horizons. The deep forces of life are themselves driving with unerring certainty to the inevitable end. Only the little man with his aggressive ego should refrain from thrusting his pretentious finger across their path. With education, stress of circumstance and above all with a little human charity the most anxious problem of modern India would be solved. The Indian unity is bound to come sooner or later. It only depends on the Hindus and the Mussalmans themselves whether it will come sooner or later.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Forfeiture of the "Zamindar Press."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COMRADE, DELHI.

SIR—Reuter cabled the news of the forfeiture of the Zamindar Press on the 14th January and described the suppression as that of a paper which had the widest circulation of any Hindustani organ in India, and the recognised exponent of orthodox Pan-Islamism. Reuter's words probably mirror the attitude of the authorities with regard to the latest step they have taken. Up to this time I do not know why the forfeiture has been ordered by the Punjab Government although I have made two telegraphic enquiries from my people; but Reuter's words furnish the reply. The Press was forfeited because it printed a paper which was Pan-Islamic. Alas! the combined efforts of the Moslems in India to disabuse the mind of the authorities as to any sinister construction that might be put upon the word Pan-Islamism have failed in their effect and we see that the Moslem Press is being annihilated piecemeal. But I do not despair even yet. It is not for a Moslem to say "die". I am confident that the black shadow of official mistrust which hangs over the heads of the Indian Moslems will pass away very soon; only we must persevere in our attempts to make our position clear and try to convince the British public, or such sections of it as are not imprevions to the appeals of righteousness and justice, that we are the same old Moslems of two years ago who were prepared to lay down our very lives for upholding the prestige of Britain in every part of the world.

After the last fatal blow that has been dealt at the Zamindar I am afraid that the Comrade, the Hamdard and Al-Hilal are the only independent Moslem papers left in India to carry on the vigorous policy of Muslim development under the British flag and if—though Heaven forbid!—the same treatment is meted out to them as in the case of the Zamindar, the newly awakened Press life in Moslem India will revert to the early tattyism and sycophancy. It is time therefore that the Moslem public made one united effort to shake off the fearsome chain of bondage which is encircling them, and regain the liberty of which they have been so unjustly deprived. I do not know what effect the forfeiture of the Zamindar Press and a host of others has produced on the minds of my compatriots, although I am sure that it must be overwhelming in its indignant amazement and anguish. But it is no time for indignation, amazement, or anguish. Something must be done to bring about the undoing of what has been done. Meetings expressing grief and sympathy I am sure, must have been held throughout India, but no body knows anything about them in this country although there are people here who have a warm corner in their hearts for India and everything connected with it.

Like a mote dancing in the Imperial sunbeam, I have been doing what little lay in my power to stir up public opinion in England in the matter of the Press Act ever since my arrival here. I am so fortunate as to have the sympathy of two of the leading newspapers of England, the Daily News and Leader and the Manchester Guardian. The former has been publishing a number "of letters contributed by me on the various cases of flagrant injustice which Muslim editors have recently suffered under the Press Act."

I have also received letters of sympathy from many influential public men. Mr. John Dillon, M. P., writing from Dublin, says:—"You can count on my sympathy and my support in the House of Commons if the question of the Press Act in India is raised. I consider the treatment of the Mohamedan Press is most unjust and calculated to seriously injure the position of the British Government in India."

Mr. Keir Hardie, M. P. writes: "I am very much concerned about the suppression of the freedom of the Press alike in India and in Egypt. If that sort of thing is to be tolerated in the case of subject races it will soon extend to working class movements. What is now happening in South Africa is its logical outcome. I shall willingly aid in any action which may be taken in the House of Commons as I am sure would the Labour Party as a whole if approached."

Mr. Josiah Wedgewood, M. P. writes: "You have my entire sympathy. I am entirely opposed to the Press Laws and the rest of the repressive Acts, and you may count on any service that I can usefully render in Parliament."

Mr. Herbert Burrows, an eminent Socialist, in the course of a long letter says:—"With regard to your own case it seems to me that the best course open to you is to have it raised in Parliament, not in a perfunctory manner by a mere question or two but by an adequate debate if at all possible."

Mr. Phillip Snowden, M. P. writes a very sympathetic letter and says he will join in any Parliamentary protest.

Professor Brown, writing from Cambridge, says:—"It appears to me first of all necessary to provide a translation of the passage or passages to which the Government took objection and then to make the fact known if possible through one of the few remaining independent liberal papers in this country, for example the Nation or the Manchester Guardian."

It is an irony for which the Moslem London League alone could have been responsible, that as soon as the news of the suppression of the Zamindar Press was flashed to this country the British Committee of the Indian National Congress was the first to sympathise with me and to invite me to a meeting to enable me to make a statement. I explained my case and also the cases of other Moslem papers and Printing Presses on whom the authorities have laid a heavy hand. Sir Henry Cotton and a number of other eminent English sympathisers decided that a manifesto describing the serious situation created by the arbitrary conduct of the Indian officials in regard to the Press Act must be drawn up and issued to the Press. The manifesto has been prepared and is being signed by a large number of eminent men. I am confident that a debate will be raised in Parliament when it meets next month, and that the whole question of the Press Act will be threshed out.

It will be evident from all this that there is a body of sympathisers here who regard the fearful activities of the Indian Press Laws with disapproval, and I only hope that my countrymen will let these sympathisers know by telegraphic messages the intense dissatisfaction that prevails in India over the Press question. These messages can be sent either to myself, to the British Committee of the Indian National Congress or to the individual Members of Parliament I have mentioned. I am sure that if men like Sir Henry Cotton, Mr. John Dillon, and Mr. Keir Hardie receive copies of the resolutions passed by various bodies of India protesting against the Press Act, something will be done in this country to stay its murderous activities.

A section of the English Press is sympathetic, a body of English men have begun to take interest in the just demands of the Indians, especially of the persecuted Moslems, and it now rests with the Indians alone to approach the newly awakened forces of sympathy in this country in a proper manner.

With regard to the Zamindar, I am sure the forfeiture of its Press will not prove fatal to its existence. It survived two very heavy securities, both of which were subscribed by the united enthusiasm of a newly awakened national spirit. I feel convinced that the situation created by the forfeiture of the Zamindar Press will be met in the same heroic and self-sacrificing spirit. Everybody except a section of the officials who depend for their information upon the grovelling toadies and title-hunters who are the curse of our national life, knows that the free Moslem Press stands ultimately for the supremacy of Britain in India. Everybody is well aware, excepting these officials and their myriads, that our criticism on some of their actions, however bold and uncompromising, has for its eventual aim the stability and long life of British rule. It is justice tempered with sympathy that will secure India to England for an indefinite period, and not the doings of the bureaucrats who think that British rule can be prolonged by the strangling of the Press. I am trying to bring home these naked truths to the British Public and I want the hearty co-operation of my beloved compatriots in this Herculean task.

13, CROSFIELD ROAD,
LONDON N. W.
SWISS COTTAGE,
January 23rd, 1914.

ZAFAR ALI KHAN,
EDITOR OF THE Zamindar.

The Past Year.

We take the following extracts from an article in the Times:-

During the last twenty-four hours thousands of persons have been pondering over the incidents of their lives in the year which has just ended. And if they find it hard and puzzling to discern unity in all that has befallen them, how much more difficult to discover it in the history of a year crowded with events and conflicting influences, with many currents and cross-currents, in the lives, not of individuals, but of many and diverse communities. In what seems as it emerges from the loom only a tangle of threads: there may be a pattern. We stand too near to perceive it; the scheme and design will be apparent only to eyes farther off and better placed than ours. But to those who read the chronicle of 1913, as told in our columns to-day, some things will be clear. It has been a year of activity and change at home and abroad, the breaking up of much and the letting loose of new forces. Some would describe it as "the year of great unrest"—unrest in many forms and places; desire for new things without much thought as to what they might be; eagerness for something better, or at least for something different; anarchic impatience of restraints of all kinds; life speeded up, and the motor and the aeroplane the symbols of a hurrying and audacious age. In the language of the old chroniclers, "In this time were great changes, and men spoke of more to follow." There seems to have come the fulfilment of the words of the prophet, "The chariots shall rage in the streets. . . . They shall seem like torches; they shall run like the lightnings." Unrest, and much of it, there has been. But no one phrase is final or completely exhaustive; there are elements in the events of the year which elude any formula. If there has been barren unrest, there has also been growth: for fall again into the language of the old chroniclers, "In these days was much sowing of seeds which grew into goodly trees."

WAR AND PEACE.

Abroad there have been wars, revolutions and counter-revolutions. The year before the long pent-up smouldering fires in the Balkan Peninsula had burst into flames, and the Concert of European Powers was endeavouring to extinguish the conflagration or to prevent its spread. There were failures and disappointments; the old weapons of Turkish diplomacy, delay and evasion, proving more effective than their arms. But at last, owing largely to the confidence universally reposed in Sir Edward Grey, the Treaty of London was signed. If it was shortlived, at all events a war which in other times might have drawn in all Europe, and called into activity the vast armaments everywhere prepared, was localized; the Concert of Europe, with all its limitations, had proved to be more than an imposing phrase. Then came, except to those observers, a great surprise. Kept together by their hatred of Turkey and their common fears, the Allies quarrelled in the hour of victory over the division of the territorial spoil; and there broke out a second Balkan war, waged with even greater fury than the first, with Serbia and Greece on the one side and with Bulgaria on the other—a war from which Bulgaria emerged with the loss of much of what it had gained, and in which Turkey recovered not a little of what it had lost. It was a war marked by singular barbarity, and a reversion to cruelties of a kind which it was thought civilization had expelled. It was one of the strange pieces of irony of the history of the time—though to some it might seem most fitting—that the year which saw the opening of the Palace of Peace at The Hague saw also a struggle in which the laws of war, all the teperamenta belli, were thrown aside, and in which the wildest, primitive passions had full sway. The Palace of Peace may be said to have opened with the accompaniment of cannonades and the clash of arms, with every Power armed or arming as never before. It was a year of rebukes and disappointments to diplomacy; the Great Powers repeatedly failed to obtain assent to their counsels, or to keep under restraint racial and dynastic ambitions and long-stored hatred. Both were illustrated the limitations of the influence of the Concert Europe. But there appeared, and there remain on the horizon, some hopeful signs. Not to speak of the creation by the Great Powers, in spite of many difficulties, of the new kingdom of Albania, we have witnessed in times of strain and tension the earnest desire of those Powers, it may be from no higher motive than self-interest, to keep the ring fairly and to narrow the sphere of hostilities. We may surely, too, count among the securities for peace the existence of a better understanding between England and Germany, and the enhanced influence of the former in the councils of Europe.

In Mexico there has been more than unrest; there has been a return to the miserable turmoil, savagery, and clash of personal ambitions which long formed the round of the so-called politics of some South American states. The iron hand of Diaz withdrawn, there began the old confusion and conflicts of military leaders; and the advent to power of the soldier who, for the time at least, is at the top was stained by the execution or, in less technical language, the murder of a rival. For a country which claimed, and, as many years of peace and prosperity seemed to show, rightly, to have emerged from the revolutionary stage and to have taken its place among the stable communities of the world, the New Year opens with grave uncertainties, with anarchy in some of its provinces, and with a condition of strain and tension between it and its powerful neighbour.

In China, too, there is the end of an old regime, with much uncertainty as to what will ultimately take its place. Those who expected that the Republic and Parliamentary government were at once to become realities were quickly undeceived. New ideas and phrases freely borrowed from Western political systems have been imported. But Yuan Shih-kai's purging measure applied to the exotic Parliament, followed by a decree suspending its sittings indefinitely and the establishment of an administrative Conference in which he was supreme, showed that, new forms notwithstanding, a strong reaction had set in, that monarchical ideas still prevailed, and that the aspirations of young China were not to be realized.

To take a wider survey of this mood of unrest during the last year in political and social movements: it is, may be, with some nothing more than envy and egotism; the anger and impatience of those who live solely in "a world of claims"; the demagogue's eternal harping upon rights with entire oblivion of duties. But we shall not be quite fair to those who press for changes, of what kind they are not very sure, if we do not credit some of them with an increased or awakened sense of justice—a desire, genuine though very crude, vague and fluid, to make the world better than it is. Even in some of those new demands are perhaps elements of safety. In the doctrine, now so much preached by statesmen, of "opportunities to the fit," in the contention that secondary education should be so remodelled as to give every one a chance of making the best use of his powers, in a recognition of the great inequalities of human faculties and of the claims of the individual, a denial of the assumption upon which rest all crude forms of Socialism. At worst, and in its violent extremes, this unrest means anarchy; and the spirit of anarchy is the irreconcilable foe of Socialism, even if an armistice between them be, for a time, patched up.

The spirit of unrest extends to literature, unworthy of its name if not expressive of the dominant moods of the time; to music, to painting, and to every art in which there is vitality it shows itself in diverse ways. The pessimist might compile a long catalogue of excesses, freaks, and vagaries; of crude experiments, vaunted as flights of original genius; of a multitude of clever imitative efforts; of music and painting quitting their old spheres and making incursions into those of other arts; of mechanical paradox mongering; and of strivings in many forms to make mere lawlessness pass for originality. But the catalogue would be incomplete and misleading if it did not take full note of the presence of a spirit also of sincerity and courage, a readiness to accept the message, whatever it might be of reality, a love of old models, not because they are old, but because they anticipated enduring truths. And in the philosophic teaching of 1913, of which literature and art are often the unconscious exponents, we are told that there is the same spirit; one alike teachable and inquiring; "an insatiable desire for reality"; eagerness for something better than heaping fact upon fact; a desire to pick out of the discords and dissonances of life some true harmony.

THE VERDICT OF TIME.

What will prove to be the most memorable event of 1913? Some will find it in the wars and convulsions abroad, or in the political incidents at home—the action of the House of Lords towards the Home Rule Bill, or in the formation of the organization of Ulster Unionists. Others will think of the unrest in India or of the prosperity and ever-widening fortunes of the Canadian Dominion. We can conceive others preceiving unique significance—for evil—in the operations of the militant suffragists; operations not unconnected, it may be thought, with falling marriage and birth rates and habits unfavourable to home life. Some will think of the latest triumphs of engineering skill and enterprise; the newest feats of wireless telegraphy, the wonders of aviation, and the breaking of the barrier between two oceans by a button pressed at Washington. These are marvels. But then our engineers are so often surprising us with their new conquests. Perhaps more enduringly memorable than these victories over the powers of nature is the story which came to us last year of what seemed a defeat by Nature of the too bold invaders of her last citadel, the forcers of her long-kept secret, but which, reading the journal of Scott we now know was a triumph and a matchless memory for the race. When all the cunning apparatus, of which we are justly proud, is scrapped and the present feats of engineering are outdone; when the craft and flattery of the demagogue and the feeble and spasmodic violence of the militant malcontents among women are forgotten, the story how Scott and his comrades met death with serenity and fortitude will be told. If it be true, as Goethe has somewhere said, that the chief use of history is to awaken enthusiasm, to make great deeds give birth to new, what page more potent and inspiring than that which they have written? What record so irrevocably graven on the memory of the nation?

India and South Africa.

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M. P.

THE treatment recently given to Indians by the Government of South Africa has both naturally and properly roused great resentment in India. That resentment has found expression in several different ways, but in none more striking than the action taken by the Viceroy. For the first time under modern political conditions, so far as I can recall, the representative of the King in India has made a direct protest to a self-governing State. In time to come this may have far greater consequences than any one dreams of at present, but whatever judgment may be passed upon it, the cause of it undoubtedly demanded swift and definite notice.

I have heard the action of the Viceroy contrasted with that of the Imperial Government, much to the detriment of the latter; but those whom I have heard making the criticism seemed to be hardly aware of the conditions of self-government in our Colonial Dominions. The history of the evolution of that government is one of conflict between the colonial people and the Home-government, generally described as "Downing Street." Downing Street was not so wise as it might have been in these conflicts, with the result that, not only did Downing Street lose its authority, but the colonies acquired a tradition never to submit to imperial control in their domestic affairs. I have been in every self-governing colony we have; I have talked to every one of their Prime Ministers of varying political creeds and parties. I have found that on nothing are they so unanimous and so emphatic as in their resentment against everything suggestive of interference from Downing Street. Such an interference would fuse all colonial parties into one national party of opposition. In 1906 I was mainly instrumental in getting Lord Elgin to ask the Government of Natal to explain why three natives were condemned to be shot by court martial. Within twenty-four hours protests came over the cables from Australia and Canada, and New Zealand was willing to join in, had there been need. Last year owing largely to a blunder made by Mr. Winston Churchill which enabled people to say that he was interfering in Canadian affairs, the Canadian naval project had to be withdrawn. This suspicious and jealous frame of mind on the part of the self-governing dominions must be taken as an axiom and laid down as one of the foundation-stones in our system of imperial government by any one who studies the working of that government.

When a colony is getting its constitution, it has to come to us at home for it. The new constitution is put into the form of a Bill which goes through all the ordinary processes of legislation under our Parliamentary rules. For instance, when the constitution for United South Africa was before us, several of us moved amendment after amendment with a view to preventing such conduct as that which is now stirring India. We knew that their conflict was bound to come, we were afraid—those of us who knew South Africa—that when it did come, it would be in a very grievous form. But all parties united to defeat us. Liberals, Irish Nationalists, Conservatives went into the lobbies against us, and the power to treat Indians as something much less than citizens of the Empire was not taken away. Therefore however objectionable it may now be, the South African Government is acting within its constitutional rights in every thing it has done since Mr. Gandhi began the passive resistance movement. If the Home Government were to issue any mandate it would be rebuffed: Canada, Australia, New Zealand would protest, as well as South Africa and the last state would be worse than the first.

Let me make it quite clear that the impotence of the Home Government is not because the oppressed people are Indians. We should be in the same fix if they were Scotsmen or Irishmen. That has actually happened both in Australia and Canada. In this respect the difficulty is not one of race, but of political authority. Downing Street is far less powerful in protecting the rights of citizens of the Empire within the self-governing sections of the Empire than within foreign states. If we had made South Africa independent when it united we should have been in a far better position to protect Indians there than we are to-day. This sounds a great absurdity but it is a manifest truth.

The Home Government can only make friendly representations to South Africa, and in making them it has got to be exceedingly careful how it expresses them. I am sure it will be found that such representations have been made, even if Renter has not been cabling them out here. In the nature of things they must be private whilst the crisis lasts.

The St. Stephen's College Magazine is not a political organ or I might discuss how this dead-lock in imperial government is to be got over. There is no provision made for it in our imperial machinery. If we are to educate our subject peoples and open their eyes to the width of the world and their minds to its attractions, obviously the South African problem is to come up again and again in other Dominions. But I must content myself here with doing the simple thing I set out to do. I want to impress upon those who feel the South African humiliation most keenly, that if the Home Government has appeared to be silent the explanation is not that it is indifferent, but that the Imperial constitution is such that nothing but disaster could have followed if mandatory despatches had been sent from London to Cape Town. We cannot let matters rest where they are, but so long as they are where they are, only wanton mischief-making and unfortunate misunderstanding can blame the Home Government for not doing what it could not do, or can assume that Downing Street is sinfully passive because it has not yet published its despatches.

'The Romance of India.'

Of course, it is distressing that between three and four hundred English performers, dancers, supers, stage-carpenters, and the rest should rehearse for some weeks, only to be thrown out of employment at the end, and just at the season when naturally they would be making most in their line of business. It is a pitiful case. Pitiful also is the case of those eleven Asiatics who were to have joined in illustrating the darkness of their continent in the Earl's Court show. It is true that a paternal India Office has assigned them lodgings in some institution for Lascar sailors derelict in the East End, but up to the time of writing the Hindus among them, fellow-subjects of our Empire, have strongly objected to being herded with the progeny of nations not so blest as we, and their case remains pitiful. Nevertheless, for the immediate occasion of all this misery our whole Empire should combine in offering its heart-felt thanks. Let each fellow-subject follow the example of Queen Mary, Queen Alexandra, and Lord Curzon in contributing all that he or she can afford towards the relief of such distress. It would be cheap at the price if the India Office, the Treasury, or the British nation as a whole, endowed each of those performers, dancers, supers, stage-carpenters, and wandering Asiatics with a munificence in life-pensions such as is lavished upon our most victorious generals. For they suffer for our salvation. Their destitution is our defence.

Consider what sort of a show the Syndicate proposed to present before the population of London and the Indian citizens resident among us. The immemorial history of India was to be gathered up into some half-dozen tableaux. These tableaux represented typical or 'epoch-making' scenes in the introduction of European influence. According to the preliminary notices published in the Times European influence, in the original version of the show, was typified by 'The Spirit of Light', and India herself by 'The Spirit of Darkness.' We gather that the first scene, illustrating the triumph of European Light over India's Darkness, was to show the arrival of Alexander's army in the midst of the worship of Juggernaut, whose helpless victims were being dragged beneath the wheels of that Juggernaut Car, which has since done so much service in British rhetoric and journalism. It did not matter to the Syndicate that Alexander never penetrated beyond the Indus, whereas Juggernaut's temple is at Puri, at least a thousand miles distant, on the Bay of Bengal. We must not be scrupulous about history in an Earl's Court historical pageant, and who shall set the gross limits of space upon the European Spirit of Light contending against the Spirit of India's Darkness? This 'epoch-making' event (miraculous we may call it in the strictest sense) was to be followed by similar episodes—a human sacrifice to Siva (interrupted, we suppose, by some other timely arrival from Europe); the Suttee, or burning of a widow upon her husband's funeral pyre (interrupted, we are informed, by the appearance of Vasco da Gama, expressly despatched from Portugal by the Spirit of Light); the Black Hole of Calcutta (Darkness visible and unilluminated); the Battle of Plassey (Darkness dissipated by Clive with two thousand men); the Siege of Lucknow (arrival of Light to bagpipe accompaniment); and a triumphant finale, representing the apotheosis of British Conquest in the figure of Holy Light, offspring of Heaven, first-born.

That, as we understand, was the nature of the show's original design, and if the reports were true nothing in the unhappy annals of British self-complacency was ever more impudent and insensitive. Indians in London held a private meeting of protest in Cromwell Road, and Sir George Birdwood presided—not the last, we may hope, of that gallant veteran's services to India. It was doubted if a licence was necessary for the performance was wordless, no explanation being needed to point so obvious a moral as the triumph of British enlightenment. But for once the Lord Chamberlain proved his office useful; he appears to have forbidden the show to proceed without the sanction of the India Office. Within limits, the India Office also played a serviceable part. It strove to mitigate the loathsome insult to the Indian peoples. It rejected the original design, and then the first revision. In the third form, unhappily yielding, it allowed the thing to pass, and the Lord Chamberlain gave it his sanction. Apparently, in this final form, the Suttee, as well as Plassey and Lucknow, remained, but the Juggernaut Car, the Siva sacrifice, and the Black Hole were cut out, the Spirits of Light and Darkness being also transfigured into the Spirits of Peace and War. Europe was typified by Peace, India by War. Think of European history; think of the state of Europe at this moment; and then think of the Indian peoples, probably the most peaceful and docile races that ever existed—races whose chief reproach in English mouths, from the time of Macaulay's foul libel upon the people of Bengal downwards, has been their unwillingness to fight! How grotesque the absurdity! So grotesque that we almost regret the Syndicate's financial collapse which has deprived us of the spectacle of Babus, posing for Gods of War, and of Alexander, Clive, and Colin Campbell under the similitude of doves.

But the Syndicate has collapsed, and its collapse is a mercy for the Empire. That is why we urge that all possible assistance should be given to those whom this failure has thrown out of work for the winter. Their destitution, as we said, has been our defence. If the Earl's Court pageant of Indian subjection and British conceit had been produced, even in its amended form, we can hardly imagine anything more provocative and ill-timed. It would have surpassed the mixture of platitude and provocation recently inflicted upon us in the four Times articles, called 'The Indian Peril.' Probably everyone who cares to read sappy articles in the Times has knowledge and judgment enough to balance his indiscretion. But the Earl's Court show would have been displayed to crowds whose only knowledge was derived from tales of the Mutiny, or from hymns about India's coral strand, where only man is vile and the leathen in his blindness bows down to wood and stone, drives hooks into his flesh, grows his nails through his palms, crushes people under idols, and burns widows alive. These touching beliefs of the Sunday School would only have been confirmed. Childhood's picture of Indians would have been visibly restored. Spectators would again have contemplated 'natives' as enormous lumps of dusky beings, masses of congealed darkness, broken only by the gleam of knives and the red blood of murderous fanaticism, or enlightened only here and there by a beneficent Government and the missionary's ray.

The first essential for decent relations between ourselves and Indians is a reality of amnesty and oblivion. Such an Act may have been passed long ago. Certainly, Queen Victoria by her Proclamation of 1858 (perhaps the finest of her personal achievements) intended to promote the reality. But her aim has never been accomplished. Most Indians themselves are singularly forgiving and oblivious of the past. They have kept few annals and written hardly any history. The ages of their existence have remained almost as unrecorded by them as the ages of the earth before man's appearance. Why should the soul trouble about times and dates and the succession of mere events when the white radiance of eternity is hers? A pleasant turn of phrase, an act of common courtesy, would erase from almost any Indian mind the horror of our vengeance upon the mutineers. But with our own people the case is different. We grant no amnesty, no oblivion of the past. Every relic of horror is cherished; every tale of butchery is gloated over; no British tourist can touch India without nursing his animosity at the Cawnpore Well, or strengthening his contempt among the carefully preserved remains of Lucknow Fort? and in the midst of his labours a Viceroy makes time to scrape together memorials of the Black Hole's victims, and to interest himself in conjecturing the precise locality of their pit. All this mournful refusal to forget—this blood-thirsty clinging to the memories of toils—the Earl's Court show seemed designed to emphasize and extend. If we refuse oblivion, we may teach the Indians also to remember, until their memory equals in precision the old Irish remembrance of wrong; nor could the bitterness revived by such an exhibition have been modified by the final scene, in which we were promised an allegorical display symbolizing 'the absolute harmony and unity that exists between Great Britain and India.' If only such an allegory could be true! But the designer of the pageant, whose words these are, appears to be almost the one man who might really have read those articles upon 'The Indian Peril' with information and profit.

We cannot altogether be quit of the past, but, so far as in us lies, let us shake ourselves free from its distorting trammels. The Romance of India does not lie behind us, but before. Useless is the attempt to maintain a stable and static equilibrium under which a paternal and well-intentioned bureaucracy will go on for ever nursing, tending, feeding, punishing, rewarding, and cleaning up the 300 millions of India as if they were spaniels in the squire's kennels. India shares the flux of all the universe. In the last thirty years her change has been peculiarly rapid, and it is felt among the willing, patient, uneducated millions of cultivators upon whom we are invited to concentrate our fatherly attentions, almost as much as among the few thousands of 'literate' whose 'superficial veneer of Western education' stirs the wrath and apprehension of kindly old officials, worn-out with years of patronizing service. 'Self-reliance, not mendicancy,' has for years now been the guiding motto of Indians, who fully recognize the many advantages conferred by a short century of general British direction, but who regard any material gain in irrigation, railways, or commerce as a poor set-off against that 'moral poverty' (to use Dadabhai Naoroji's phrase), which is the curse of all subject or parasitic peoples. That call to self-reliance is the surest sign of present change, and it alarms none but those who by long habit worship the idols of the bureau and regard the ignorant 'natives' as tender sheep but the educated as wolves beyond the shepherd's pale. There is no need to wonder at the difficulties of change, or to stand appalled at their aspect. It is vain to cling to an imagined state of eternal and despotic tranquility, tempered by academic discussions in legislative councils. The era of permanence never arrives, and only ignorance now imagines the East as plunged immovably in thought. Dangers and difficulties must be welcomed as signs of life, due in part to the very system that many seek to preserve, and the Romance of future India, as of all history, lies in confronting them. But the impertinence of identifying ourselves with the Spirit of Light and India with the Spirit of Darkness brings us no nearer either to Romance or solution.—The Nation.

Three Weeks in the Balkans.

BEFORE we can realise the present condition of affairs in the Balkan Peninsula it is essential that we should have a geographical knowledge of the various States of which that peninsula is composed and some idea as to the ethnological conditions now prevailing there. The boundaries of States are generally fixed by geographical configurations, such as ranges of mountains, great rivers, etc. Now, the various races who inhabit the Balkan States have been at each other's throats for the last thousand years; they are thus hereditary and in many cases irreconcilable foes. Taking the geography of this country we will begin with Rumania; her territories extend from the plains of Russia to the River Danube, a flat, low-lying land with extraordinarily rich and fertile soil. Bulgaria lies between the Danube and the Balkan Estranja Mountains in the south, and contains two parallel but lesser mountain ranges running east and west, the lands which lie between these being again very productive. Her eastern boundary is the Black Sea and the western another mountain range running north and south, the Stara Planina, which range forms the eastern boundary of Serbia, an exceedingly mountainous country. Serbia is bounded on the north by the Danube, and her southern boundary extends as far as the newly delimited Greek frontiers, and includes the city of Monastir. To the west lie Albania, Montenegro, and Bosnia, a complete tangle of wild mountains. Greece in the south has extended her borders along the Aegean Sea, taking in Kavala and Salonika; now two of her most important ports. Lastly we have Turkey, now confined within the plains of Thrace, with the River Maritza as her western boundary and Constantinople on the east, as her great port, and still the capital of the Ottoman Empire.

After this brief survey of the geography of the country we must consider it ethnologically. The conflict here is tremendous, and it is still farther embittered by religious differences. The Rumanians are a Latin race, whose ancestors composed the Dacian legions of the Roman Empire. Generally speaking, they are members either of the Orthodox Greek Church, or of one of its branches, with a considerable number of Roman Catholics. The Servians are a Slavonic race; they entered Serbia in the seventh century and belong to the Orthodox faith. They were originally tributaries of the Byzantine Empire, but made themselves independent and formed the Kingdom of Serbia, which included all Macedonia, Albania, Thessaly, Bulgaria, and North Greece in 1830. They were then an important nation, with dreams of empire, and these dreams have not departed from them. Albania, with its network of high mountains, has a population, half Roman Catholic and half Mussalman. They are a warlike race, incessantly fighting amongst themselves or with Serbia. The Greeks, a nation of traders and seafarers, belong to the Orthodox church, or to give it its full title "The Holy Oriental Orthodox Apostolic Church," generally called the "Greek Church." Turkey-in-Europe (what is left of it) is inhabited almost exclusively by Mussalmans, with a sprinkling of Greeks and Armenians. The latter have been Christians since the third century and the tenets of their faith differ but slightly from those of the Orthodox Church. Bosnia and Herzegovina I mention last as they now form part of the Austrian Empire. They are peopled by a race Slav in their origin, but containing elements of the races and creeds of all the countries I have previously mentioned.

Up to the recent war the Turks held the balance of power in the Balkan Peninsula. Their influence may not have always been rightly exercised, but they in a great measure prevented conflicts amongst the other States. These latter were agreed in their hatred of Turkey and, as we know, only combined in order to attack her, and the success they had was amazing. But no sooner was the weight of Turkey removed, than again broke out the bitter hatreds and rivalries of those States; and the ferocity of the second war, in which the Servians and the Greeks joined hands in the attempt to annihilate the Bulgarians, beggars all description. No one knows much about the actual fighting, but the fact that both sides made very few prisoners is sufficiently significant.

I now come to the more interesting part of my notes, viz. a brief account of my visits to the area of the heaviest fighting from the lines of Tchatalja, twenty miles from Constantinople, up to Adrianople, and including the battle grounds of Lulea Burgas and Kirk Kilisse. I should explain that the reason I was favoured with this unique opportunity of seeing the Turkish defences in detail was due to the fact that I was travelling with our own Director of Military operations. As a nation, the English are far from popular in Turkey at this moment; but the individual Englishman (especially if he is an officer, for the Turks are a military nation) is treated with courtesy and consideration. The whole of Eastern Thrace has a great likeness to Salisbury Plain, with a country like the Wiltshire Downs rolling away towards the Tchatalja end of the Peninsula. Almost all the earlier accounts of the engagements in these parts contained more fiction than truth. The days of great war correspondents are practically over. Now that news can travel thousands of miles in an hour, no general commanding operations in the field can afford to run the risk of having his movements prematurely disclosed by an over-zealous newspaper man yearning to make a "scoop" for his own particular journal.

The lines of Tchatalja are over twenty miles in length, the right flank of the Turkish army rested on the Black Sea at Derkos, and the left flank on the Sea of Marmora. The plain of rifle-fire is ideal, a gently sloping glacis for about 700 yards, and in front of this a marsh, which can be crossed in only a few places, and these vary considerably, according to the season of the year. The Bulgarians made three attacks on these lines; the first attack was directed against the right flank of the Turks at Derkos; the second against the centre; and the third against the extreme left flank. All three operations failed, though of the first and third it should be said that they were not attacks in force. But in the attack delivered against the Turkish centre, the Bulgarians sustained a most serious reverse. The shelter trenches, and still more the number of graves, tell a tale which none can dispute; and I know that I am not far off the mark, when I say that in their attack on the centre alone, the Bulgarians lost about 6000 men. The Turks had three weeks after the battle of Lulea Burgas in which to dig their defences, and very good use they made of their time. Not a rabbit, far less a man, could attempt to move on to the marsh, without coming under a cross-fire from the Turkish trenches. Indeed so strong is this natural position, that I doubt its ever being taken, except with regular siege operations. During the actual fighting at Tchatalja the Turks did not lose 500 men. But at least 7000 cholera victims were buried in the camp at Hardemkeui.

It was at Lulea Burgas that the only really big action of the war was fought, and there has been an immense amount of exaggeration as to the numbers engaged and the losses incurred by both sides, even in this fight. The Turkish Army here did not exceed 60,000 men; they occupied a low ridge extending from Bunahissar on the right to the station of Lulea Burgas on the left. The Bulgarians on their side had eight divisions in action. As various brigades and regiments had been detached for work round Adrianople, it is very difficult indeed to make an approximate estimate of the Bulgarian numbers, but as in Bulgaria each division is unusually strong, it seems probable that their army considerably outnumbered that of the Turks here. For two days Abouk Pasha on the left and Mahmed Mukhita Pasha at Bunahissar on the right, more than held their own; in fact Mukhita Pasha made a counter-attack, which at one moment came very near to success. At the end of the second day's fighting the Turkish centre at Tchekessken were hard pressed, and the 10th Bulgarian Division after a flanking movement began to make its presence felt on the Turkish left. At this critical juncture both food and ammunition failed the Turks; some of the batteries had not a single round left them and the men had been fighting for two days on the scantiest of rations, probably not more than a loaf a-piece. The Bulgarian artillery fire was always superior to that of the Turks, and in this instance the latter had badly constructed trenches, lacking the necessary head-cover to protect the men from shrapnel, so that it is not surprising that a general retreat took place.

I should like to say here that though the whole country is an ideal one for using cavalry, neither in this battle, nor on any other occasion during the war, did the cavalry of either side make even an appearance in an actual fight. Where they might have been of great value the horses were useless from previous overwork. From information given me by one of the generals in command I gathered that the Turkish losses in the actual fight of Lulea Burgas did not exceed 12,000, and probably the Bulgarian losses were about the same. When we consider what the losses were in one general action during the Russo-Japanese or the Franco-

German War, the battle of Lulea Burgas was a very different affair from the lurid and fanciful accounts given us by "Our Own Correspondent."

The journalistic "Story" of the Kirk Kilisse action is even more inaccurate than that of Lulea Burgas. We were led to believe that whole armies were engaged on both sides at Seloli and Eski Podos, whereas, in truth, the lines covering Kirk Kilisse were very weakly held by the Turks, and all the fighting that took place was but a series of delaying actions—merely outpost affairs to cover their concentration at Lulea Burgas. The actual occupation of Kirk Kilisse gave the Bulgarians a strategic advantage over the Turks as it effectually cut off Adrianople. The town of Adrianople is situated at the junction of three rivers, the Maritza, Tundja, and Ardar. In the twelfth century it was the residence of the Turkish sovereigns and its principal feature is its magnificent mosque, one of the finest in the world, of which the minarets can be seen twenty miles away. The perimeter of the fortifications is about twenty-seven miles and the outer lines must have extended for about thirty-five miles. It is probably owing to this fact that so very little damage was done in the town during the bombardment, one shell only hitting the mosque, though all the Bulgarian guns had got the range of the minarets. I cannot of course enter into details as to the fortifications and their guns; though the officials, with extraordinary courtesy, permitted us to visit and examine anything we wished, even including the new works now under construction. The Bulgarians were unable to make any impression on the western or southern sides during the siege, advances there being easily repulsed. Their main attack was delivered from the north-east, certainly the weakest spot, and it was there that they were eventually successful. Though the forts at this point occupy commanding positions and are also strong, there was a good deal of "dead ground" in front not commanded by their own fire. The Bulgarians knew this and took full advantage of the knowledge. About 168 heavy guns played incessantly on this quarter and there is not a square yard of ground for many acres which has not been torn and rent by exploding shells. The trenches, with their inadequate head cover, must have been a hell upon earth during the bombardment. The wire entanglements, where the shells had burst amongst them, were more hopelessly twisted up than before. When the final and real attack came it was the fall of the outer lines, held by infantry alone, which was the cause of the collapse of the whole line of defence; though probably the shortage of provisions was a not unimportant factor in the decision of Adrianople's defender, the gallant Shukkeri Pasha, to hoist the white flag.

Before closing this brief account of my "Lighting Trip" in the Balkans, I should like to give my personal impressions as to the condition of the country generally. Many accounts have been written of the inhuman way in which the Bulgarians treated the Turks, when the latter were prisoners on the island outside Adrianople after its capture. I was informed by absolutely reliable eye-witnesses that there is not one grain of truth in these statements. War must always bring misery and horrors in its train, and a mass of half-starving prisoners were confined on the island; many of them were ill and some of them were dying, but from the first day the Bulgarians made every endeavour to feed them, and they had a loaf of bread a-piece and this ration was increased and improved upon day by day, as much as was possible. As regards the country itself I fear the Bulgarians cannot be acquitted of many acts of both brutality and wanton destruction. The whole of this part of Thrace, before the war, was dotted with flourishing villages, mostly inhabited by Turks. And what is the state of this country now? I travelled several hundred miles through it, and I am not exaggerating when I say that every village I saw had been completely gutted by fire, and contained not a single living thing; not so much as a starved kitten. The women and children had disappeared, Heaven alone knows where; the whole countryside was deserted. The Bulgarians say, "These abominations were not committed by our regular troops; they were the work of the camp followers (committajes)."

But this is no excuse, as the Bulgarians used these irregular bands in their actions and even assigned to them a regular place in all their field operations. The Turkish troops displayed quite remarkable forbearance when we consider that many of them on returning to their native villages found their houses destroyed and their families gone, in most cases probably dead. In the town of Kirk Kilisse itself, about 650 Turkish houses were destroyed, only those remaining which had the sign of the Cross on their doors. After its reoccupation by the Turks I spent a whole afternoon exploring the town. I was greatly interested to see that not a single house marked with a Cross had been damaged, though there were 20,000 Turkish soldiers in the place; and these men cannot have been indifferent to the fact that the property of their co-religionists had been wantonly destroyed by Christian troops.

From the foregoing statements, the truth of which I can vouch for, we can draw only one conclusion, that Christianity has had very little civilising influence on the Bulgarians. To those at home who cry aloud of the awful brutality with which the Mussalman treats his Christian neighbour and who demand that he should be punished for it, I would recommend that they make a short visit to the places I have mentioned. They would then be forced to acknowledge that the charges of unnecessary cruelty and wanton destruction lie more heavily against the Christian soldiers in this war, at any rate, than they do against the Mussalman.

It is peculiarly ill-judged of Englishmen to permit the publication of such grave calumnies against the Turks, for these false reports must arouse much ill-feeling in the minds of the Mohammedans in India, who are among the most loyal subjects of the Crown.

CHARLES R. HUNTER, in the "National Review".

The Poets' Dilemma.

WHENEVER poetry has a long tradition behind it, it tends to use a specialized, and so an impoverished vocabulary, and the readers of poetry, used to this vocabulary grow fastidious about words and their associations. They expect the language of poetry to be poetic, and the spell of it is broken for them by any word which has prosaic associations. Mr. Lascelles Abercrombie in the lecture upon Poetry and Common Speech, which he delivered the other day, said that the Elizabethan poets found their material, not in a language already broken in by literature, but in the language of people talking; and no doubt the Elizabethan public were far less fastidious about words in poetry than we are, far less sensitive to their prosaic associations. The ideal condition of language for a poet is when words have neither prosaic nor poetic associations, when there are no words, like glamour, which are too poetical, and none like tuberculosis, which are too scientifically technical, to be used in poetry. In such a happy state the poet can give poetic power to all words by means of their relation to each other in his rhythm and phrasing; and none of them will assert itself or impose its own association on the whole sentence. But this happy state does not exist now. Words themselves have got their characters, good or bad, from the use that has been made of them in the past; and a word that has the best of characters in the world of Science may have none at all in the world of poetry. We have to do a great many more things with language than the Elizabethans had, and in consequence language has specialized itself so that different jargons are used in different activities. There is a scientific jargon, and a philosophical, and a commercial; and there is always a danger that poetry will fall into a poetic jargon from the poet's natural desire to make his art as easy to himself as he can.

The worst of our language, for poetic purposes, is that it has become too much intellectualized, too full of words that express, often vaguely enough, certain general conceptions, with which all our minds have a second-hand familiarity. A vast deal of thinking has been done in the last 300 years, and it has made its mark upon the language which is now full of words that are a kind of shorthand of thought. We mean words such as relative and absolute, positive and negative, general and particular, subject and object, words which everybody uses, but often with only a vague notion of their intellectual history or of the meaning that was first given to them by exact thinkers. In fact, the intellectual ambitions of men have outrun their capacity, so that we are more familiar with words that express ideas than with the ideas themselves. The result is a veracular peculiarly unfitted to the purposes of poetry. Poetry, however much it may deal with ideas, is mainly concerned with the emotions aroused by them. The idea itself must be something that surprises the poet with all the sharpness of an event or a passion; it must be something that happens to his mind; and there is no surprise, no sharpness, in this intellectualized language of ours which makes every idea seem both stale and vague and which imparts the same staleness and vagueness even to concrete things. That, no doubt, was the reason why Wordsworth tried to use the language of peasants in his poetry. He wanted to escape from the intellectualized language of his time, and the poetry of the eighteenth century seems to us prosaic because it is full of stale thought rather than of fresh experience.

Thus there is always a temptation to the modern poet not to think much lest he should fall into this intellectualized language. And if he is not to specialize too much as a poet, there is a double burden laid upon him of exact thinking and fresh experience. It is only by exact thinking that he can escape from our intellectualized language and find words of his own for thoughts that are his own. Without this effort of thought he will always be in danger of writing poetry that has been written better before, for the main events of life, with which poetry is concerned, are the same in all ages. It is the change of thought towards them that makes the change of feeling by which the genuine poetry of one age is distinguished from that of another. But this change of thought for the poet, must be a change in his own thought, not a more passive submission to the intellectual influence of his time. Such a passive submission will not affect his poetry at all except to weaken it with intellectualized language, such as we find in the worst of Mrs. Browning or Clough. The poet nowadays cannot escape from ideas, unless he has less intellectual curiosity than the ordinary man; and if he keeps them out of his poetry, he will keep a great part of his mind out of it and make it merely a pretty artistic game. This difficulty with language, therefore, is really a difficulty with thought. The poet must not give himself up to thought so much that he turns from a poet into a philosopher; but he must think enough to make all his ideas his own property: for only so will he be able to express them with the poet's eagerness of discovery. His task is more difficult than it has been in the past, but it is also more glorious. It is his to make thought as quick as passion, or rather to fuse them both in a language enriched by both.—The Times

Woman and Morality.

WHAT progress are we making towards an age when reason and ethical considerations will replace physical force as the ultimate decisive factor in the relations either of nations or of individuals? Evidence on this point, despite the optimism of humanitarians, is decidedly conflicting. I propose to deal only with one aspect of the question, but one from which, nevertheless, it must be viewed before it is possible to arrive at any conclusion.

Although anthropologists may not agree as to the causes for the evolution of human character, I fancy none of them would dispute the fact that primitive or savage man was actuated by simple desires and wishes, and that his mental processes went little further than was necessary to contrive for the satisfaction of his various physical needs. No consideration for the needs or wishes of others would enter into his calculations at this early stage. Savage woman, on the contrary, in her maternal capacity, must have exercised self-denial and shown maternal devotion at a very early period in the evolution of the human mind. She was handicapped in the work of looking after oneself (which was the occupation of primitive man) by this maternal function, and that fact has never ceased to operate in making her, for purposes of social organisation, inferior to man. Undoubtedly primitive man (like the still existing races known to us as primitive, though in reality far from being so) took advantage of a partner physically weaker than himself to load on her all menial tasks. Thus the Australian gin trots after her lord on their migrations, bearing the household goods or the spoils of the chase, and the African wife hoes the mealie patch while her master sits in the sun and smokes. But the beginning of ethical perceptions must have taken place very early in the relationship of man and woman, when a desire on the part of one to please the other laid the foundation-stone of a future edifice of moral controls and altruistic ideals. As man advanced in intelligence he could not be satisfied without a form of companionship compatible only with mutual affection. He could no longer take what he wanted by force but must sue for it as a gift. Here was woman's weapon, and it is one which she has been steadily strengthening all down through the ages. Here, again, is the germ of the ethical conception that not merely physical strength, but reason and principle, should be the decisive factor not only in human but in national relations.

It is impossible to exaggerate the moral influence exercised on man by his constant and inevitable association with a being physically weaker than himself. It is true this physical inferiority is only relative and that in many climes and ages woman bears a full share of the burden of physical labour; but the sentiment of civilized man is increasingly opposed to such a state of affairs, and as a matter of fact woman everywhere, and in all ages, has been exempted from the more dangerous and strenuous forms of State service. The inevitable result of her disabilities has been to place man in a position of social dominance, and to assign to her a subordinate place in the scheme of State organisation.

The claim for the final and formal removal of all traces of this subordination of women rests, therefore, on the assumption that the factor to which men owe their social domination—superior physical force—is no longer supreme. It is asserted that reason and spiritual force are gaining such ascendancy over the minds of men that it is not essential that the ruling element should also be the (physically) strongest element. Could we give unqualified assent to this proposition we should certainly feel that we were well on the way towards the settlement by peaceful methods of every kind of contested point. The moment is not, however, a very auspicious one for such an assertion. It must not be supposed, moreover, that the claim for feminine 'equality' is invariably based on the sweet-reasonableness of modern man. On the contrary, a female school of thought is growing up which asserts that women are perfectly and inherently able to take and hold that position by their own efforts.

It is, in fact, a feature of modern feminism that, so far from recognising that woman's social and political subordination is due to nature, the protagonists of 'equality' assert that the female of the species has often enjoyed actual supremacy, and that her 'natural' position was wrested from her by man. The high priestess of this doctrine is Mrs. C. Perkins Gilman, whose book, The Awakening of Woman, first published in the United States in 1887, is still the inspiration and authority for English feminist philosophy. Following her example a host of other writers derive courage in their fight for 'equality' with man from the reflection that the female cirriped carries her little husbands about and uses or discards them, or that some spider-brides make a marriage feast off their mates. A more rational deduction would appear to be that the higher one goes in the scale of animal life, and in the range of civilisation, the more marked is the physical difference which, for certain social functions, gives the male superiority over the female. Feminists who are unable to deny this assert that it is due to male preference for a dependent and clinging type of female—in short, to selection. There is considerable truth in this view, but since masculine nature is not likely to undergo any radical change in this respect it is difficult to see how these conditions are to be altered.

The believers in a 'natural equality,' however, do not hesitate to assert that the female of the human race, in the earlier stages of civilisation, was able to enforce a superiority akin to that of the cirriped. Mrs. Walter Gallichan, in her book, The Truth about Woman, sets forth the theory of an age of 'mother-right,' of which she professes to find traces in many parts of the world, and which preceded the organisation of society on its present lines, where man is the head of the family. A Scottish lady Miss Lumsden, L. L.D., who is described in the Press as a distinguished member of the teaching profession, recently dealt with this subject before a gathering of University women. She is reported to have described 'matriarchy, or mother-right,' as 'an old custom which prevailed among most of the primitive races in the world,' and which, according to her, not only invested woman with the headship of the family and the possession of the family property, but gave her special sanctity in the eyes of man, such as is typified in the 'worship of Astarte in Asia Minor' and of Demeter in Greece. 'Woman,' said Miss Lumsden, 'was regarded with awe and wonder, as typifying the mystery of life,' and was therefore 'surrounded with devotion and importance.' 'Male headship' is said to have arisen in Greece, where women were 'cast down to the lowest depths of degradation.' The obvious moral or intention running through all these assertions is that it is man, or the social system built up by him, which has dethroned woman from a position of equality, if not supremacy, intended for her by nature. I have selected three flagrant and public examples of the form in which the important subject of sex relations is now being presented to our young women, but it must be remembered that for one such 'lesson' which finds its way into print a thousand, even more garbled, must be delivered. Out of such materials a 'woman's creed' is being shaped.

It is not possible within the limits of an article to criticise these theories in any detail. Briefly, there is no reasonable evidence or proof that the system of matriarchy ever existed on a large scale, or had any part in the early culture of the Mediterranean basin from which our own is derived. The evidence is carefully weighed by Westernmark, and is shown to be contradictory and inconclusive. The most that can be said is that in some regions, and in some stages of civilisation (not necessarily primitive), succession is reckoned through a sister's son (a son, he it noted, not a daughter), and genealogies are traced through mothers. This is the 'matriarchy' of serious anthropologists, and they are not agreed as to its origin. Marriage customs whereby a man entered his wife's clan or family, either permanently or for a time, have no necessary connexion with matriarchy, nor do they support the view that property was vested in the wife, but rather in her father or some male relation who was head of the family or clan. As for the worship of female goddesses, far from being associated with 'awe and wonder,' or 'devotion and importance,' these may have originated with the innocent desire of savages to propitiate the deity of fecundity, but they are known in history as rituals of sexuality of the most depraved and revolting character, and it appears almost impossible that any educated woman should mention them in connexion with veneration or respect for womanhood. It was of the worship of Ishtar, who is probably the goddess referred to by Miss Lumsden as 'Astarte in Asia Minor' (though Ishtar was chiefly worshipped in Babylon, which is not in Asia Minor), that Jeremiah wrote when he said of Israel 'She hath gone upon every high mountain and under every green tree and hath there played the harlot.' In Babylon every girl had to sacrifice her purity to the goddess, and Latin writers from earliest times are full of contempt for the obscenities and excesses of these worships. What can be said for the point of view of a University woman who holds up the civilisation of Babylon or Egypt as superior to that of Greece?

These sociological perversions may not appear to be of any great importance, but if it matters at all what we believe it must matter that young women are being taught, all over the country, the false doctrine that man has usurped a place in society which belongs by right to woman. A false creed, upheld by spurious history and still more spurious morality, can do an infinity of harm, and when this creed has as its central postulate a wholly untenable theory of the relations of the sexes its ill effects are likely to be cumulative and far-reaching.

From the beginning of the modern suffrage movement stress was laid in a variety of ways on this theory of the usurpation by man of female rights, as for instance in the effort, not even now abandoned, to prove that women had at one time exercised the franchise. The logical result of this attitude is the attempt of women to meet force by force, so woefully exemplified in militantism. The claim of woman must really rest—it is the one logical foundation—on the growth of ethical controls in man, which will induce him to give her freely what she could never take. To ask for such a gift while calling man 'usurper' and other bad names seems tactless, to use a mild expression. Similarly those women who proclaim their desire for nothing more nor less than 'equality' are literally 'reckoning without their host.' There seems to be a sort of inherent affinity between anarchism and feminism. Both suggest the abolition of rules which in the long run protect the weak. In an anarchist state the strongest and most unscrupulous man would soon be king. In a feminist state woman, deprived of the advantages of sex-discrimination in intercourse with man, would still be handicapped in the struggle for life by nature, and would go to the wall.

There are indications in our own country that she is already progressing on this downward path. Ten years ago the tradition still obtained in public life that woman, as a sort of honoured visitor to that sphere, must be accorded a more respectful treatment than need be given to any man. A chairman never had any doubt, when introducing a woman speaker, that her reception would be in accordance with the traditions of the best element in that audience. The psychology of an audience is interesting and subtle, as every speaker knows. The same was true of crowds. Until recent years a woman could almost invariably count on the prevalence of that element which will not tolerate the ill-treatment of women or cripples. But all this is changed. Women are no longer visitors—they have come to stay; and in the matter of public meetings they represent to the man in the street an element which demands to play the game without observing the rules. The treatment accorded to them has therefore lost all trace of sex-discrimination. I saw my first suffragette scrimmage in 1907, and it made me physically sick. I saw the last a few days ago, when several women were ejected from a meeting in Edinburgh, and one of them hit the hand of her ejector (who has since been seriously ill with blood poisoning). On this last occasion I felt no emotion save annoyance. But if I am right in my diagnosis of the nature and origin of ethical and moral progress, the contrast between my state of mind on these two occasions constitutes a moral retrogression. Few people will doubt that this is the case, and that the necessity imposed on men of actually fighting with women has led to a resurgence in both of characteristics which we hoped had been buried under an accumulation of moral controls. The result may be seen in the records of suffrage meetings held by non-militants (many of which have been broken up and the speakers roughly handled, although they were being held in a perfectly orderly and constitutional way), and in the accounts of recent by-elections. At one by-election in October an anti-suffragist speaker narrowly escaped serious hurt. It is clear that her particular object had nothing to do with it, nor was she taken for a suffragist—she was treated merely as a woman. To one who has had occasion more than once to appeal for special treatment on the score of her womanhood, and who never, until recently, made that appeal in vain, this appears as the writing on the wall.

The hypothetical advantages of being regarded as an 'equal' in public, and therefore allowed to get one's fair share of any kicks that may be dealt out, must be weighed against the undeniable drawbacks of having to forego the privilege of being treated as a non-combatant. But the law of civilisation has hitherto been that women must be treated as non-combatants, and the abrogation of this law will lead to moral anarchy in the relations of the sexes.

It may be contended that individual men have always fallen below the ethical level which forms the average, and that the social conscience as a whole is sound, and will ultimately enforce its principles on a recalcitrant minority. It is just in this respect that the illustrations from the actions of crowds or large audiences are so illuminating. The conscience of a crowd is a collective conscience, easily swayed, and yet having a very distinct relationship to the morale of the individuals of whom it is composed. The collective ferocity of a crowd of men concentrated on a woman is a spectacle some of us had never thought to see. Obviously, if the Old Adam of physical force is to be cast out in favour of the New Adam of moral suasion, women must refrain from awakening the sleeping savage in man individually or collectively.

We are sometimes given instances from other countries of the harmonious working of men and women in political matters and the moral progress made under the influence of women's votes. Mr. J. O. P. Bland, for instance, describes the municipal cleansing of the city of San Francisco in the twenty months or so which have elapsed since Californian women were enfranchised. If it could be proved that men, on whom, after all, the public services of a city depend, have permitted women to revise their methods of government, to wipe out their sources of illegitimate profit, and to interfere with their more questionable forms of amusement, we should certainly have a clear case of the triumph of moral over physical force. But the 'cleansing' of American cities is a periodic phenomenon of no real social significance, and the establishment, during recent sessions of the Californian Legislature, of a series of commissions, at a total annual expenditure of nearly a quarter of a million sterling, suggests the new broom that merely disturbs the dust. Under the stimulus provided by Women's votes the Californian Legislature is said to have passed no fewer than 1100 Bills in twenty months, a record which should make our present Liberal Government regret its own wasted time, but will not inspire confidence in the breast of the disinterested social reformer. Legislative activity need not necessarily be regarded as a sign of moral progress, but sometimes the reverse. The necessity for legislation should surely decrease as the individuals of a community progress in that respect for the rights of others which constitutes genuine morality. In any case the Statute Book of a country is a most unsafe guide as to its social and moral conditions.

An unfortunate illustration of the alleged connexion between the growth of public morality and the increased public power of women has been chosen by Mr. Bland, in Colorado. He quotes the verdict of the Inter-Parliamentary Union that 'Colorado has the savest, the most progressive, most scientific laws relating to the child to be found on any Statute Books in the world'; Mr. Bland adds, in his own account, that these laws have been brought about by the votes of women, thereby assuming that the women's vote has forced this legislation on unwilling or apathetic men. What is the result? So indifferent is the administration of these laws that it has recently been found necessary to form a 'Women's Protective League,' whose prospectus says:

"We know that you are in favour of protecting girl-children according to the laws of Colorado; assume that you are cognisant of the fact that they are not so protected; and believe you would not be party to the continuance of the present existing shameful conditions." This appeal is supported by a record (certified by affidavit) of the Denver Juvenile Court, and the state of affairs revealed would be impossible in our own country, far from perfection as we are.

When we reflect on our own attempts at social-reform-while-you-wait in the last few years, and read the optimistic views of prominent suffragists as to the speeding-up of such legislation which would result from enfranchising women, we may well regard California and Colorado as solemn warnings, and not as examples of perfection!

There is one other aspect of woman's insurgence into political life in the British Islands which deserves attention as to its moral effect. The broad division into two schools of political thought has always presented difficulties to the thoughtful and sincere man who may not find it possible to subscribe to the whole creed of either one or other. Under such circumstances his choice is a matter of perspective, but he will not, as a general rule, be found supporting a party with whose whole political trend he is in disagreement simply because it advocates one measure in which he is deeply interested. A man may be in favour of maintaining the Union, of a strong Navy, compulsory national service, the repeal of the Insurance Bill and the Parliament Act, and yet be a keen Free Trader, but few men, under such conditions, would actively support the present Liberal Government. Yet Conservative women are supporting with work and money the party which, in every single respect save that of woman suffrage, stands for political ideas which are anathema to all Conservatives. Even on the question of the suffrage itself these women differ fundamentally from the party they support, for they are as much opposed to adult suffrage as their allies are pledged to it.

Attempts have been made to show that there is nothing unusual or inconsistent in the attitude of those Liberal and more especially those Conservative ladies who, putting woman suffrage before all other political questions, are supporting the Labour-Socialist Party at by-elections. As a matter for the individual conscience it may be conceded that this is a question of personal choice, but, in honesty, those who would rather have woman suffrage plus Socialism than Liberal or Conservative government without it should have the courage of their convictions, and sever their connexion with any party which does not in their opinion stand for the only really vital measure of the day. And, although these ladies are very indignant with Sir Almoth Wright for saying that women have only private and personal morality, their conduct when associated for public purposes makes his explanation the kindest one. Both men and women have used non-party associations for non-party propaganda—that is, to spread views which were not confined to any party; but it remained for suffragists to discover that it is consistent with the constitution of a non-party association not only to oppose the parties which do not agree with its views, but to support, actively and financially, a party which in some respects has adopted its programme. The morality of spending money collected on a non-party basis for the benefit of a particular party is a point of minor significance beside the wholesale surrender of traditions and principles by an organised body. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that those who can thus mistake the part for the whole, the greater for the less, are inherently unfitted to direct public policy, and that by their action they are helping to demoralise politics. The process in which they are openly and unashamedly engaged is no new one—it is familiarly known as 'log-rolling'—but that women of the calibre of Mrs. Fawcett or the traditions of Lady Selborne should be parties to such work is but another instance of the fact that woman's influence in the political arena is likely to be the reverse of 'purifying.' That Unionist women should be found working against their own party at the present crisis, and that Conservatives should subscribe to an association which gives money and aid to the Socialist Party, is a proof of the lack of real political principle even among women of a high type of intelligence.

* 'Woman Suffrage in the United States', by J. O. P. Bland Nineteenth Century and After, December 1913.

It is curious and interesting in this connexion to remember the part played by the suffrage women of the North in the time of the American Civil War. I have no space here to give in detail the history of their activities, but it is asserted that in the hour of their country's peril they contented themselves with rolling up petitions to their embarrassed Government in favour of universal suffrage, and out of over five hundred women mentioned in Dr. Brockett's Woman and the Civil War as having rendered special service, a bare half-dozen are known as being suffragists.

Yet another instance of moral retrogression is attributable to what is called 'The Woman's Movement.' With the militant appeal to force I have already dealt. Those persons who regard it, as it deserves to be regarded, as a symptom of something seriously wrong with women—not as a mere fantasia played by a few mad people—must not forget that the self-immolated victims have all along received help and encouragement from a section of the Church. There is actually a Church League for Woman Suffrage, among whose numbers prominent militants are enrolled, and which has a bishop at its head and others in its ranks. One of these bishops, who has been much before the public in a variety of ways lately, when taking the defence of militants (though not of militancy) upon his shoulders in the columns of The Times, says that the women are excused, though perhaps not justified, by the fact that they are exasperated by the Government's refusal of their 'just demands.' This is not a quotation but a summary of his argument, and this is essentially the position taken up by a few other clerics and by leaders of the so-called non-militant section. This question-bogging method is familiar in controversy, but its use does not show any real desire to restrain militancy. The suffragist members of the Cabinet, who believe the women's claim to be reasonable, are not (as they themselves declare) either strong enough to bear down the members who believe the contrary, or sufficiently convinced of the importance of the question to sacrifice other things to it. In short, the suffragists have still to convince not only the country but their own Liberal supporters that their demand for immediate legislation is 'just.' The bishop ignores all this; he assumes that his protégées must be right and everyone else wrong and unjust, and that, although these protégées are an absolutely insignificant minority, even of the women of the nation, they cannot be expected to desist from acts of violence until their demands are granted. The significant factor in all this is that the Church, which we thought had long since abandoned the methods of Torquemada, is here covertly upholding violence as an aid to conversion.

* Support of the Labour Party is the official policy of the N. U. W. S. S. whose President, Mrs. Fawcett, presided at a meeting at which Lord Lytton declared that 'when there were two suffrage candidates, one Liberal and one Labour, they [the N. U. W. S. S.] would support the Labour man. They would support a Labour man against a Conservative suffragist because they supported the Labour Party as a party.' In pursuance of this policy the N. U. W. S. S. and its affiliated society, the London Society for Woman Suffrage, have given £600 towards the expenses of Labour members, in addition to $500 spent on by-election work, in which Labour candidates have been supported in five cases against Conservatives. Among the well-known members of these two societies are Lady Selborne, Lady Betty Balfour, Lady W. Langhby de Boka, the Hon. Mrs. Alfred Lytton, Lady Charles, Mrs. J. Lloyd Carpenter, and Mrs. Howard Frothingham, all prominent Conservatives.

A final count in this indictment takes me into deep and difficult waters, of which only the surface can be skimmed. Some years ago—before the suffrage agitation became acute—there began a movement, much needed, for the instruction of young people in the facts of their own physiology. I think the novelty of such instruction is much exaggerated. I can find, even in the works of Jane Austen, no proof that young people of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century grew up in the state of ignorance which, in the middle of last century, was confounded with innocence. It appears to me that it was the growing delegation of parental duties to schools and teachers which finally made it possible for girls and boys to be launched on the world in such a condition. Nowadays, when children of both sexes are at home in school and visitors in their homes, the need for systematised and careful teaching is increased, though personally I cannot help feeling that this is just one of those duties which no parent ought to be willing to delegate. The Headmaster of Eton, writing recently to The Times, emphasised the evil which must ensue if the wrong accent or emphasis is laid upon sexual matters during the critical period of adolescence, and parents ought to know their own children sufficiently well to be able to choose the right time and right way in which to impart necessary instruction. What is really desirable is that children should understand nature, but should not be familiarised with disease. The pathology of sex is disease, and it is this aspect of it which is now continually described in feminist and suffragist writings, is dissected and discussed, often by persons who do not and cannot know the alphabet of this difficult question. I am often asked to believe that girls gain something by a frank acquaintance with the seamy side of life. It is asserted that if they are allowed to know the worst they may avoid it, but if this means that they will only marry on what are called 'eugenic' principles, we must reserve our assent until we have some proof. Have women ever hesitated to marry men who were even, notoriously intemperate, or dissipated, or decadent, or even decrepit? 'Look at the men they do marry!' says the cynic in H. G. Wells's Marriage. In many cases the combined representations of the family, the doctor, and the solicitor have not availed to turn a young woman from such a match when once her affections or her ambitions were engaged.

It is a singular and melancholy fact that in what is called 'The Woman's Movement' the word 'morality' has only one application, and the reforming zeal of its supporters is chiefly directed to the sexual excesses of man. The result is that far too many women are becoming obsessed with the idea that man is essentially depraved and unclean, and as their own besetting sins or temptations are of a different character, they forget that temperance of mind, soberness of thought and truthfulness of speech are also moral attributes of great importance. Many women, in their pre-occupation with the suffrage question, have entirely lost the mental balance on which these things depend.

Apart from the precocious, one-sided, and often entirely erroneous 'information' on sex-subjects now freely administered to young girls by frustrated or embittered persons, the much vaunted 'frankness' of the present age has destroyed every remaining vestige of modesty or reticence. In this, as in other matters, familiarity breeds contempt. Just as actions which appeared to us daringly improper fifteen years ago have now become fully respectable, so the bedroom scene on the stage, and the disrobing of the heroine, which once thrilled us, have become a tiresome commonplace. Even bishops see no harm in the nightgown as a stage garment! There is no intrinsic harm. There is no reason, I suppose, except a climatic one, why we should not take the garment in question into wear for all occasions. A young friend of mine had a bet with her father that she would come down to dinner in her rob de nuit; and she did, and he never recognised it! But the instinct for privacy, like the instinct for decency, is part of our civilisation—one of the things which distinguish us from beasts and lower types of man. The barriers between our private lives and the public have been broken down by the ubiquitous photographer, to whom nothing is sacred, and by the people who like to see their house parties, their babies and everything they do, in the illustrated weeklies. Still, the delicacy, the modesty, the refinement and reserve of the real gentlewoman is a moral asset which society can ill afford to lose, and the lesson of reticence is more needed, to my mind, for the coming generation than the lesson of frankness. Under the influence of this way of living in public we are fast retrograding in social habits towards promiscuity, and the horde threatens to reabsorb the family.

The plain man and woman do not care much for abstract arguments about the political and social relations of the sexes. What they do care for is that society should be organised on terms which seem to offer the maximum of public efficiency with the minimum of private friction. Man is not really concerned with the task of keeping woman in subjection, nor are the vast majority of women exercised over their subordination (in some respects) to man. This is because the broad relationship of the sexes is one thing and the individual relations of one man and one woman are another. 'All men rule all women', wrote Themistocles, 'but our wives rule us!' There is, therefore, an air of unreality in the feminine crusade against masculine supremacy, and even those who proclaim most loudly their belief that woman are down-trodden are usually careful it should be understood that they are speaking of other women!

The modern advanced champion of woman's right has adopted as her war march the Marseillaise, and she is imbued with the spirit of revolution and anarchism. It is notorious that these rebels against 'man-made laws' offer us free love instead of monogamy, barracks instead of homes, and the 'economic independence of woman' instead of the male obligation to support his wife and family. To gain for woman an assumed 'equality' with man they are prepared to tear down every safeguard and privilege she has secured in long ages of civilisation. Both in spirit and in fact such proposals are anarchic, and not evolutionary, because their basic assumption is that nature makes all men and both sexes equally able to take care of themselves, whereas social evolution has increasingly protected the weak from the strong and increased the obligation of the strong towards the weak.

I am perfectly aware that many protagonists of the woman's movement will hotly contest this view of their objective, but the whole of their case is given away by their self-chosen title. 'The woman's Movement' can only aim at combining women as distinct from men, whether for offensive or defensive purposes; is immaterial. Such combination, if aimed at man, is futile; if not aimed at him it is meaningless. If it is claimed that it is merely an instrument of social uplifting I will reply in the words of Miss Soulsby, that any movement to raise society through the medium of one sex is like a system of gymnastics which develops only one leg! After all we have never heard of 'The Man's Movement.'

But although from the point of view of progress towards the age of reason we may have our doubts as to the beneficent influence of 'the woman's movement,' the cloud is not without its silver lining. The ascendancy of woman and the slothfulness of man are closely related if not complementary facts, and the woman rampant, the sign-manual of the present period, can only rise to that position because men are not merely 'reasonable' but lazy. If we see signs that they are bestirring themselves to resist the tide of feminism we have grounds to hope for a greater demonstration of virile qualities in the near future. The frank anarchism of some women, leaders is also opening the eyes of other women, who are beginning to realise the profound truth of Goethe's saying, 'Man's aim is freedom, order woman's!' It is my own belief that, with the plentiful outlets being increasingly provided for her surplus energy, the fermenting element in woman is ceasing to be a danger, and that the feminine volcano exploded with the militant movement. When the dust has cleared off and the lava stream has had time to cool we shall all go on cultivating our gardens—though not quite the same gardens—much as before but, as I fervently hope, with a heightened appreciation of the advantages of peace and obscurity.

ETHEL COLOQUHOUN, in the Nineteenth Century and After.

EVERY KIND OF
PRINTING DONE
IN THE "COMRADE"
PRESS, DELHI.

Matrimonial Notice.

An Europe return young Mohammedan Engineer at present holding a very respectable position in India invites correspondence from young ladies of good education or their guardians with a view to matrimony.

Z. A.,
C/o "The Comrade".

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HEREKE, CONSTANTINOPLE.

Turkish Fezes made in Turkey

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpacks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

11-5-14

Sole-Agents for India

for Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople

The Delhi Academy of Architecture.

BENARSI MANSIONS,
CHANDNI CHOWK.

For imparting up-to-date training in Architecture and Building Construction on Western lines.

Apply to:—
THE PRINCIPAL.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to naughty diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the virile power and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say so that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhes necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF AL-BAYANFIULUM-UL-QURAN

HELD AS AN
INTRODUCTION TO THE COMMENTARY

HOLY QURAN

CALLED TAFSIR-I-HAQQANI.

THE original book was written by M. Abu Muhammad Abdul Haqq Haqqani of Delhi in the Indo-Arabic language. The learned author has left nothing untouched concerning what is required for a valuable book of this nature. The unfair objections raised against Islam by its enemies, through their ignorance or injustice, have been treated and refuted at full length. The existence of God through reasonable arguments, the refutation of suspicions and doubts raised by Agnostics and Atheists, the discussions on the nature and attributes of God, filled with deep learning and logical reasoning, together with refutations of the false and absurd assertions of the opponents are subjects worthy of appreciation by lovers of truth. The nature of angels, their existence as independent beings, their transformation into any shape they like: the thorough investigation of the statements of the rationalists and philosophers on the subject: the debates on the mission of the true Prophets; the different aspects of inspiration; and revelation, the proof of the miracles performed by the Prophets and Saints; the just answers to the plausible statements of the disbelievers in the Prophets and their miracles; the soul and the next world; the transference of man to it; the reward and punishment of good and evil deeds; the refutations of spurious religions and of Atheists by their insufficient and false teachings; together with reasonable answers to the suspicions cast by the malignant spirit of the enemies of Islam and the false imputations charged by them against the holy person of the Prophet, together with the testimonies borne in favor of him by the critics of Europe, have been fully described in this translation.

An abstract of review by the Comrade:—The translation in English is quite good. The printing and get-up is excellent; Messrs. Thacker, Spink & Co., being responsible for it. The book has about 750 pages, but from beginning to end besides being learned and instructive is very interesting reading for a Moslem, and more so for a non-Moslem in search for truth about Islam. The book for the sake of convenience is divided into three chapters, and has an Introduction which deals with knowledge gained by External Senses, Internal Senses, by Revelations and by means of Signs and Emblems. The first chapter deals with the last and the greatest of all the Prophets of God, Mohamed, the attributes of God—the creator of the universe, Sanctification, Angels, Genii, Soul Resurrection, and the next world, with objections raised by opponents of Islam and answers to them. The second chapter is the most important as it deals with the early history of Islam, gives a brief sketch of the life of the Prophet, and discusses fully all about crusades, polygamy and inspiration of the Holy Quran, Judaism, Christianity, Vedas, Buddhism, Jainism, etc. It explains the Divine Science in the Quran, explaining the prayers, Zakat, Fasting, Haj and Jihad. In the last chapter, a great deal is explained about the Old and the New Testaments and the portions thereof which have been lost. Very useful information is given about the Christian and the Hindu sects, and closes with an account of Zoroastrians. It is a book which will be most useful for the English educated Moslems, as it would give them a very clear insight into their faith, and prepare them to defend it easily against the attacks of the Christian and other Missionaries. Books like this dealing with the modern علم الكلام were badly needed and we strongly recommend all to purchase and study it carefully."

FATEHPURI, Delhi, 22nd September, 1913.

The English translation of "Al-Bayan," the famous book written by Maulana Abdul Haq has been given to me for reading and reviewing by Hajee Muhammad Ishaq.

The book is so well translated that the beauties of the author's style and diction have been amply preserved. This treatise would be a most valuable addition to the Islamic literature in the English language. It expounds in a most lucid and logical manner the teaching of the Great Prophet, and gives a rational and logical refutation of all the attacks on Islam.

This book would be useful both to the Mohammedan readers and those Europeans who want to learn the truth about Islam.

(Sd.) M. A. ANSARI, B.A., M.B., M.D., M.B.O.S., I.R.C.P.

This book will be a best companion to the Moslems and non-Moslems in India and Foreign Countries and the members of the New All-India Mohammedan Religious Association. Price has been reduced from Rs. 15 to Rs. 10/8 so that learners of truth about Islam may easily purchase it.

APPLY TO—THE MANAGER,

The General Newspaper Agency
and Islamic Book Depot, Delhi.

Or Haji Mohamed Ishaq, Merchant, Sadar Bazar, Delhi.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER RECEIVED FROM THE
BOMBAY MUNICIPALITY PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

ESANOFELE and MALARIA.

"Treatment with ESANOFELE controlled with quinine in most cases was recently given a fair trial. The majority of the cases belonged to the Parel Hindu Orphanage, where MALARIA OF A PARTICULARLY SEVERE TYPE raged this year. 43 cases of Malaria were treated of which FIVE WERE CHRONIC, with considerable enlargement of spleen and General Malaria Cachexia." Result :

REDUCTION IN THE SIZE OF THE SPLEEN	+	+
DISAPPEARANCE OF PARASITES	+	+
INCREASE IN THE HAEMOGLOBIN VALUE	+	+
GENERAL CONDITION OF PATIENTS VERY SATISFACTORY.

Writing on the result of chronic cases the report states :—" Quinine would not have worked equally well in these cases and one is especially emboldened to give this opinion from the case of a Sakharan Jivaji, who was a chronic sufferer and ALWAYS TOOK QUININE OR QUININE AND ARSENIC MIXTURES WITHOUT MUCH BENEFIT.

" On the whole, ESANOFELE appears to have VERY GOOD EFFECT ON CHRONIC CASES.

ESANOFELE is obtainable from all Chemists and Dealers throughout BRITISH INDIA, BURMA AND CEYLON.

General Agents:—

Messrs. B. G. GORIO & Co.,
3, Wallace Street, BOMBAY.

FOR INFANTS
"ESANOPELINA"
AFTER MALARIA.
FERRO CH NA WINE.

MANUFACTURERS:—

FELICE BISLERI & Co., MILAN, ITALY.

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper, Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

Don't shout but ring.
The Standard Electric
Bell sets, mounted on solid stand. 29 yds.
wire and 6 months
battery ... Rs. 7-8
25 yds. 1 year Rs. 11-0
Marion Bell Set Rs. 5-0
EAST-WEST CO.
Chandni Chowk,
DELHI.

SHAHIDA & KHURSHED,

COMMERCIALISTS, BADAUN.

- (1) CIGAR and CHEROOTS.
- (2) CIGARETTES:—Turkish and Egyptian (by direct Importation) and others.
- (3) TOBACCOS:—All the best known British, American and Turkish.
- (4) Towels, Banyans, Stockings and Handkerchiefs Embroidered.
- (5) COOKING STOVES, SOAPS, POWDERS, LAVENDERS, etc.
- (6) Stationery. (7) Fancy Articles.

KHUDAM-I-KAABA ON IT.

Saharanpur District Fair.

The Saharanpur District Fair will take place from March the 3rd to March the 9th, 1914. Exhibits must be in their places not later than February 25th. Exhibition includes Agricultural, Machinery and Industrial Courts, Horse, Cattle and Poultry Shows, Races, Wrestling, etc. etc.

J. R. W. BENNETT, I.C.S.,
Chairman.

The Best Companion of Women !

After forty years practical experience and on the principles of modern science, I have with great labour compiled two books, viz. :—

Sehatun-Nisa, which treats of the ordinary complaints and serious complications of married and unmarried women ; and

Mohafizus Sibyan, which treats of the ailments akin to children, with easily obtainable prescriptions for each and every case and rock bottom principles of hygiene and sanitation ; about which Lt. Col. Z. Ahmed, I.M.S., (Retired), writes that these books ought to be in every household and H. H. the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal having approved of them bought a large number. For the benefit of my sisters at large I have reduced the prices for two months:—

	Actual Price.	Reduced Price.
	Rs. a. p.	Rs. a. p.
Sehatun-Nisa	1 10 0	0 12 0
Mohafizus Sibyan	2 8 0	1 0 0
Urdu Medical Jurisprudence with Illustrations	2 8 0	1 0 0

To be had from :—

Dr. SYED AZIZUDDIN,
Medical Officer, Dujana State,
P. O. Beri (Rohtak).

Make Hosiery at Home

AND EARN MORE MONEY.

As much as Rs. 60
per mensem can be earned regularly by making hosiery for us.

No experience is necessary. Men, Women, Boys and Girls, all can make themselves earning units in their family. No lengthy tuition—No Premiums—No monthly Fees to pay—Just the small price of a DURBAR AUTO-KNITTER and you become a worker and wage earner at once.

ANOTHER MILLION WORKERS WANTED

We have at present millions of workers, all over the world, all busy—very busy, supplying us with socks, stockings, etc., but they are not sufficient. We cannot meet the great demand for hosiery made on our DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS—We want a MILLION MORE—We WANT YOU. Write for full particulars TO-DAY.

READ WHAT A WORKER SAYS:—

DEAR SIR,

Puri, 15th August 1913.

I beg to inform you that I have sent you two paid parcels, one on the 14th instant and the other to-day, containing half a dozen pair of Gent's Socks each and request that you will be kind enough to return me the quantity of wool consumed in them and pay my usual wages at an early date.

Thanks very much for the nice little machine you sent me, and it runs so smoothly that I can be able to knit daily half-a-dozen pairs of Gent's Socks and when speeds comes a few more pairs can easily be knitted.

Wishing you every success

I am, Dear Sirs,
Yours faithfully,
(Sd.) MRS. N. PEDDING.

Genz. Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS,
Department No. 36,

11-2 Lindsay Street,
CALCUTTA.

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FULL DETAILS.
FILL IT IN, DETACH ALONG DOTTED LINES, AND SEND TO-DAY.

Date

GENTLEMEN,

I wish to take advantage of your offer. Please send me immediately full particulars, whereby I can earn Rs. 3 a day. Enclosed please find Anna Stamp to help to pay postages.

Name

Address

GENZ, WHEELER & CO., Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay St., Chowringhee Rd., CALCUTTA.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. ~~7~~ 7
No. 7.

Single Copy
Annas 4.

Delhi: Saturday, February 14, 1914.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page		Page
WEEK	129	The Indian Moslem's Fears—
OUR LONDON LETTER	131	VII	136
TETE A TETE—		GARDEN CITIES FOR INDIA	137
The Release of the Ajudhya	132	INDIAN MOSLEM OUTLOOK	139
Rioters		MR. RAMSAY MAC DONALD'S
The Act of Clemency	132	RETURN	140
The Gift to the Mussalibans	132	THE EIGHTH DELHI	141
The Moslem University Association	133	ALICAP "OLD BOYS" AND
The New Capital	133	MOSLEM TROUBLES	142
MAKING ARTICLES—		ARMENIAN REFORM	142
The Press Act—V	134	CONFESIONS	143
		ACQUISITIONS	146—148

The Week.

Bagdad Railway.

Paris, Feb. 10.

The Matin states that a Franco-German agreement will be published in a few days whereby, firstly, France renounces interests in the Bagdad Railway; secondly, a junction is arranged between the Bagdad Railway and the Black Sea system, thirdly, Germany withdraws in favour of France regarding the construction of railways in Syria.

The Matin adds that an Anglo-German agreement will be signed simultaneously.

Albania

London, Feb. 10.

It has transpired that while accepting generally Britain's draft communication to be addressed to Athens and Constantinople the Triple Alliance has opened the question of eventual measures to enforce the decision of the Powers. It appears that there is reason to doubt Germany's willingness to participate in such measures and a hitch is threatened, as it is unlikely that Greece will be willing to evacuate Albania unless peaceful possession of the islands is assigned to her and effectually guaranteed.

The Opening of Parliament.

London, Feb. 10.

The weather was beautifully sunny and springlike for the opening of Parliament to-day. The King and Queen drove in State from Buckingham Palace to Westminster through vast cheering crowds.

The customary brilliant ceremony took place in the House of Lords. The King read his Speech from the Throne. He said that relations with Foreign Powers continued friendly.

The King expressed his pleasure at the forthcoming visit with the Queen to France, testifying to the cordial relations between the two countries. He hoped that consultations regarding Albania and the Aegean Islands would contribute to the maintenance of peace in South-Eastern Europe, and trusted that on the arrival of the new ruler in Albania progress would be made towards an efficient and stable administration.

"I am happy to say that the Anglo-German and Anglo-Turkish negotiations regarding matters of importance to the commercial and industrial interests of Britain in Mesopotamia are rapidly approaching a satisfactory issue, while questions long pending with Turkey in respect to regions bordering on the Persian Gulf are in a fair way towards an amicable settlement."

The King expressed gratification at the signature of a convention dealing with the safety of life at sea. A Bill would be submitted to carry out the convention.

"I regret that early cessation of the seasonal rains last autumn impaired the prospects of agriculture in considerable tracts of my Indian Dominions. The area visited by severe drought is fortunately restricted, and timely measures have been taken for the relief of the distressed population."

I regret that efforts to arrive at a solution by agreement of the problems connected with the Government of Ireland have so far not succeeded. In a matter in which the hopes and fears of so many of my subjects are keenly concerned, and which, unless handled now with foresight and judgment, and in a spirit of mutual concession, threatens grave future difficulties, it is my most earnest wish that the goodwill and co-operation of men of all parties and creeds may heal dissensions and lay the foundations for a lasting settlement."

The King announced Bills for the reconstitution of the Second Chamber and dealing with Imperial Naturalisation, housing, education, and other social reforms, also authorising loans to East African Protectorates to enable them to carry out public works urgently needed.

London, Feb. 10.

The "momentous session" opened with the House of Commons packed.

Mr. Walter Ruch moved the adoption of the Address, and Mr. Gordon Howart seconded. Both expressed the hope that a settlement would be reached on the Home Rule question.

In order to emphasise the paramount importance of the Ulster problem, the Opposition departed from precedent. Mr. Walter Long rising, amid cheers, to move the Amendment to the Address. He affirmed that the departure was due to an exceptional and extraordinary position. For the first time for centuries, the United Kingdom was threatened with civil war, which would certainly break out if the Government persisted in its present policy. The position was no fault of the Opposition, who had warned the Government as to what would happen. The first fruits of the Parliament Act would be that the Government would have to carry Home Rule by British bayonets and bullets against a hundred thousand armed men of Ulster. The speaker fervently declared that Ulster was not bluffing. Sir Edward Carson's fearless action and resolute leadership had hitherto prevented a great tragedy.

Then, criticising the Bill itself, Mr. Long ridiculed the idea of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, citing the case of Natal in 1906, and continued with great emphasis, "You have another instance now. I do not know the views of the Ministerialists regarding the events in South Africa, but with all your boasted supremacy, you won't dare take any action which will bring you into conflict with the South African Government." (Opposition cheers).

In conclusion, Mr. Long said that the Opposition demanded that the Government should consult the country. It was perfectly true that there was grave anxiety in the Army. It was said that the Army must do what was consistent with its duty. What course it would take was not for him to say, but a distinguished soldier had stated that many would resign. It was a foul calumny to say that the Opposition made this a party question.

He appealed to Mr. Asquith if he had proposals to make, to make them without delay. He moved that it would be disastrous to proceed with Home Rule until it had been submitted to the judgment of the country.

MR. ASQUITH'S REPLY.

Mr. Asquith was loudly cheered when he rose to reply. He pointed out that the recent bye-election had been in favour of Home Rule. He said that dissolution would be an admission that the Parliament Act, as far as Home Rule was concerned, was a nullity. Then there might be a condition of stalemate. Supposing that Unionists were returned, they would be confronted with the task of governing four-fifths of Ireland disappointed on the eve of the fruition of a cherished hope. Again, if the Liberals were returned, would Ulster lay down arms? If the matter was to be settled by general agreement, it had better be settled there and then than by a General Election.

While he regretted that his conversations with Mr. Bonar Law had not resulted in an agreement, he did not despair of an agreement being reached. He thought that the language of the King's Speech would find an echo in every quarter of the House. Schemes and suggestions for settlement were in the air, and the exclusion of Ulster had been mentioned. He was not going to pronounce any final judgment on that or any other solution, but even those who suggested exclusion regarded it as pis aller. He continued by saying that any steps they might take in the way of suggestions must not be construed as an admission that the Bill, which had been twice passed, was defective. They would be taken as the price of peace, and he meant by the price of peace, a new system of Irish Government starting in an atmosphere giving a fair chance of working successfully. He agreed that it was a matter which should not be unduly delayed and affirmed that there was no justification for any impression that the Government was trifling with the matter or seeking to gain time.

The Government would endeavour to put forward suggestions which it believed would be regarded by all fair-minded men as an attempt at agreement and as consulting the susceptibilities of all concerned. The Government would close no avenue, however unpromising, leading towards a settlement.—(Cheers).

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN'S QUESTION.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain said that events in Ulster were hurrying to a catastrophe, yet Mr. Asquith had not told the House what he was prepared to do. Mr. Chamberlain asked whether the Government was prepared to exclude Ulster or to secure to her the same rights as she enjoyed in Britain. If the Government answered "yes," the danger of civil war would be averted. If "no," civil war would be certain. The exclusion of Ulster was the only possible basis for peace. Though it was no settlement of the Irish question, it would at least be a negation of Ireland's claim to be an independent nation. The Commons adjourned at 10.55 p. m.

LORD MIDLETON MOVES AMENDMENT.

London, Feb. 11.

In the House of Lords, Lord Glenconner moved, and Lord Garrick seconded the Address. Lord Middleton moved an amendment similar to Mr. Walter Long's in the House of Commons. He demanded the meaning of the words in the King's Speech with reference to Ireland. Nothing which had fallen from any Minister mitigated in the slightest degree, the Opposition's hostility to the whole principle of the measure. He asked what proposals had been made in the course of the negotiations. Lord Morley's reply was precisely similar to Mr. Asquith's.

EFFECT OF PREMIER'S UTTERANCE.

London, Feb. 11.

Mr. Asquith's speech made a sensation in the Lobby. While a conciliatory tone was anticipated, the Cabinet's decision to submit to Parliament definite proposals with regard to Ulster came as a surprise and creates a new situation. It is generally assumed that the Cabinet is working towards a system of Home Rule within Home Rule, giving the Protestant counties a check over the administration of their boundaries, expecting thus to create a body of public opinion strong enough—to control the extremists on both sides. Thus conciliation is in the air after the first day's debate. The Government's proposals are not expected for some weeks yet.

Kabul.

Allahabad, Feb. 6.

A correspondent states that the Amir of Kabul has of late moved in the direction of a more humane treatment of criminals. The horrible "wells" at Kabul, in which men were incarcerated, their food and water being lowered to them until death ended their sufferings, were closed some time ago and the all too-common practice of torture and mutilation has now been stopped.

Fanatical Mullah.

Allahabad, Feb. 6.

The Pioneer learns from Peshawar that the fanatical Babra Mullah of Chahmang has once more begun preaching in the Mahmud country against sections of the tribes which take subsidies from the British Government. He has been particularly bitter against the Mittai Musa Khel, and his followers have burnt some of their houses.

The general feeling among the Mahmuds is against the Mullah. But he manages to get together certain following of malcontent tribesmen at odd intervals.

South Africa.

Durban, Feb. 6.

Giving evidence before the Indian Commission, a deputation from the Natal Sugar Association stated that it was opposed to the removal of the Three Pound Tax, but if the tax was removed, it would prefer that the Indians should be sent back to India, because as free Indians, they would not be available as labourers.

Moharrum Riot Case.

Agra, Feb. 7.

In the Moharrum riot case Mr. Jones, Principal, Agra College, stated that the first thing he saw was one Hindu bleeding. He afterwards saw students gathered in the Boarding House compound and a Mohamedan mob outside throwing brickbats toward the students. He asked the students to go in. The students did not retaliate. Witness motioned the crowd to go back and received a blow on the left eye, which resulted in loss of the eye. He did not see anyone hurting him. Bricks were coming from the roadside. He saw about ten policemen. Policeman Newalkishore identified Jamal-ud-din, accused. Continuing, witness said Mr. Gidney, Assistant Magistrate, asked the Mohamedans to give up their lathies, but they refused and entered the Boarding House compound, but were afterwards driven out by witness. This was after Mr. Jones' injuries. Dr. Modi deposed to examining witnesses Mohanlal and Priyagdas. Pandit Vinyanand, Deputy Superintendent of Police, deposed to having made enquiries from Rajamandi and Lohamandi people, most of whom were unable to give the names of persons, recognised in the mob. Major O'Meara deposed to having operated on Mr. Jones' eye and stated that there was a large wound over the eyebrow, the eyeball being ruptured, which made it necessary to take out his eye. The injury was serious and if not attended to immediately the other eye would have been lost. Witness thought that no glass touched the eye and a brick hurt the eye and not the hat. Niaz Ahmad, Kotwal, stated, that there was a dispute between Hindus and Mohamedan before the 8th of December, the Hindus wanting music and the Mohamedans showing unwillingness to allow the music. Quarrels began on the 7th. Some persons were arrested on the 8th and released on the 9th. Witness further deposed that the Magistrate gave orders not to allow people to carry lathies. Chaudhry Tarsingh, Deputy Superintendent of Police, stated that he was in charge of the investigation relating to the Moharrum riots which lasted from 15th December to 6th January. The first arrest was made on 24th January. Arrest were postponed until after Chelum. Mr. Alston withdrew the case against 17 accused for want of corroborative evidence and wanted to have it publicly known that there was no official promise not to prosecute offenders. This was concerning the arrests made on 8th, and not other offenders. After the charge had been framed against the seventeen accused Mr. Alston said he desired to contradict the rumour that any promise was made by any official of the Government that there would be no prosecution in connection with the Agra riots. He added that accused's counsel, Mr. Habibulla, would confirm the statement, "for he was definitely informed towards the end of December by an official that investigations then going on would be continued, and persons considered guilty would be prosecuted. Alston said the rumour referred to was probably due to the circumstances that some men arrested on the 24th were released on the 9th. The cases now before the Court arose after the release of those men and nothing that occurred with reference to them could apply to others. It is suggested that three or four additional cases, some against Hindus and some against Mohamedans, will be put before the courts on an early date.

Our London Letter.

London, 23rd Jan. 1914.

THE AGA KHAN ON THE "INDIAN MOSLEM OUTLOOK."

The January number of the Edinburgh Review contains a very able and instructive article on the "Indian Moslem Outlook" by His Highness the Aga Khan, who, as it were, has thus spoken at the psychological moment. The article, no doubt, will commend itself to all those who are in any way interested in, or concerned with, the affairs of the Moslem Community in India. His Highness can undoubtedly speak on this subject, which he has made his own, with an authority and an experience not generally associated with the pronouncements of several pseudo-leaders amongst the Indian Moslems, and a studious perusal of the Aga Khan's present article in the Edinburgh convinces the reader of His Highness's thorough conception and realisation of the situation in India. The Aga Khan, it will be noticed, does not throw over the much-abused Young Moslems of India, neither does he speak of the Indian Moslem Press with that air of contempt, which has become so fashionable in certain quarters lately, not only in India but in this country as well. His Highness's repudiation of the statements made in the Times is significant. Dealing with this question, the Aga Khan proceeds: "Lurid caricatures of the Moslem attitude, such as that drawn in The Times of October 7 last by 'a Correspondent in India,' are to be deplored, since they tend to suspicion and estrangement on both sides. It might well be the duty of a writer anxious to awaken the British public from a fool's paradise to be strident in tone, if his note of alarm was based upon full knowledge and free from prejudice. But this correspondent puts himself out of court as a competent and fair-minded witness in the very first sentence of his communication. He says:—

"It is probable that the Balkan War would not have greatly influenced the bulk of Indian Mohammedans, had it not been for the efforts of the Pan-Islamic agitators and their organs in the Press."

"He does not produce, and I believe he cannot produce, a single quotation to show that there has been a Pan-Islamic agitation in the political sense, which his words, taken in connection with the general tone of his article, seem intended to convey. If he means only that the Moslem Press of India has made the troubles of Turkey a subject of constant lamentation and has strongly criticised the policy of the Concert of Europe in general and of Great Britain in particular, in that connexion, I accept the statement, though I take grave exception to the deduction drawn and to the prejudicial form in which it is conveyed. This correspondent might just as reasonably argue that Mr. Lloyd George's land campaign would attract no attention from the agricultural voter if the Liberal Press of England did not keep the question in view; or that the problem of Ulster would be non-existent but for the newspaper notice it attracts. He mistakes cause for effect, and forgets that even a Press so new and crude as that of the Indian Moslems, like the Press of other countries has to give its readers information on public matters in which they are most interested, and must more or less reflect their attitude upon them."

His Highness is equally clear in his defence of the Indian Moslems on the question of extra-territorial patriotism of his co-religionists for other Moslem States and very ably dismisses the absurd yet oft repeated theory, entertained in various quarters, that the Indian Moslem should only mind his own business without in any way interfering with the political affairs of other Moslem countries. These are the Aga Khan's own words:—"The Indian Moslem does not ask for the surrender of any British interests. He simply points out that these interests are in accord with Moslem sentiments and wishes. Yet his incursion into international politics is frowned upon in reactionary Anglo-Indian quarters as if it were in some mysterious and inexplicable way disloyal. People who make these charges might reflect that the Mussalmans of India gain absolutely nothing for themselves, in any material or political sense, from the preservation of the Moslem States; they are simply animated by the sentiments of unity and brotherhood above referred to (in the article), which are stronger than these unsympathetic and unimaginative critics can realise." His Highness has done well to emphasise this point, as these critics seem to be absolutely blind to the fact that the natural enthusiasm for, and extra-territorial fellowship, of the Indian Moslems with their co-religionists abroad are perfectly consistent with their loyalty and devotion to their own sovereign, to whose person and throne they are attached at present more closely than ever, in spite of persistent efforts in some quarters to prevent the Indian Moslems to the world as hostile to British rule.

The Aga Khan, in his course of his article, briefly deals with the recent crisis in the London Branch of the All-India Moslem League, but happily does not altogether sacrifice preciseness for brevity.

His words, pregnant with meaning and full of significance in this connection, run thus:—"The crisis in the affairs of the London League, brought to a head by Mr. Amcer Ali's resignation, confirms my conviction that the time has fully come for the Indian Mussalmans to realise that the future of the community depends not upon this or that particular leader, but upon the people themselves. If there is any danger that excitable younger men may lead the League to an attitude of suspicious impatience, it is for the calmer and more reasonable section to bestir itself and to keep the organisation in its own hands, and meet the opposite party not with abuse but with argument." No more weighty advice could be given at such a juncture, and if certain sections of the League would only attempt to follow the Aga Khan's advice and, instead of abusing the Younger Moslems, would only meet them calmly and earnestly in proper argument, they would certainly not only enhance their own dignity, but would likewise do their duty to the great organisation, which they pretend to be so conscientiously serving. Let there be some give-and-take on both sides, and the Young Party who are nothing if not sporting in the real sense of the term, will certainly not withhold its active co-operation with the more 'conservative' section of the Community for the common good, provided, it need hardly be said, that it is not expected to sacrifice certain principles and doctrines, which, owing to their importance to the very existence of the community, must be the main plank in the Indian Moslem platform.

The Aga Khan must be considered as the spokesman for enlightened opinion in India when he so truly says, in the concluding portion of his article, that the rapid changes brought about in India within living memory demand a corresponding change in the behaviour of the officials in their relation, and dealings with the people of the country, who should be consulted and listened to with due attention in matters of policy, which raise important issues affecting the well-being of the various Communities in India. The following sentences cannot fail to convince even a casual observer that there is ample scope for improvement in the methods of Indian administration generally, a few important directions, in which the Government may with advantage proceed on the lines indicated by the Aga Khan, being only mentioned here. His Highness goes on to say:—"Another matter upon which strong feeling prevails is that there should be fuller scope in local affairs for loyal but at the same time free criticism. The widening of the powers and functions of the Legislative Council has done much to give point and force to public sentiment on the larger issues, and this is necessarily reflected in the comments of a Press, which, with all its great imperfections, is advancing in ability and is beginning to be really responsive to public needs. The days when not merely the considered will but even the capricious whim of the Collector of a district was received without question and obeyed without hesitation have gone by, and in the sphere of every-day administration, no less than in the more conspicuous arena of the Legislatures, Supreme and Provincial, it is necessary for those in authority to give due weight to the general consensus of opinion."

His Highness has rendered no little service, both to those who are in authority as well as to his own co-religionists and Indians in general, by having so forcibly brought out the salient features of the Indian Moslem outlook in the article referred to above. The Aga Khan's suggestions are certainly entitled to the most careful consideration of the Government of India.

LORD HARDINGE'S VICEROYALTY.

The Indian Mail of last week has happily brought us the full text of Lord Hardinge's speech, in which he has most emphatically denied the statement, so widely circulated in the British Press, that he contemplates resigning his great office in the near future. India can ill-afford to prematurely lose a Viceroy of Lord Hardinge's calibre, specially at the present moment, and His Excellency's own words have relieved the Indian community in London, as no doubt they have done in India as well, of no little anxiety.

INTERVIEW WITH MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M. P.

On his return from India Mr. Ramsay MacDonald M. P. has been interviewed by the Daily Chronicle on various problems affecting the administration. While dealing with the question of a Hindu-Mohammedan entente, the Labour leader proceeds as follows:—"I would not like to say how far that entente will go, because there are a good many obstacles in its way. But this I will commit myself to:—If there should be a rupture between the old school of Mohammedans, headed by Amir Ali, and the Young Mohammedans headed by Mohamed Ali, the latter would win. All the tendencies are in favour of the latter."

Mr. MacDonald has thus shown that he has taken pains, while in India, to discover for himself the right direction toward which Moslem public opinion as a whole inclines.

TETE À TETE

Sir James Meston, replying to the addresses of the Municipal and District Boards of Fyzabad on the 9th., instant, concluded an important speech with the announcement that he had decided "and in this course I have obtained the full and gracious concurrence of His Excellency the Viceroy," to release 23 prisoners convicted in the Ajudhya Riot Case and "as an act of special clemency to reduce by one-half the sentences on the remaining seven." This announcement was preceded by a reference to the existing state of Hindu-Muslim feeling in the locality. His Honour reminded the members of the Board and the raies of the district that from time immemorial Hindus and Mohammedans had lived together at Ajudhya and Fyzabad in peace and unity. "As a symbol of this happy unity you see Mohammedans worshipping at Babar's Mosque and Hindus paying adoration at the shrine of Ram Chandra's birth-place within a few yards of each other and within the same enclosure wall." His Honour asked if these brotherly relations could not be resumed and maintained. The Government could not bring their hearts together by force. It could, however, encourage and exhort to cast animosities away. But His Honour was prepared to do more than mere exhortation and offered them "an unconditional contribution towards the work of reconciliation." He then proceeded to recall the circumstances connected with the Baqur'Id Riot at Ajudhya on the 20th of November, 1912, which had to be quelled by force. The rioters consisted of large crowds of Hindus, among whom Baragis were prominent, and they assaulted a number of Mussalmans, (two of whom died in consequence), damaged a mosque and looted some houses and shops. Thirty of the offenders had been brought to justice and sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from two years to six years. "I have now carefully considered the cases of all these men," continued His Honour, "and I have consulted your Commissioner regarding them. It appears to me that the crimes, indefensible though they were, resulted from wild excitement in the minds of ignorant men at what they considered to be a blow to their religion. In such circumstances and in cases where no other motives can be traced, mercy seems justifiable. The culprits directly responsible for the death of the two Mohammedans on the 20th November have not yet been brought to account. But among the thirty men who are now imprisoned for the events of that day it appears that seven either fomented and led the rioting or took part in it with the deliberate intention of looting and robbery, while the other twenty-three were comparatively ignorant tools in the hands of the real instigators." In view of these considerations His Honour decided to exercise the measure of clemency he announced. He also declared that he was at the same time placing in the hands of the District Officer "a sum of Rs. 500 to be distributed at his discretion among the poorer Mohammedans who suffered from the riot either in person or property or in the damage done to their mosque." These, he said, were "free gifts and unconditional." He then wound up by exhorting his hearers to exercise their religious rights without wounding the feelings of their neighbours, and by reminding them of the duty of the Government to maintain peace and order at whatever cost and of the opportunity they had behind the screen of safety to join hands and work together for the common good.

The Act of Clemency. The Lieutenant-Governor's remarkable decision to release twenty-three of the prisoners convicted in the Riot Case and to reduce by one-half the sentences on the remaining seven suggests certain grave considerations which it is hardly possible to ignore. The question that would most readily occur to one is what it was that led His Honour to take a step so unusual, if not without any semblance of a precedent. It is clear on His Honour's own showing that the crimes committed by the Ajudhya rioters were indefensible. There had been absolutely no provocation on the part of the Mussalmans directly or indirectly responsible for such a savage outbreak of religious animosity and incendiarism. They were quietly proceeding to celebrate their festival according to their religious beliefs and within the limits of the law, and there was nothing in their acts which could even remotely be construed as a desire to offend the feelings of their Hindu neighbours. Yet, in spite of all this, they were assaulted by a huge Hindu mob which broke into their houses, with the deliberate intention, at least in some cases, of looting and robbery. A mosque was damaged, several Mussalmans received injuries and two of them were killed. But for the timely help of the military in quelling the riot, the consequences would have been still more deplorable. Legal proceedings followed in due course, thirty of the accused in the Riot Case were found guilty and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, the sentences being upheld by the highest tribunal of the Provinces. And now several months after the matter had been finally disposed of by the High Court, after the demands of justice had been satisfied and the aggrieved party had, we may presume, learnt to console itself that it was not easy to trifle with the laws of the land, comes the sudden revelation that the crimes of the Ajudhya rioters were in the main due to religious fanaticism and consequently there was a strong case for tempering justice with mercy. We trust no Mussalman will be led to carp at this act of clemency if it pleases the Hindus and satisfies His Honour's sense of the fitness of things. But one cannot help feeling that there may be not a few who may suspect in the proceedings at Fyzabad a touch of the melodrama. Sir James Meston is far too sagacious an administrator to believe that acts of grace can be uniformly efficacious without reference to time, place and circumstances. Excesses due to religious frenzy may be condoned only when they have resulted in no serious iniquity calling for reparation in the interests of social order. The riot at Ajudhya, however, was of a wholly different complexion. It led to a loss of life and a serious damage to property and established an organised terrorism with the deliberate object of depriving a whole class of people of the freedom to exercise their inalienable rights, which, in view of last year's strange procedure on the part of Government, seems to have been fully achieved. If it appeared to the Lieutenant-Governor that even crimes of this character deserved mercy because they had resulted "from wild excitement in the minds of ignorant men at what they considered to be a blow to their religion," then we hardly see the necessity of feeding the public mind on the sensation of an expensive and protracted trial. If it was necessary to allow the law courts to thresh out the character and the motive of the crimes, mercy could well have been shown just after the final court of appeal had given its verdict. The delay in arriving at the decision announced at Fyzabad would be incomprehensible but for the fact that a clever agitation was engineered by a number of Hindu politicians in the United Provinces immediately after the Cawnpore Settlement. The cry for the release of the Ajudhya rioters was raised with great insistence, and clumsy efforts were made to show that the case of the Ajudhya criminals was similar in character to the Cawnpore Riot Case. There was happily no quarrel between the Hindus and Mussalmans of Cawnpore, as between those of Ajudhya, and the accused at Cawnpore, who were released before their guilt or innocence had been judicially determined, were not proved criminals who had injured their neighbours in any way. But let that be. We would only say that the leaders of the Hindu agitation, who suddenly discovered a grievance after the Cawnpore Settlement, chose a wrong method of removing it. The demand for the release of the Ajudhya rioters literally smacked of "compensation." And now that Sir James Meston has rounded off things with his usual deftness, we hope others will be induced to feel equally with him that all is well that has to be ended in this way. We hope, at the same time, that his appeal for unity has not been made in vain. But no unity can be sincere or lasting which is not based on the convictions of the people that they are absolutely free to exercise their rights within the limits of the law. Peace and order should be maintained at all costs, but the local authorities should realise that it does not serve the interests of peace and order to saddle a law-abiding section of the people with restrictions because a turbulent section of them breathes threats of a riot. We hope the good sense of the people at Ajudhya and Fyzabad will help them to come to an amicable settlement. In the meantime we are eagerly waiting to see what Sir James Meston does in the case of persons now undergoing trial at Agra on charges of riot on the occasion of the last Moharram. Their excesses too, if any, were surely due to "wild excitement of ignorant men at what they considered to be a blow to their religion." We are also curious to learn the fate of the persons accused of sacrificing a cow this year in a house at Fyzabad in spite of the prohibition issued by the District Magistrate.

The Leader of Allahabad lays it down that it is wrong to look the gift horses in the mouth and forthwith proceeds to examine the gale to the Hindus of Sir James Meston's announcement at Fyzabad. Evidently our contemporary knows the political value of depreciating the value of gift-horses. But we should not be surprised if it was for such a reason that

Ghalib wrote: دو دنوں جهان دیکھی وہ سمجھا کہ جہٹ کیا
بان بات آئی یہی کہ تکرار کیا کریں

(After giving away the two worlds He thought He has now rid of us. And we are embarrassed by the gift and are inclined to think it would be ungracious to haggle!) We need not pay lip-service like our contemporary to a principle that is seldom observed in practice. A gift has either a value or a price. It is intended either as a substantial help or as a tribute of respect, love or admiration from the giver to him that receives. We confess we do not know how to appraise Sir James Meston's gift of Rs. 500 to the Ajudhya Mussalmans. If it is intended as a help to "poorer Mohamedans" it is neither substantial, nor, what is much more to the point, timely. Such help could only be effective and welcome when it was needed most, when the injuries inflicted by the rioters were still fresh and the loss had to be repaired. The plight of the poorer Mohamedans, however, escaped the attentions of the benign Government and it suddenly floats into the recollection of Sir James Meston after more than a year when the losses and troubles have probably faded from the minds of the victims themselves. As we have said, we do not know, in view of all this, how to appraise the gift. Are we going back to the early days of jurisprudence when punishments were based on personal vindictiveness and not on the vindication of the dignity and power of the State? Is this the "blood-money" for two Moslem lives? If so, it should have come from Hindu pockets and not from the public treasury. Or does it illustrate in a cruder form the doctrine of "compensation" which seems to be coming into vogue in public affairs? If so, we cannot help observing that Sir James Meston has a very poor estimate of the feelings and intelligence of the Mussalmans. If he had decided to exercise clemency in the case of the prisoners in response to Hindu appeals, he could have easily done so without injuring the self-respect of a sensitive community. The Mussalmans are not so shackled in spirit and so wedded to calculating price as to peg out a claim for "compensation" whenever the authorities elect to do a good turn to their Hindu neighbours. We trust the Mussalmans of Ajudhya will have enough dignity to refuse any help under circumstances such as these. This is, we are told, the first instalment of Sir James Meston's "unconditional" contribution to the Hindu-Moslem entente. Need we add that the hope thus held out is akin to that which Shelley mentioned in the famous lines:

"One hope is too like fear
 "For prudence to sue other."

Let us patiently await the second instalment and in the meantime pray to Heaven it may not be in its shape the second Ghost of Hamlet's father!

The Trustees of the Aligarh College, according to the constitution of the Moslem University Association, the formation of which was decided upon last year by the Moslem University Foundation Committee, elected forty members from amongst themselves at their last meeting to represent them on the Association.

The Moslem University Association. The voting recorded in each case affords a curious study and some food for not very edifying reflection. We will publish the names of the elected members with the votes they have respectively secured in a subsequent issue. For the present we may only say that, although the list contains the names of several people whose election would inspire confidence, there are not a few who can hardly be considered to be fitted for membership of the Moslem University Association either by their capacity or their past records of communal work. What is still more amazing is that men of the ability and tried worth of the Hon. Mr. Justice Abdur Rahim, Khan Bahadur H. M. Malik and the Hon. Lieut. Malik Mubariz Khan received only 38 votes each, and as only one more member had to be elected to make up the allotted number of forty, two of them would have been left out had not Messrs. Syed Zain-ud-din and Mohamed Saifraz Khan withdrawn in their favour. The Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola could get only 37 votes and got in after Maulvi Badr ul-Hasan Sahib had withdrawn. We are genuinely pleased to note that the example of self-sacrifice set on this occasion came from the three Old Boys of Aligarh and not from landholders and other rich men who have still got not one but two constituencies that can elect them. Such self-sacrifice, however, cannot always be depended upon in every case, and one can not but be dissatisfied with the indifferent manner in which the Aligarh Trustees have discharged their responsibility in dealing with matters of the highest moment to the community. Little attention seems to have been paid to individual merit, or to the aptitude and fitness of several elected members for the kind of work they will have to do. Almost every Trustee who took the trouble to attend the meeting was elected as a member of the University Association. We hope the Aligarh Trustees have not degenerated into a society of mutual admiration whose only function is to exercise neighbourly goodwill with sweet nonchalance. Among the forty representatives of the Trustees, apart from a wide disparity of merit and talent, the representation of the different provinces is most inadequate. The United Provinces preponderate with twenty-one representatives, the Punjab gets only five seats, Bengal three, Bombay two, Madras one, while Behar goes entirely unrepresented. Particularly noticeable is the feature that a donor whose contribution to the University Fund was the largest failed to get elected. His only faults are that he is not a U. P. landlord and was absent. We shall deal with the work that lies before the Moslem University Association in our next, and trust in the meantime that the Hon. Secretary will soon fix and publish dates for the other constituencies to elect their representatives for the Association.

"EX-CITIZEN," who is in fact one of the most intelligent and patriotic citizens of Delhi and who discussed an important "Tablet Scheme" for all notable and historical places in Delhi in the Comrade some months ago, writes to us as follows:—"I should like to refer to a matter of more than local interest touched on by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in his recent contribution to the Daily Citizen on the making of the new Delhi. In his usual outspoken manner he calls attention to a "new industry" which "has sprung up in the bazaar for the making of tablets informing surveyors that this and that is the resting place of this Khan and that Shah." It would seem as if Mr. Ramsay MacDonald had discovered a sudden and a desperate movement for a wholesale and indiscriminate bestowal of sanctity to the many thousands of crumbling and decaying tombs and stones scattered about Delhi. The statement might not improbably also lend itself to the suggestion that the attempt to hedge round innumerable spots with sanctity is being made wilfully in order to make matters difficult for the authorities and to interfere with the general lay-out of the town. It would be most unfortunate if such an impression gains ground as it has all the potentialities for friction and harm. I can confidently say that no such attempt has so far been made or contemplated and no such desperate movement inaugurated. All that has happened is that the wild and unauthorised rumours of the last year relating to the schemes for the making of the new town alarmed the people and caused uneasiness as to the fate of public burial-places, shrines and important tombs. A mosque had already been demolished and there were persistent rumours that other Khanqahs and shrines were similarly threatened, and naturally there was much anxiety prevailing at the time. Out of this necessity a society was then formed for taking steps for the preservation of important shrines and tombs, but it has not been able to do any substantial work so far. Shah Abdus-Samad Sahib has at some few places supplied tablets and carried out repairs, but that is nothing very unusual for him to do. As the leading Sufi in Delhi, he has on several occasions before now devoted his time and means to the care and repair of these places. Even the feeling of alarm and uneasiness, so much in evidence last year, has almost disappeared and people have been reassured, thanks to the very tactful and helpful manner in which the Hon. Mr. Hailey handled the situation after you had his attention to the matter. But while all this is satisfactory, it would be as well to remind the public and the authorities that Delhi has had a history and a civilisation and is full of cherished associations, ever so much dearer now that the Indian mind has awakened to a better appreciation of their value and to a sense of duty to them. In his elegy, Hali has feelingly spoken of the "gems of rarest beauty that lie buried here," and it only needs an Indian Ruskin to exhibit in fuller detail the historical associations, tombs and stones of Delhi. The wide range of these it is evidently difficult for an average European research scholar or administrator to grasp. His interest is limited to the handful of magnificent or eccentric Kings and few other figures of political importance, while the far wider field of religion, literature, science and art, the far more numerous characters representing the real life and history of this country, do not fall within his purview. Delhi has no Westminster Abbey where the roll-call is easy and the marks secure. Here the tombs are scattered; some have even disappeared (as that of the gifted poet Princess, Zaiib-un-Nisa, to make room for the Rajputana Malva Railway line, if Maneel's Guide to Delhi can be trusted), and in some cases diligent research will be necessary to locate them. In the circumstances, and in view of the impending complete transformation of the place, it seems quite possible that an effort will be made to secure important places and tombs, such as can be located, from disappearing altogether. In fact I have myself suggested in the Comrade the adoption of a memorial tablets scheme, and I trust that such an attempt, if and when made, will not be misunderstood and resented by the authorities. In my suggestion I have made due allowance for the Imperial requirements, and I think in the more important cases it should be possible to effect some such arrangement as has been recently announced in the Civil and Military Gazette with regard to the shrine of the Gura Tegh Bahadur. The thing is to recognise the importance of the matter, that it is a question of more than local interest which the widening responsibilities of the State and the awakening conscience of the people cannot well ignore. It should not be difficult for the English people, who in their own country so much cherish the vestiges of their glorious past, to allow us a similar human feeling and a like craving."

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

▼.

LAST week we endeavoured to prove—we hope with success—that section 4 sub-section (1) was the mainspring of the Press Act and that no scheme of modification could be deemed even moderately good unless that section was materially amended. Now we come to what the resolution itself moved by the Hon. Mr. Bannerjee in H. E. the Viceroy's Council on the 9th January itself demanded. We must confess at the very outset that if the Hon. the Home Member had got up after all the non-official speeches and had simply stated that he accepted the resolution on behalf of Government he would have hurled a veritable bomb at the hon. mover and his confederates. They could have gained nothing of any practical value and the resolution itself would have acted, politically if not legally, as an estoppel against further demands. Government lost a most splendid opportunity by rejecting the resolution, and, on the contrary, allowed an unfortunate impression to be created that a most modest demand, even when backed by the almost unanimous opinion of non-official members, is intolerable unless there is sustained and vigorous popular agitation in favour of a demand of more generous proportions. Such tactics make the people suspect that the English are bad givers and offer the gift only when a good deal of grace has already gone. And we must confess nothing turns an Oriental into an agitator more certainly than an intimate acquaintance with an Englishman's psychology, his character and his country's history.

The resolution moved by Mr. Bannerjee did not touch section 4 sub-section (1) at all, but related to two other matters brought to light by our Pamphlet Case, namely the character of the provision in the Press Act relating to the statement of the grounds of Government's opinion when declaring a forfeiture, and the bar of the jurisdiction even of the High Courts in cases in which the Government's order of forfeiture itself failed to conform to the provisions of the Act. The resolution ran as follows:—

"That this Council recommends to the Governor-General in Council that an amendment of the Press Act of 1910 be introduced in the Imperial Legislative Council so as to provide that when any order of forfeiture is made under the Act, the order must state or describe the offending words, or articles, or pictures, or engravings, or whatever it is upon which the Local Government bases its order, and that section 22 of the Act be so modified as to definitely empower the High Court to set aside an order of forfeiture not made in conformity with the provisions of section 4, 6, 9, 11 and 12 of the Act."

Now the Press Act provides for the forfeiture of the following:—

(1) Under section 4, the primary security of a printing-press (which may range between Rs. 500 and 2,000 in the case of a press opened after the commencement of the Act and between Rs. 500 and 5,000 in the case of older presses), together with all copies of the offending publication wherever found.

(2) Under section 6, the secondary security (which may range between Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 10,000) together with the printing-press and all copies of the offending publication wherever found.

(3) Under Section 9, the primary security of a newspaper (which may range between Rs. 500 and Rs. 2,000 in the case of newspapers established after commencement of the Act, and between Rs. 500 Rs. 5,000 in the case of older papers), together with all copies of the newspaper wherever found.

(4) Under Section 11, the secondary security of a newspaper, (which may range between Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 10,000) together with all copies of the newspaper wherever found.

(5) Under section 12, any offending newspaper, book or other document wherever found.

In each of the first four cases the law already requires the Local Government to declare the forfeiture "by notice in writing" to the keeper of the offending printing-press or to the publisher of the offending newspaper, as the case may be, at the same time "stating or describing the words, signs or visible representations which in its opinion are of the nature described" in section 4 sub-section (1). In the last case however, the Local Government is required to declare the forfeiture "by notification in the local official Gazette, stating the grounds of its opinion." Evidently Mr. Bannerjee's resolution was intended to make the procedure in the case of the forfeiture of an offending newspaper book or other document under section 12 similar to the procedure in the case of the four kinds of forfeitures under sections 4, 6, 9 and 11, though the hon. mover specifically said so neither in the resolution nor in his speech. He had borrowed the phraseology of his resolution not from sections 4, 6, 9 and 11 of the Act itself, but from the speech of the former Law Member of the Executive Council, Mr. S. P. Sinha, who had, in the course of his, alas! too persuasive defence of the Press Bill in 1908, said that it was no use attempting to convince Government that "it was a drastic measure" because Government had put in all "kinds of safeguards." Mr. Sinha had then "assured the Council of the existence of "another safeguard"; namely, that "when the Local Government makes the order of forfeiture, the Bill provides that it must state or describe the offending words, or articles, or pictures, or engravings or whatever it is, upon which it bases its order." He had added:

No making an order which is vague, which is indefinite. No order without allowing the man to know what he is being punished for, but a definite order stating the very words of the article or describing it as that which the man is being punished for. Is that not a safeguard? Apart from the Tribunal of Appeal, is it not a safeguard to provide that a man will not have his security forfeited without being told exactly what he has written that is taken exception to?

We have the greatest possible respect for the undoubted forensic gifts of our universally esteemed and admired fellow-countryman whose words of 1908 we have here quoted, and even if it were not, so, we feel certain that the opinion of a layman on a point of law would carry little weight against that of a lawyer. We could not therefore, venture to differ from so eminent a lawyer as Mr. Sinha without the utmost urgency, and even then not without the utmost diffidence. But we beg leave to say that the question is not, entirely one of law. Whether the statement or description of the offending words or pictures or engravings is, or is not any safeguard for a journalist is a question in which the journalist cannot be altogether put out of court by the lawyer. To our mind it is hardly any consolation to a journalist, much less a safeguard for him, to be told that certain words which he wrote or published under the belief that they were innocuous were offensive in the sight of law if this knowledge leads him no further. This so-called safeguard is no better than a cul de sac. We may just as well assure an ordinary citizen that whenever we desire to hang him by the neck till he is dead we shall tell him which of the innumerable acts in his daily life which he had done in good faith have persuaded us to sentence him to death. Such a statement or description may or may not enable him to make his peace with Heaven, but it will not help him very much on earth. We venture to think that the provision in the Act to which Mr. Sinha had referred was intended mainly to assist the person adversely affected when he sought justice from the one Court in the Empire of which the jurisdiction was entirely barred by section 22 of the Act. To say that it was a safeguard "apart from the Tribunal of Appeal" betrays, if we may so, an unfortunate confusion of thought. As a matter of fact the statement or description of offending words, pictures etc., was absolutely necessary if a reference to the judiciary was to be permitted. This would be perfectly clear if we imagined for argument's sake that such a statement was not provided for by law. In that case the notice in writing to the keeper of the offending printing-press or the publisher of the offending newspaper would have merely declared the forfeiture. How then, could he go to the Tribunal of Appeal? What could he state in his application, and what could the High Court judge and determine? No, the statement or description of offending words, pictures etc., was in the main meant to furnish to the person adversely affected some ground at least for his appeal, and to the Tribunal of Appeal both the material to judge and the necessary data on which to base its judgments. In other words, this was no separate safeguard but only ancillary to the sole safeguard provided by the Act, namely, a reference of the order of the highest executive to the highest judicial authority.

We have laboured this point merely to show that if the statement or description referred to is to assist the person adversely affected and the Court to which he appeals, it is for them and them alone to say whether the statement or description is sufficient for that purpose. Let us first take the printer or publisher. All that he gets even in cases of forfeiture to which the Hon. Mr. Bannerjee's resolution takes no objection is a "description" of an article or articles. In the latest case, that of the Zamindar, three articles extending over five columns in length are "described" by their headings and declared to contain words of the character described in section 4 sub-section (1) of the Press Act. Does the keeper of the Zamindar printing-press realise through such a "description" what it is that he has to prove in the way of a negative in case he chooses to throw good money after bad by appealing to the Lahore Chief Court and undertaking what Sir Lawrence Jenkins called an "almost hopeless task"? Nay, does he even understand any better than he did before what he should avoid in future if he tempts fortune further by opening another printing-press? Surely we can only guess and even conjecture is made difficult by the proscription of not one but three articles. Take the case of the Badr, a religious paper of the Ahmadi or Qadiani sect of Mussalmans. Is it to understand that in future controversies with a four-months Christian Missionary it is to eschew every reference to biology and invent childish miracles to refute the Christian doctrine of Atonement, or is to believe that because the powers that we are woefully ignorant of the languages of this country, it should carry on polemics with Christian Missionaries in two languages, in Urdu for its own readers and in English for the gentleman entrusted by the Panjab Government with the task of punishing the Moslem Press?

Let us now turn to the Tribunal of Appeal. Is it in any better position? In the one case that has been taken up to it, namely, our own, the offending words and pictures were "described" no less clearly—nor more clearly either—than in the numerous cases of printing-presses and newspapers which have forfeited their securities. Instead of an article or a number of articles, the offending publication was a Pamphlet of several scores of pages. Had it been an article or a number of articles Government would have done what the Act required it to do by merely stating the title of the Pamphlet in question, namely, "Come Over Into Macedonia and Help Us", which it had done in the notification. Would that have satisfied us or the Court? It is certain that it would have satisfied the requirement of the Hon. Mr. Banerjee's resolution. But Government went further and stated that the Pamphlet contained words which were "likely to bring into hatred or contempt certain classes of His Majesty's subjects in British India." Whether this is sufficient or not is not the question at present. But it made it clear that except the two alternatives of bringing certain classes of our fellow-subjects into hatred, or into contempt, the words were not likely to incite to murder, nor to any offence under the Explosive Substances Act, nor to any act of violence, nor to seduce any officer, soldier or sailor in the Army or Navy of His Majesty from his allegiance or his duty, nor to bring about one or more of the remaining 40 out of the total of 42 dire results—the learned Advocate General is not analytical enough to resolve section 4 sub-section (1) into more than 30 factors—intended to be prevented by the Press Act. Now sections 4, 6, 9 and 11, on the model of which section 12 was sought to be amended, make no provision even for this. Having "described" the offending words by referring to the heading of an article, or name of a publication, in a notice in writing to the printer or publisher, the Local Government need not even tell him which of the 42 offences described in section 4 sub-section (1) has been committed, but may proceed to confiscate the security, printing-press and all. It is clear that Mr. Banerjee's "irreducible minimum", if accepted, would have reduced rather than added to the extent of the "safeguard" already provided in section 12. The law has, in fact, provided greater "safeguards" in cases relating to what Sir Reginald Craddock calls "the objectionable book or document which will in many cases—in fact in most cases—be of most trivial value" than in cases in which a security, which may amount to Rs. 10,000, and a printing-press of unlimited value may be declared to be forfeited. This is only another of the paradoxes of this wonderful piece of legislation rushed through the legislature at break-neck speed in five days.

But although for obvious reasons we are anxious to show up its absurdities, we did not set out to do so in the present instance. Our object was and is to prove that even the statement of grounds provided for in section 12, which is a more extensive safeguard than the mere statement or description of words and pictures, is not sufficient in the opinion of the Judges themselves for the purpose of a reference to the judiciary if it is to be only of the nature to be usually found in Government Notifications. Let us, therefore, consult the three seniormost Judges of the Calcutta High Court. Says the Chief Justice :

On learning that it appears to the Government in any particular case that there are words of the nature described in section 4 (1) the first question that occurs to anyone whose duty it is to enquire, is why does it so appear, what are the grounds of its opinion? Those responsible for the Act foresaw this, and so they specifically provided that the forfeiting Notification should state the grounds of the Local Government's opinion.

But when we turn to the Notification no such grounds are stated; nothing in the nature of a fact is set forth, there is merely a citation of the words of the section which are invoked. The Notification seems to take this shape:—"It appears to the Local Government that these are words likely to bring into hatred or contempt a class or section of His Majesty's subjects in British India, and the grounds of its opinion are that the words are likely to bring into hatred or contempt certain classes of His Majesty's subjects in India."

But the repetition of an opinion cannot be its grounds, and yet that is all that the application furnish in the shape of grounds. This is obviously insufficient and not a compliance with the terms of the Act.

Moreover, I think that this direction in the section is mandatory and that the legislature intend to impose and has imposed on the Local Governments an imperative obligation to state the grounds of its opinion.

I have already dealt with one phase of absence of grounds in the Notification. This defect and the Government's failure to place before us any materials beyond those provided by the applicant have sensibly added to our difficulties in discharging the peculiar duties cast on us by the Act. The Notification does not even specify the classes that might be brought into hatred or contempt, or even if these two dire consequences are apprehended. And so when

Mr. Norton rose to address the Court he had to seek this information from the Advocate-General.

With the foregoing opinion Mr. Justice Woodroffe concurred. As for the third Judge, Sir Harry Stephen, he wrote in the course of a separate judgment :

It appeared to the local Government that the pamphlet before us contained words that were likely directly, indirectly or (to abbreviate) in any possible way, to bring Englishmen or Christians being His Majesty's subjects in British India into hatred as a class. They accordingly published a Notification in the local Gazette declaring the pamphlet forfeited and giving as a ground of their opinion that the pamphlet was likely to bring Englishmen and Christians into hatred—the fact that it was likely to bring them into hatred. . . . I am of opinion that the Notification is not according to law. Looking at the section, and indeed at the Act as a whole, I have no doubt that the provision in section 12 that the grounds of opinion on which the Local Government have acted must be stated, is mandatory and not merely directory. There can be no doubt that it is found for the protection of any person whose property may be confiscated, and not merely for the purposes of administrative convenience. The ground of opinion must in this case, if not always, be a fact or facts, and no fact is disclosed merely by a specific relation of the elements that the law requires to be present in order for legal consequences to follow. I have already described the statement of the grounds in terms which seem to me to lead to an absurdity, but I have taken pains to make them correct. I cannot say what facts should be stated. I do not think, for example, that it can be the case that the Local Government should state to us all the information on which they have acted, for I cannot suppose that we are to revise their action as a whole. On the other hand we have, it appears, power to revise their action to some extent, and for this purpose some statement of facts seems essential. . . . Though I cannot say what facts are to be stated in order to disclose the ground for the opinion on which the Local Government acts, I think it may be the case that a statement of facts too meagre to give an applicant under section 17 any real assistance would be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 12.

In a previous article we have quoted in full the opinion of Sir Harry Stephen and would only mention here that he was greatly embarrassed at being placed in a position in which, according to him, no Judge in the British Empire has been placed since the remote days of early English jurisprudence. He had been called upon to decide a question of fact on such evidence as was supplied by a single document; the side on whom the onus of proving his case was cast was not placed in a position to give any evidence; the other side had not called any witness, thereby escaping cross examination; and the question that the Judge was to decide depended upon the social and political status of a community with regard to which no information had been supplied to him, while it had never been his duty to acquire any information in the matter, and what information he did possess was unverified and general to a high degree,—in fact to so high a degree that he frankly confessed it was impossible for him to share in other people's feeling of respect for his opinion in the matter as it would be derived from a respect for his high office only.

Turning to the proceedings in Court, we get some passages perhaps even more illuminating. The Chief Justice had said:

"We do not know the facts, only the Government has the facts. . . . We can do nothing except in the eye of the public whatever our convictions may be as to the character of the Government. We cannot form any opinion apart from the facts. . . . It is intended that the Court should be in as good a position as the Government to judge the merits of any proscribed thing. That is why the grounds should be stated. It may be within the knowledge of Government that certain innocent words bear a sinister significance which we may not know." On another occasion the Chief Justice said that "grounds mean facts and not law," and when the Advocate-General said, "When we mention that the pamphlet is of such a character and we therefore proscribe it, we give facts," the Chief Justice replied: "That is to say 'we are of opinion because we are of opinion.'" Mr. Justice Woodroffe said: "The less particulars are alleged the more difficult it is to say that a publication does not come under section 4. We are left to guess a lot of things." Addressing the Advocate-General his lordship added: "According to your argument nothing need be set out at all. Government may be in possession of the grounds and yet they are not bound to declare what these grounds are."

From the foregoing expressions of the opinions of the three seniormost Judges of the premier High Court in India the following conclusions emerge clearly and must not be lost sight of:—

(1) That the statement of grounds is a mandatory condition of a valid declaration of forfeiture.

(2) That the repetition of an opinion cannot be its grounds, and that facts and not "merely a citation of the words of a section which are invoked," or, in other words, "the specific relation of the elements that the law requires to be present in order for legal consequences to follow" can be the grounds of an opinion.

(3) That the statement of grounds is "an essential part of the Legislature's scheme, for it might help the High Court to perform the duties cast on it under section 17," and the absence of such a statement would "sensibly add to the High Court's difficulties in discharging the peculiar duties cast on it by the Act." That, in short, "it is intended that the Court should be in as good a position as the Government to judge the merits of any proscribed thing."

(4) That "the less particulars are alleged the more difficult it is to say that a publication does not come under section 4."

(5) That as the Act stands, "it may be the case that a statement of facts too meagre to give an applicant under section 17 any real assistance would be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 12."

(6) And that, finally, those appearing for Government in a Press Act case are not averse to arguing that "nothing need be set out at all."

We shall consider next week what reply Government deemed it fit to give to these scathing criticisms of the law as it stands and the customary procedure of Government.

The Indian Moslems' Tasks.

VII

In concluding our survey of Moslem affairs in India, it seems desirable to group together the various aspects of the Moslem problem in order to give to it the right perspective it needs and emphasise the points requiring the immediate and undivided attention of the community. The first object that every enlightened and patriotic Mussalman may be expected to have in view is to have his community efficiently organised and richly endowed with every faculty for self-development. Many decades of ceaseless effort will be necessary before the goal of his aspiration comes in sight. When the goal is reached and the Mussalmans of India are raised to a plane of social and intellectual efficiency needed for a fruitful existence under modern conditions, the horizons would expand and the life purpose would grow clear in the light of growing thought. What is required to-day is preparation, training, the release of mind and spirit from the tyranny of environment—in short, education.

We have said enough what the Mussalmans need in the matter of their moral and intellectual equipment. Indian education itself is in a stage of what is usually called experiment, i.e., a fragmentary and tentative search in which both the State and the people are engaged to find the ideal and fix the type. The position of Moslem education is relatively worse. The statistics of literacy, as compiled in the recent Census Report, disclose a state of things that cannot but be exceedingly alarming to the well-wishers of the community. In primary education the proportion of the Mussalmans is below their numerical percentage in the population. In secondary education they lag grievously behind the other communities, while in higher education their position is growing steadily worse. The percentage of literacy on the whole has risen in the community during the last decade, but the rise has been quite disproportionate to the growth of literacy in the whole of India. In other words, while education is growing steadily but slowly among the Mussalmans, the pace of educational progress among the Hindus is quicker by far; and thus it is manifest that the former are losing every year in the relative strength and importance implied by communal efficiency. The Moslem need, however, is not simply to provide means for the quantitative growth of education in the community, but to improve the quality of education itself by adapting it to the social, moral and spiritual needs of the Mussalmans. The Moslem educational programme should, therefore, comprise two-sided effort—the organisation of education on communal lines as well as the provision of facilities to make it readily accessible in all its useful branches to the mass of the people.

As regards the organisation of Moslem education, it is needless to insist that the effort should proceed from the top. It is imperative that the highest educational ideals evolved by the community should find a local habitation first of all. They should first produce their atmosphere and fertilise the soil from which would spring forth vitalising ideas needed to stimulate and uplift the people. In other words, the creation of the Moslem University is absolutely necessary if the organisation of Moslem education is to be undertaken with any hope of success. Primary and secondary education may grow without a Moslem University to direct it, but it can never be the same power for good as it would be when it has a definite type and ideal before it and is fully responsive to social needs. The greatest energies of the Mussalmans should, therefore, be applied to bringing the University project into practical shape. This is by far the most important item of their educational programme. Now, the Moslem University project is hanging fire and mainly through the fault of the Mussalman leaders themselves. The community has already indicated with unmistakable clearness the sort of university it will have. And it is useless to disguise the fact that certain decisions announced by the Secretary of State through the Government of India in regard to the matter run counter to the wishes of the Mussalmans. The question of affiliation is the soul of the University scheme. And although we have reason to believe that Sir Harcourt Butler, the Member for Education, at first favoured the Moslem demand and even pressed for its acceptance by the Secretary of State for India, he nevertheless dropped his earlier attitude as soon as Lord Crewe was led to place his veto on the proposal. We trust, however, that both the Government of India and the Secretary of State are still open to conviction, and, in any case, the Mussalmans should concentrate their efforts on the question and take early steps to lay their considered views before the Government in a manner that would carry weight and ensure success.

Moslem education in the primary and secondary stages must necessarily lack the desired impetus as long as the communal spirit does not resolve itself into definite ideals in the atmosphere of a living university. Much, however, can be done in the meantime to prepare the ground by providing such facilities as would attract Moslem boys in ever-increasing numbers to receive instruction in the existing primary and secondary schools. Local anjumans and associations should take the matter in hand and organise efforts to meet the local needs. Fresh committees should be formed where none exists, and no pains should be spared to tackle with the whole problem in a resolute spirit. The Circular of the Government of India on the subject of Moslem education has already evoked a sympathetic response from the Local Governments, and it may reasonably be hoped that definite lines of co-operation between the authorities and responsible Moslem bodies in each province would soon take shape with a view to remove the obstacles that lie across the path of Moslem education, especially in regard to its primary and secondary stages. Instruction in primary schools should be made free in areas where the chief obstacle is the poverty of the Mussalmans. There are, however, numerous places where apathy and constitutional distaste are the chief causes responsible for Moslem illiteracy, and the only way to overcome these is to organise a propagandist campaign informed with the zeal of the missionary. The type of Moslem "leader" that has mismanaged Moslem politics, and trampled many a communal interest under foot in his mad career for cheap fame, has obviously no taste or aptitude for such a task. Men of a wholly different type are needed for the purpose. We will not be surprised, though it may cause some confusion in other quarters, if some of the "hot-heads" of the community lead the way and help to solve one of the most anxious problems of Moslem education by their energy, enthusiasm and perseverance.

The provision of facilities for giving industrial training and technical education to an adequate number of Moslem boys is also a desideratum that is apt to be lost sight of. The economic development of India is a process yet in its infancy, but it is growing fast and assuming importance commensurate with its magnitude. Political power and social initiative naturally gravitate in the direction of wealth and intelligence, and the community that takes the most active part in the building of India's economic future will inevitably come to exercise dominant influence in her councils. The Mussalman's poverty is already a great handicap to him, and if he does not take heed in time the future will have no mercy for his plight, and he will be literally reduced to the position of the hewer of wood and drawer of water. The only way to avoid such a forbidding prospect is to take the necessary measures now for preparing a sufficient number of Moslem boys every year for industrial occupations and professions requiring technical skill and knowledge. The problem of women's education is not less important. We have already discussed it at some length and would only point out how urgent it has grown. Social efficiency will never be achieved by the Mussalmans as long as Moslem women remain sunk in ignorance. All progress postulates enlightened mothers and intelligent and efficient housewives. To have its one-half turned into a perpetual dead-weight is not an ideal equipment for a community to live and strive amid the conditions of the modern world.

In the political sphere, we have endeavoured to show that the Mussalmans have to maintain their communal individuality as well as to co-operate with the other communities for the general good of the country. Towards the British rule their attitude is one of hopefulness and trust, for they have never ceased to believe that it alone guarantees the conditions necessary for their advancement.

as indeed for the peaceful progress of India as a whole. The period of stress and storm through which they have passed has not been without its effect on the temper of their rulers, and there have not been wanting mischief-mongers who have endeavoured to sow suspicion about the spirit and objects of the recent movements of Moslem India. That a number of British officials should have grown uneasy about the Moslem excitement and its widespread character was only natural. But we can hardly admire the mental balance of not a few among them who began to spurt wrath because, forsooth, the Moslem hand had begun to smart with pain. There are no people in the world so easy to govern as the Indians, and none so accessible to sympathy as the Mussalmans. If only their detractors understood what the Mussalmans had gone through, they would have hesitated to indulge in fierce invective and abuse, even if they could not have sympathised with them in their griefs. We need not set about to analyse the causes and character of the Moslem excitement. We would only remind the creators of "the Indian Peril", like the Times, that the Moslem community would not have been as quiet and desirous of peace as it is to-day if the recent Moslem excitement had contained in its elements hostile to British rule. The Mussalmans desire nothing but peace. They would not willingly forfeit the confidence and goodwill of their rulers. It is equally hoped that the rulers will not let their imaginations be fed on bogeys of monstrous shapes which are mere emanations from heat-oppressed brains. Undeserved suspicions and unmerited frowns only serve to drive people into an attitude that might ultimately prove to be a source of real danger to the peaceful progress of the country.

We made some general observations in our last in regard to the real basis of co-operation between the Hindus and the Mussalmans for the common good of both. The political advance of India in the direction of self-government cannot but be the most cherished aspiration of all patriotic and self-respecting men in the two communities. The advance will continue to be indefinitely retarded as long as an approximation of political method does not take place and the political ideal is not made to fit in with the conceptions of religious duty. All existing differences have their root in the fact that the Nationalism of the Indian political platform carries no appeal to the real intimacies of the communal heart and mind. The enthusiasm of the average politician is due not so much to the inspiring nature of the political ideal as to the perfervid communal patriotism that it has awakened in his breast. The Indian Nationalism should neither be exclusively Hindu nor Mussalman, but a broader conception including the aspirations of both. It should be such as would disarm the suspicions and fears of minorities and give them every assurance about the safety of their communal individualities and their faiths. These results can only be achieved by attempting something like the federation of Indian faiths on a common political basis. The problem is not difficult to solve. Only the right spirit and temper are needed to prepare the way for its solution. The Mussalmans who have begun to move with fresh political aspirations should realise full well that their participation in the general political activities of the country would be effective and useful only when their intellectual and moral equipment is adequate for the purpose. A weak and ill-organised Moslem community would not only be unequal to the struggle necessary for maintaining its rights unimpaired and making its claims heard, but also be a burden to the people of India as a whole.

We have outlined in these articles the right ideals for the Mussalmans, and although the new political ideals were the outcome of at least apparently painful partition, we trust the travail is now over. The best thing that the Mussalmans can do with their ideals now is to place them, not on too great an eminence where their beacon-light may be too remote to guide their footsteps, but at least on a sufficiently high level to be visible from afar and at a safe enough distance to prevent their being kicked away by the hurrying crowds. The battle of ideals should now be over, and every one should set about to frame a present-day policies based on those ideals, and working programmes conforming to those policies. The Mussalmans cannot do better than commence with education, and those who talk a great deal against "destructive criticism" should provide for the community sufficient "constructive work". This only the sanction for a Moslem University such as would by now have come into being if the Secretary of State had not interfered in such a disconcerting manner so late in the day, can provide, and the solution of the Moslem University difficulty is to us the touchstone of a disinterested desire to wean off Mussalmans from a love of excitement and to set them on the path of peaceful progress. This is at once an appeal and a challenge. Let him who is sincere and earnest take up the one and respond to other.

Garden Cities for India.

(By Mr. P. A. V. IYER.)

Of all questions relating to Man, at all events, as far as he is concerned with the world we live in, of which only, by the way, we can in any sense be certain, none is so highly important or so greatly neglected as his physical well-being, what doctors would call Health. It is unnecessary for the purpose of this article to enter here on any elaborate technical discussion of the subject—it is the rightful province of doctors and hygienists—but I may state what I should think is a self-evident proposition, viz, to Man his health is all important, on the basis of which his superstructure in this world and may be in the next must be reared; but unfortunately the average public Health is worse off to-day than at any time before. The second part of my statement may not be so conclusively evident, for there be folks who will contend that at no time was the science of public and private Health so finely developed and men and women were better enabled to attend to their bodily conveniences as now. I quite agree. But I contend, nevertheless, that owing to various causes within and beyond our control, we of our generation are certainly moving more and more away from the normal standard of health. In fact, it is my sincere belief that, be the cause what it may, we of to-day are, to put it mildly, more unhealthy than those who preceded us a good while ago. This may not be our fault: I verily believe it is not. But that appears to me to be the fact. It is easy enough to imagine that, when the population was much less than it is now and men and women were enabled to live in villages; when the competition for a living was not so keen as at present and people could lead a comparatively quiet, secluded and peaceful life; when wants were but few and work less severe the general masses of the people led a more or less simple life of what is called "a plain living and high thinking." Now all that is changed. We have been very fruitful and multiplied ourselves enormously. Great masses of the people have been pushed away from their homes and are obliged to congregate in crowded cities and towns. Wealth has increased and so our wants. Factories and workshops have followed close, and produced narrow lanes, stuffed houses, and a poisoned atmosphere. Result, a stunted race. All this is the outcome of too literal a practice of Christ's words: "Be ye fruitful, and multiply."

There is no doubt that the exceeding augmentation of the population is the cause of it all. Far be it from me to condemn marriage or its outcome. But I am looking only at the results. And this evil, if it can be called such, of over-population is nowhere so evident as in our larger cities and towns, which themselves were called into being to accommodate a surplusage of the people. I am afraid, however, that the thing is past recall, and we must accept the conditions as we may find them. But it rests with us not to make them worse and to mitigate and deaden as far as is possible the ills that they may have brought about. It is to us but a too familiar sight—the crowded town, the tall smoky chimneys, a heterogeneous population a portion of which reeks in murder, misery and filth, while none of it is exempt from the general contaminated atmosphere, adulterated supplies of food, etc. I have already said that facts must be taken as they are, and we must see therefore what steps we can take to oppose these corroding influences with such as may lead to better health and better living. In England, the problem of the crowded city has been solved by what has been termed the "Garden City Movement." Originally started in one of the greatest manufacturing parts of the country, Oldham in Lancashire, this laudable endeavour has spread throughout England, and has transformed the "devil workshop" into a veritable Garden of Eden. We in India are rapidly copying the West in her industrial methods, and it will not take long, if it has not been already upon us, for the identical depressing conditions to be reproduced in Indian towns and cities. We would do well therefore to copy this also from the West, and so save our workmen, the back-bone of the country, from moral and physical ruin.

Unfortunately, no connected narrative of the Garden City Movement in England is available. But very useful information can be gathered from a study of some of those gardenised cities of which we have record. I shall detail therefore the conditions obtaining in these English cities in this and subsequent articles I will contribute to this Journal, and see what they have got to teach us in India.

I take now Hampstead. Hampstead, according to a Home paper, has always presented so many attractions to residents that it is not at all surprising the district was selected as a site for an experiment in connection with the Garden City Movement. An exceptionally high elevation, a fine open country to the north and the immediate neighbourhood of the widespread and beautifully natural Hampstead Heath—an open space of 240 acres in perpetuity—render the situation practically unique. By the addition of Parliament Hill the area now secured to the public amounts to about 500 acres, and the advantages to residents are obvious. For those who desire a breezy and bracing locality, it would be difficult to find a position to equal this, and probably none to surpass it in the vicinity of a great city. The district consequently possesses a remarkably interesting history, for numbers of English celebrities have chosen it for their homes within the past two hundred years.

The estate chosen for the commencement of the scheme adjoins the Heath at one point and extends for a mile and a half towards Finchley. There is considerable difference in the levels, which is well described by the term "undulating," but at several parts the land rises to a height of over 300 feet above sea-level. To those who have known this garden suburb from the inauguration on May 2nd, 1907, when Mrs. S. A. Barnett cut the first sod, it is astonishing to note the progress made in the brief period of six years. Work was commenced by a Society formed for the purpose, termed Hampstead Tenants Limited, and at the end of the first year, this body had raised in shares £8,417, and in loan stock £6,668, but, at the end of the fourth year, the share capital had advanced to £22,711, while the loan stock stood at £87,780, and the value of the completed estate is estimated at £142,000. Another Society termed "The Second Hampstead Tenants," was formed later, and the completed value of the land and houses controlled by that body, it is estimated, will equal £200,000. Still another Society—"The Third Hampstead Tenants"—has been formed, and in this case, estimate for the completed work is yet higher, no less than a quarter of a million. Necessarily, however, a large proportion of the third scheme has yet to be carried into execution, but it is remarkable that the three bodies combined will control a total value in houses and land of nearly £600,000. The committees or managers of the three societies have been singularly fortunate in securing the aid of distinguished modern architects who have had special experience in connection with similar undertakings elsewhere. The result is that every road includes examples of tastefully designed houses which combine artistic effect with carefully studied utility. In the groupings and at corners of the chief roads, the benefits arising from the exercise of individual taste, combined with an endeavour to realise a general style adapted to the undertaking, are particularly manifest. The general effect is excellent, and it well indicates, as the managers claim, how scientific planning improves the appearance of an estate.

It must be remembered it is made obligatory that not more than twelve houses shall, on the average, be allowed to each acre of the area, and this enables a generous proportion of the estate to be reserved for open spaces, ample roads, and good gardens. It is claimed also that a step forward has been taken by "the banishment of the heavy suburban back wall." The managers say it is "an urban superstition that side walls mean privacy, but they afford no real seclusion, and utterly disfigure what else might be one of the pleasantest things the various residents could enjoy, a green openness full of flowers, trees, and lanes." Hedges of flowering plants or shrubs are therefore encouraged, and these add more to the beauty of the suburb; particularly as more kinds of flowering trees have been planted than is usual on such estates. A most commendable attention is paid to the general upkeep of the gardens, grounds and open spaces, and it would seem that the spirit of considerate custodianship pervades the whole estate. The personal interest felt by the tenants who are investors in the societies, also ensures the greatest care in the maintenance of the houses in good condition, thus effecting a considerable economy in the annual outlay for repairs.

All these societies are registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act of 1893, and the rules provide that non-tenants as well as tenants become investors. The interest may not exceed 5 per cent., which is that actually paid on shares, 4½ per cent. on loan stock of £50 and upwards, with 4 per cent. on smaller amounts. No individual, whether tenant or not, can hold more than £200 worth of shares, thus preventing any encroachment by way of unlimited purchase by one person. A very wise safeguard. As regards the tenant investors, it is required that "each person shall ultimately obtain loan stock of the amount of £50, or two years' rent of the house occupied, whichever is the greater." This can be paid up at once or paid in instalments, but both are credited with interest on the amount paid up. It is worth noting that the first Society obtained possession of the land on a quite exceptional lease, equivalent to a freehold, renewable every 99 years, the explanation being that "the Hampstead Garden-Suburb Trust being for the benefit of the public in perpetuity could not part with freehold;" but the difference seems to be mainly technical.

Before concluding the present article, I may as well make a brief reference to what has been done in Belfast, King Carson's Capital you know, in this regard. The account I give below is summarised from a report presented by the Principal of the Municipal Technical Institute of the place. Some five years ago, writes the Principal, one of our Belfast citizens who was brought much into contact with working men, conceived the idea that, if he could secure pieces of open ground and divide these up into small plots, he might be able to provide useful occupation for the spare time of the men in whom he was interested. A beginning was made and a piece of ground containing about six acres was duly rented. This ground was suitably fenced and divided into a number of plots rectangular in form, each plot containing about 100 square yards. The plots were let out at annual rentals of ten shillings each. So successful was this first effort that from time to time other pieces of ground were secured and dealt with in a similar manner and, to-day, there is under cultivation, within the municipal boundary of Belfast, a total area of some fifty acres; there are over 600 plot-holders. Most gratifying of all, the movement is steadily growing, and only within the past few days one of our large trading societies has decided to enter into this work and on a large scale. In selecting ground for allotments, efforts were made to find areas which were situated in a position reasonably convenient to the dwellings of the working people and this desirable result has been secured in almost all cases. The ground available has not always been of the best quality for purposes of horticulture. In some cases, it has been too sandy; in others too wet, or too rough, or too hilly; some pieces of ground were little better than brick crofts, but by diligent and persevering effort on the part of the holders, the plots have been brought into a most gratifying state of cultivation—a fact which reflects the highest credit upon the workers. It should be mentioned that, at each of the main allotment areas, one plot is set apart as a demonstration plot. On this plot, all materials are provided by the Corporation; in all other cases, plot-holders provide their own gardening tools, seeds, manures and other requirements. In developing his ideas, Mr. Charles W. Black (the citizen to whom reference has been made) endeavoured to launch his scheme so that there should be attached to it the minimum of rules and regulations. He made it a rule, however, that the crops grown on each plot should include six kinds of vegetables, and that a border of flowers should be grown along the edge of the plot. This condition has been loyally carried out. Some eighteen months ago, the need of trained direction for the allotment holders began to be seriously felt. As the result of representations made to them, the Corporation, through its Technical Instruction Committee, appointed a Horticultural Instructor. The duties of this Instructor are varied, and include visiting the plots and giving to plot-holders such advice as may be asked for or as seems desirable, the delivery of evening lectures on such topics as "The Soil," "Soil Operation," "Manures, their Value and their Effect on Particular Crops," "Fruit, Vegetable and Flower Culture," &c. The Instructor is also available for giving advice to persons who have small gardens attached to their houses, and enquiries from such persons are frequently received. In addition to the above duties, the Horticultural Instructor gives advice to Committees who are arranging flower-shows, exhibitions of cottage gardening and similar movements.

A further interesting development has taken place recently. Persons who are so situated as not to be able to obtain allotments are taking up window-box Gardening. This development has opened up a wide field of usefulness for citizens who have time and opportunity to enter into social service, and who wish to ameliorate the conditions under which their poorer fellow-citizens live. In this branch of work, a beginning was made by preparing a number of specimens of window-boxes, those ranging from the small rough packing box obtainable either gratis or at the cost of a copper coin, to the more elaborate article which can only be made by the skilled joiner. To these specimens was added a collection of hanging baskets of various forms. A series of sketches was prepared and supplemented by written notes for the purpose of indicating in a simple manner how the boxes were to be filled with materials to allow of drainage and with soil. Lists of suitable plants were drawn up, prices were stated, and diagrams were printed to indicate how the plants could best be arranged in the boxes. Armed with these materials, the Horticultural Instructor entered upon a round of lectures on window-box Gardening. From night to night, he visited the various districts of the City, delivering the lectures to interested audiences. Since these lectures have been inaugurated, there has been a marked increase in the City of the number of window-boxes. In several cases, the whole of the houses in a street have been provided with window-boxes and they contained plants at the expense of persons interested in philanthropic work. The benefit to the residents of these streets by the brightening of the houses has been very noticeable. The interest in this simpler kind of Gardening continues to grow and lately applications have been received from residents in those working-class streets where there are small raised-in areas in front of the dwellings, asking if soil and plants could be provided.

Still other developments of the programme of Horticulture have been brought into operation. For example, during the present session, some one hundred and fifty National School Teachers in the City of Belfast have entered upon a course of Nature Study, the instruction being given by the Horticultural Instructor whose work has been supplemented by lectures delivered by experts in special sections of the subject, supplementary to their study in the classroom. The teacher-students pay visits to neighbouring districts of botanical and geological interest. It is confidently hoped that, as a result of 14th February.

The Comrade.

139

the most praiseworthy efforts of the teachers who are undergoing this training and the impetus which is thereby being given to this branch of educational work, that the desire will be planted deeply in the breasts of our school children to pursue this fascinating and healthful branch of study.

The Technical Instruction Committee of the Belfast Corporation also provide systematic instruction in School Gardening for National School Teachers and, to facilitate this work, have rented a plot of ground on the outskirts of the City. On this plot, School Gardening work is being carried on in the most thorough manner. The plot is divided up into small sections, each in charge of a teacher student. A portion of the plot is reserved for various classes of special experiments. In this school gardens are planted with different varieties of apple trees, pear trees, raspberries, strawberries and vegetables, while a portion of the area is set apart for flowers. In the instruction given to this group of teacher-students, a special feature is made of scientific methods of Gardening.

Indian Moslem Outlook.

The following are extracts from H. H. the Aga Khan's article in the January number of the Edinburgh Review:—

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS.

But the Mohamedans newly awakened to national consciousness by the education England has given them, are not limited in their gaze by the vast ramparts of the Himalayas or by the waters of the Indian Ocean. There is between them and their fellow-believers in other lands an essential unity, which breaks through differences of sect and country, for it is not based on religious grounds alone. Carlyle somewhere says that all men of the English speaking race are subjects of King Shakespeare, and in the same way all Mussulmans are subjects of the Arabian Nights. They share the glorious heritage not only of the Koran (which they are taught in early childhood to read in the original Arabic) but of the history and philosophy of Arabia, the incomparable poetry of Persia, and the romances and legends of Egypt and Morocco and Spain. Drinking from these imperishable springs, Moslems, whether Turks, Persians, Arabs or Indians, and whether or not they have also come to the Western wells of knowledge, are bound together by a certain unity of thought, of sentiment and of expression. The feeling of brotherhood thus engendered is not dammed up within the confines of devout faith. On the contrary, agnostics and atheists of Moslem origin have felt the Turkish and Persian misfortunes just as much as the most orthodox muftah. To ask why the Indian Mussulmen, blest with a beneficent rule, should concern himself so much about international issues affecting his co-religionists, is as futile as asking why men on the rack of torture cry out with physical pain. That the excitement has not been connected with the question of the Caliphate is shown by the fact that Shias have been moved by these emotions no less strongly than Sunnis. All sections of the Moslem world are moved by a deep sentiment, originally called into being by the Prophet's summons of all the faithful into one great brotherhood, and welded through the centuries into a lasting bond by a common faith, a common literature, a common outlook and a common history.

BRITISH POLICY.

Indian Moslems strongly hold that in the reconstructive wars before the Constantinople Government the moral support of Great Britain is called for in her own interests. The break-up of Turkey and the partition of her Asiatic provinces must be disadvantageous to Great Britain in any conceivable scheme of distribution. France would lay claim to Syria, Germany to Anatolia with Northern and Central Mesopotamia and Russia to Kurdistan and Armenia. Great Britain would be left to take Arabia and Southern Mesopotamia, and would thus become possessed of another wild country without possibilities of great development and with a long and exposed frontier. Side by side with this cumbersome and barren increase of territorial responsibility, the British Empire would be brought into closer contact with the great continental Powers whose immense armies would be less dependant on the sea for their communications. The route to India, already removed from exclusively British keeping would then be further exposed to attack by several other Powers. For these reasons a strong and stable Turkish Government in Asia ought to be a cardinal principle of British international policy. To Mohamedans it is reassuring to know that the above considerations are fully recognised by the just and wise statesman who now rules India. Lord Hardinge won the grateful thanks of the community by the steady encouragement he gave to their practical sympathy with the Turkish troops and people by placing himself at the head of the Red Crescent Movement, which was so splendidly responded to by all classes of Moslems.

THE DOMESTIC SITUATION.

But with the Turkish re-occupation and retention of Adrianople the tension has been relaxed and the Indian Moslems are once more turning their thoughts to internal affairs. The critics have been perturbed by the appearance on the scene of a new type of Moslem, who, apart from Islamic religion and sentiment, has gone through exactly the same education and training as young Hindus of the same social class. This type did not formerly exist, for in the old days the Hindu and the Mussalman of the same social class were brought up on an entirely different educational basis. The young Mussulman had to make it his chief concern to be well cultured in Persian and Arabic. There were thus few points of contact between Mohamedan and Hindu; and in the stage of political development India had reached much less ground for and possibility of unity of effort than now. Take any typical young Mohamedan of the upper middle classes to-day, and it will be found that, apart from the traditional religion of his family inculcated by his mother, his education has been entirely on the lines of a Hindu of the same class. Even in the case of a student from a Moslem institution like the Aligarh College, the course of studies, the training of the teachers and their outlook, and the probable profession of the student in the future, are the same as in a Government or a Hindu college.

These considerations are even more applicable to the increasing throng of Moslems coming to England and joining Hindu fellow-countrymen at the Universities, the Inns of Court, and the Technical Schools. This potent change, which has attracted much less attention than it has deserved, is not much if any older than the still youthful twentieth century, and it has only begun to make itself felt effectively in actual political life within the last two or three years. The men brought up under the new system are coming to the front and have influenced the increasing approximation of political views and sentiments among educated men of the different communities. The unity is a measure of the growth of Indian nationhood, and it is the part of wise statesmanship, British and Indian, in the domain of internal affairs, to seek, not so much to satisfy the Mussulmans as Mussulmans or the Hindus as Hindus, as to win the hearty co-operation of all moderate, loyal, and reasonable opinion wherever it exists. It is the only policy that will succeed, in Lord Morley's phrase, in 'rallying the Moderates' and thus forming the most effective instrument in the discomfiture and impotence of the small but active element in Indian life which, as Lord Sydenham has said, must be reckoned as permanently hostile to British rule. While at the one extreme there is a handful of revolutionaries, at the other there is a worthy, substantial but decreasing class of men of the old school who think it right to accept whatever the Government, or even the officials, may decree without exercising any critical faculty thereon. But between these two there is a vast mass of Indian opinion passing through a transition stage, alert, sometimes fault-finding, perhaps suspicious, perhaps not very clearly knowing what it wants, and greatly perplexed and disheartened by such questions as the treatment of Indians in South Africa, greatly anxious and worried about the future of Indians in East Africa and in the island of Zanzibar. With all his weaknesses, this type of man, if rightly handled, is essentially reasonable at bottom, loyal to the King, and fully aware that India's welfare and happiness depend on the continuance of British rule.

The Moslem community may co-operate with the Hindus on a vast number of public questions, but they have their own special needs and outlook not confined to the international issues to which I have referred. Both the educational and political condition of the Hindus is far in advance in time, and also in relative extent, of that of the Mohamedans; and it is not to be forgotten that the difference of religion between them goes to the roots of their social polity.

THE LEAGUE.

It has been the work of the All-India Moslem League to give the Mussulmans a political platform and to prevent their disappearance as a national entity on account of the indifference to political issues which formerly characterised them. The League came into existence only some seven or eight years ago, and so far from its work being done, it has reached a stage of evolution in which, if wise counsels prevail, it can do greater service than in the past. The crisis in the affairs of the London League, brought to a head by Mr. Amcer Ali's resignation, confirms my conviction that the time has fully come for the Indian Mussulmans to realise that the future of the community depends not upon this or that particular leader but upon the people themselves. If there is any danger that excitable younger men may lead the League to an attitude of suspicious impatience, it is for the calmer and more reasonable section to bestir itself and to keep the organisation in its own hands, and meet the opposite party, not with abuse but with argument. The situation is one in which talents hitherto undiscovered may be drawn out for the good of the community in the country as a whole. I am confident that the great mass of educated Moslem opinion is sound and sober, and I believe that in India open discussion on the platform of the League, freed from the restraint of a permanent presidentship, will be the best means of bringing the weight of this opinion to bear on the questions of the day. But the situation of the London League is different, for there the community consists exclusively of two classes—elderly men of weight and standing on the one side, and inexperienced students on the other. It is obviously impossible for the latter to instruct and influence English opinion on Moslem affairs without guidance from the former. Hence while I am most anxious to see a reconstruction of the London League, I feel it is essential that this should be based upon co-operation with the residents, and I, for one, could never join or support an institution run by students only.

THE OUTLOOK.

Another matter upon which strong feeling prevails is that there should be fuller scope in local affairs for loyal but at the same time free criticism. The widening of the powers and the functions of the Legislative Council has done much to give point and force to public sentiment on the larger issues, and this is necessarily reflected in the comments of a Press which, with all its great imperfections, is advancing in ability and is beginning to be really responsive to public needs. The days when not merely the considered will but even the capricious whim of the collector of a district was received without question and obeyed without hesitation have gone by, and in the sphere of every day administration, no less than in the more conspicuous arena of the Legislatures, Supreme and Provincial, it is necessary for those in authority to give due weight to the general consensus of opinion. The district officer should at least know the direction in which public opinion tends, whether or not he can act upon it with due regard to the wider issues of which he has to take account. Through the varying stages of Indian evolution British rule has shown that power of adaptation which is essential to organic vigour. This has been strikingly exemplified in the marked success with which the Morley-Minto reforms have been woven into the administrative fabric. I look to the future with hope and confidence, because I am convinced that British statesmanship will continue to respond to the growth of national consciousness in India, and will thus bring an awakened people into still closer sympathy and co-operation with the aims and ideals of the enlightened rule that has revolutionised the conditions and the ideals of Indian life within living memory.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's Return.

Press Association Interview.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., returned from India at the weekend, and was promptly interviewed by the representative of the Press Association, with regard to the impressions left by this, his third visit.

SOUTH AFRICA THE CHIEF CONCERN.

"I think the chief concern in India at present," said Mr. MacDonald, "is what is going on in South Africa, and the effect the treatment of Indians in South Africa is having on the public opinion in India. This question is uniting all classes, all creeds, and all sections of the community, and they are all very resentful of what appears of them to be the indifference of the Home Government. Indians who know the problems of Imperial Government as well as Mr. Gokhale will admit that the Home Government can do nothing but advise the South African Government in a friendly non-official way. Their claim seems a very reasonable one. They say that India is in the Empire, and it claims for its people Imperial citizen rights, and that if they are treated unjustly, as they undoubtedly are in South Africa, they consider that their custodian is the Imperial authority, and not the local authority. When they find that the Imperial authority has apparently no power to protect them, they ask: 'What is the use of Imperial citizenship?' The Indians say, however, 'We are subjects of the Empire, and when we are treated as slaves in one part of it, the Imperial authority ought to step in and protect us'.

"Over and over again I tried to explain to Indians the weakness of the constitutional position of the Home Government, but I could make no impression on their minds. I attended various meetings—as a mere spectator—called for the purpose of collecting money and passing resolutions about the South African situation, and I have rarely been so impressed by the earnestness and determination of masses of men. Mohammedans vied with Hindus in their speeches and offers of help, and I should not be at all surprised if in time to come this will mark a very decided departure in Indian politics."

THE "YOUNG MOSLEM."

"This question (he continued) is aiding the coming together of the Mohammedan and the Hindu. The young Mohammedan is now following the lines of the Indian National Congress, and if there should be any rupture between the old Mohammedan school, headed by Ameer Ali, and the young Mohammedan movement, headed by Mohammed Ali, there is no doubt whatever that the young Mohammedan movement would come out on top. With this union of the Mohammedans and the Hindus is growing up a more definite demand for what is practically self-government in India."

THE Viceroy's MADRAS SPEECH.

"It was very interesting to notice, for instance, with what tremendous enthusiasm Lord Hardinge's Madras speech about the treatment of Indians in South Africa was received in Indian society. Anglo-Indians took the view that Lord Hardinge had exceeded his functions as a Viceroy in talking directly to the Government of a self-governing Dominion, and technically, perhaps, they were right. But there is not the least doubt that next morning every literate Indian who read newspapers regarded him as a hero. They regarded it as a very promising departure, and they will continue to ask that that should become a recognised function and the right of the Governor of India. Of course, at present such negotiations are conducted through the India Office, which makes representation to the Colonial Office, and in the course of this filtration of representation the Indian view is very often lost."

"Did you hear any expressions of opinion in India on the reply of Lord Crewe to the Deputation at the India Office with regard to the treatment of Indians in South Africa?" Mr. Ramsay MacDonald was asked.

"Well," he replied, "as you have asked me, I will tell you. I heard a great many expressions of opinions, and on the whole they thought the reply was rather weak."

THE CHANGE IN THE POLITICAL MIND.

"What has chiefly struck you as the greatest changes in India of recent years?"

"I think the changes in the political mind of India during the past four years have been very great," Mr. MacDonald replied. "The establishment of the Morley Councils, with their Provincial and Imperial character, has opened a new avenue for Indian political thought and activity. These councils have put the Indian National Congress into the shade a little, but it has brought the Indian politician into closer contact with political reality. Taking the situation generally, Indian opinion is differentiating itself more and more from the Anglo-Indian opinion and is demanding more representation, more administrative powers, and more authority in its own Government." Questioned with regard to improvement in Indian opinion since his last visit, Mr. MacDonald expressed the view that there was no change for the better. "I think, if anything, it is drifting away from us. The extremists are an insignificant faction, who may do mischief because at any given moment they can avoid the police. But they are of no practical consequence. The section that is going away from us, and becoming less and less sympathetic, is the quiet, educated, professional and business section. The old officials who treated the Indians with liberal sentiments are not so prominent as they were. I was discussing this matter with a well-known non-official Indian, and he made the interesting remark that the effect of the Imperialistic wave that passed over the Empire a few years ago was to change the spirit of the public service of India for the worse. He complained of its assumption of superiority and aloofness."

THE QUESTION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE.

"The question we shall have to face," continued Mr. MacDonald, "with far more care than ever we have done, is how we are going to make our Civil Service one of statesmen and not merely one of office administration. I think that we have got men there who will compare with almost anybody we have got at home, but I doubt if the Service, as a whole, has as yet become aware of the new political conditions under which it has got to work."

THE LABOUR PROBLEM.

"What is the position of the Labour movement out there?" Mr. MacDonald was next asked.

"There is the beginning of a definite Labour movement out there, and factories are increasing very much. I went round the factory districts with two sets of people. One set were men who would correspond with the trade union officials here, and I also went round the following morning with the chairman of the Bombay Improvements Trust, looking at the houses and the general living conditions of the people. The great complaint is that the Factory Law is not properly administered, and that the housing conditions are exceedingly bad. Wages are going up; in fact, I was told by an English manager of a mill—a man who belonged to the Labour Party at home—that they had to pay more for labour per loom in Bombay than they did in Lancashire. There is a great scarcity of labour, and wages will continue to rise."

Interview with the "Daily Chronicle" Representative.

Mr. J. R. MacDonald, M.P., has just returned from India, where he has been taking part, as a member, in the work of the Royal Commission which is inquiring into the public services of the Indian Empire. Yesterday Mr. MacDonald talked over his experiences with a representative of "The Daily Chronicle."

He has had to leave India before his colleagues on account of the approach of the Parliamentary Session. It is hoped that the report of the Commission will be issued before the end of the year.

Mr. MacDonald spent most of his time in Delhi and Calcutta. Asked about the new capital he said:—"I saw the foundations, and I discussed the matter with many officials and non-officials. I am bound to say that the general feeling is getting less and less favourable on several grounds."

"First, the expense of building is going to be much greater than the original estimates showed. That is going to mean a very appreciable burden upon Indian finance, and a slackening of expenditure on matters like education.

"Secondly, the feeling is growing that the Government of India, being centred in Delhi and Simla, will be isolated from the real living movements which are going on in Indian politics and administration. That change will not be good for the country.

"It will undoubtedly change the relations between the central and the provincial Governments. There will be a struggle between the two as to which is to be supreme in local administration. The result of that struggle can only be conjectured; I think it will produce a great deal of friction, which will result in no good.

"The third reason is that the buildings, especially the houses, are to be on a scale which present salaries will not be able to keep up."

How did you find opinion in Calcutta upon the question of the removal of the capital?

THE NEW DELHI.

"Calcutta opinion is still rather bitter, but the consequences which the people of Calcutta anticipated have not come about. The objections to the change are much more serious than those founded on the idea that the old capital will be injured. It is just as flourishing without the Indian Government as it was with it. A small bit of house property previously required for the Government buildings has decreased in value, but that is all. On the whole, I should not be surprised if we hear a good deal about the new Delhi from these points of view when the House of Commons meets."

Did you find any improvement in native opinion since your last visit?

"I am sorry to say I did not. I think if anything, it is drifting away from us. The extremists are an insignificant faction, who may do mischief because at any given moment they can avoid the police. But they are of no practical consequence.

"The section that is going away from us, and becoming less and less sympathetic, is the quiet, educated, professional and business section. The old officials who treated the Indians with liberal sentiments are not so prominent as they were.

"I was discussing this matter with a well-known non-official Indian, and he made the interesting remark that the effect of the Imperialistic wave that passed over the Empire a few years ago was to change the spirit of the public service of India for the worse. He complained of its assumption of superiority and aloofness.

"Now, the young Mohamedan movement is going on exactly in the same way as the Indian Nationalist movement. The administration of the Press laws is meeting with violent opposition on the part of the Mohamedans who have recently been victimised by it, and that, and other things, have made the beginning of a Mohamedan-Hindu entente.

"I would not like to say how far that entente will go, because there are a good many obstacles in its way. But this I will commit myself to: If there should be a rupture between the old school of Mohamedans, headed by Amir Ali, and the Young Mohamedans, headed by Mohamed Ali, the latter would win. All the tendencies are in favour of the latter, and that means political difficulties.

NATIVE EARNESTNESS.

"Another thing has contributed to the difficulties which we shall have to face, and that is the treatment of the Indians in South Africa. Indians who know the problems of Imperial Government as well as Mr. Gokhale will admit that the Home Government can do nothing but advise the South African Government in a friendly non-official way. The Indians say, however, 'We are subjects of the Empire, and when we are treated as slaves in one part of it, the Imperial Authority ought to step in and protect us.'

"Over and over again I tried to explain to Indians the weakness of the constitutional position of the Home Government, but I could make no impression on their minds. I attended various meetings—as a mere spectator—called for the purpose of collecting money and passing resolutions about the South African situation, and I have rarely been so impressed by the earnestness and determination of masses of men.

"Mohammedan vied with Hindu in their speeches and offers of help, and I should not be at all surprised if, in time to come, this will mark a very decided departure in Indian politics.

"Its general effect is to make Indians feel that they have not a part in the Empire, and that they receive no protection from it. When Lord Hardinge made his speech about the South African Government in Madras, he did a thing which, perhaps, he had no constitutional right to do; but there is not the least doubt that next morning every literate Indian who read newspapers regarded him as a hero.

"And upon these lines Indian political opinion will go. It will want more and more to have an independent voice on Imperial arrangements so far as they affect India. And that will raise difficulties with every self-governing Dominion under the British flag."—Daily Chronicle.

The Eighth Delhi:

City of Ruins and of Tombs.

Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, M.P., writes in the Daily Citizen:

Delhi is a vast churchyard, sixty square miles in extent, with a little corner still inhabited by a swarm of huddled human beings. For what reason, Providence only knows, the Government decided to build new palaces and new offices, and bring itself bag and baggage to this city of ruins and of tombs. We wanted to shake the dust of Bengal from our feet and shut the unpleasant voice of the Bengali from our ears, and so we determined to regild the thrones of the Moghuls and sit down upon them.

When a great thing is done many people say they suggested it; no one, so far as I have been able to gather, is bold enough or proud enough to avow parentage for this project. Like the little imps who beset one in Aden and Port Said, craving backsheesh, the new Delhi has "no fadder, no mudder."

There have been seven Delhis already. You find them in ruins on the plain between the right bank of the Jumna and ridges of high ground running more or less parallel with it, but some miles off. They are beautiful in their wreck and they are watched over by the domed tombs of those who sat in their judgment halls. Away on the southern horizon rises the tower of the Kutub Minar, which has stood through earthquake and conquest for seven centuries; bounding the view to the North is the present Delhi, dominated by the minarets and domes of the great Mosque and the Ridge with its Mutiny memories. Between is a brown land of silence, desertion, and death. In the midst of it the eighth Delhi is to be built.

To-day it is alive with busy labourers. Mounds are being levelled, rocky heights are being cut down, ruins are being removed. Columns of dust fill the air, the shrill chatter of voices is everywhere, hammers and mattocks add to the confusion of the noise. They say that in a week or two at least 20,000 people will be at work.

BUILDING A CITY TO ORDER

For in India labour is cheap and machinery is dear. There are no gigantic arms of mechanical diggers about, few snorting engines, nothing of Western engineering. They are working as they worked for Akbar, or Shah Jehan. Swarm of men and women, with swarms of little children squealing and playing in the dust are filling little baskets with sand and in long procession are carrying it away on their heads and returning for more. A great medley of labourers is making blast holes in the rocks, another medley is filling trucks with boulders. All is chaos of movement, of noise, of colour, but the rough places are being made smooth and the high places brought low, and they go home at night in long lines of bullock wagons singing catches of song in high-pitched shrill voices.

It is a prodigiously queer thing this escapade of building a city to order. It is to cost an enormous sum of money—at least £6,000,000; its success is not at all certain; it has had to be preceded by a great temporary city of lath and plaster which has wasted Indian resources like a famine. Every step the builders take has to be considered lest their foot falls upon a tomb. A platform under a tree built by some one who desired to think and pray under a grateful shade becomes sacred in these days when holy places have to be purchased so that roads may be made and foundations dug; a new industry has sprung up in the bazar for the making of tablets informing the surveyors that this and that is the resting place of this Khan and that Shah. Nobody but a skilful and patient diplomatist could have emerged from the maze of holiness, false and real, which lay on the land.

Among the shrines to be preserved is that of the ninth Guru of the Sikhs, Teg Bahadur, who previous to his martyrdom at the hands of Aurangzeb foretold the coming of the European "from beyond the seas to tear down thy purdas and destroy thine Empire." His ashes lie in a shady garden, and will be encompassed by the great public park which is to adjoin the new Government House, where the Lord Sahib of the conquerors is to sit in State. This at any rate, is appropriate. Humayun and the other Moghuls look from a distance stately and apart, their tombs wearing an aspect of lofty aloofness; Guru Teg Bahadur nestles nearer at hand, under the shadow of the new order the coming of which he foretold.

OLD WIVES' TALES.

There are some strange superstitions about Delhi. When old wives' tales are listened to one hears that whoever are to be the builders of the eighth city are to be luckless in their rule. And this is the eighth one. There is certainly a haunting doom of decay about the place. It still runs to tombs and the wilderness. The foundation stone of the New Delhi which the King laid is miles away from where the city is now to be built. It stands like an Asoka pillar brooding on the whimsicality of fate.

One evening, I walked out to where the Durbar was held. The roads that had been made at so much expense were but scars among the jungle grass, the raised terraces were cracked and bitten by the pouring rains, the jungle had crept softly up like one stealthily returning to a home from which he had been temporarily turned out. On the broad raised mound where the King was crowned and where the mighty ones of India gathered in blazing splendour to do obeisance to him a bushy shrub grew. As I approached I saw standing on the flat where the thrones were, outlined against the crimson evening sky, head in the air and antlers thrown back, the form of a black buck. It bounded across and down and fled away into the darkness.

Aligarh "Old Boys" and Moslem Troubles.

[We regret we could not find space in our columns for the admirable speech of Mr. Jafar Kalami, an "Old Boy" of Aligarh who responded to the toast of the Old Boys Association at Calcutta proposed by Sir Theodore Morison at the Association's Annual Dinner, held at the Great Eastern Hotel, at which the late Principal of Aligarh was the principal guest. We now give some important extracts from Mr. Kalami's speech.]

Or late the younger generation of Islam has begun to show signs of awakening and I feel proud to say that the Old Boys have also taken their proper place in this great renaissance. Now, gentlemen, let us see what that renaissance means and also diagnose its causes. The present renaissance is nothing new or revolutionary but on the other hand it is in full conformity with the teachings of Mohamed and the word of God. This new renaissance, which has been in certain quarters called disloyalty, ingratitude and what not, is really the outcome of the events of the last two or three years—events which even a reckless prophet could never have prophesied before they had actually come to occur. The unholy Italian raid on Tripoli, the consequent massacres of poor Arabs, their children and women, the Balkan conflagration, and the vicissitudes of Persia and Morocco, in short the troubles that descended on the poor Moslems all over the world were not the only pains and sufferings of Islam. But to crown all, the light and unhappy manner in which some of the British Ministers treated our sufferings was most exasperating and humiliating. England rules over more Mussulmans than any other Power, more than even the Custodians of our Holy Place the Kaaba. Gentlemen, how could you possibly tolerate the idea that the first minister out of all European ministers to threaten Turkey with dire consequences if she did not abandon Adrianople after its recapture should be the Prime Minister of England? The brilliant march and recapture of Adrianople by the Turkish army under the illustrious Enver Bey created new hopes in the bosoms of Mussulmans all over the world, and it was then that Mr. Asquith stepped forth on the political platform of Europe and demanded the surrender of Adrianople to the Bulgarians for no fault of theirs. Besides these foreign affairs, matters in India clearly detrimental to the Moslem interests sprang up, but thanks to the wisdom, statesmanship and sagacity of our illustrious Viceroy, much mischief was averted. These events opened the eyes of the Mussulmans in India and made them realise the necessity of unity, self-help and self-respect. The products of Aligarh are also Mussulmans and hence these vicissitudes that I have mentioned before affected them likewise. Having imbibed their sentiments at an institution which teaches unity, self-respect, and self-reliance above other things, they felt the calamities more than others and they consequently preached the Gospel of unity, self-help, and self-respect amongst themselves. They fearlessly, frankly, and honestly warned their Government against injuring their feelings and interests from the press and the platform, and this kind of constitutional agitation was painted as disloyalty by a certain section of the Anglo-Indian press in this country and the British press in England. Aligarh men were not only called disloyal and ungrateful but a charge of entertaining anarchical sentiments was laid at their door. Nothing could be more ridiculous and I take this opportunity to repudiate this charge with all the vehemence and earnestness I can possibly command. Gentlemen, I have so far tried, I hope not in vain, to show that the present renaissance is nothing but a natural stage in the course of evolution. English people should pride themselves that their efforts in ameliorating the condition of the Mussulmans, whose destinies Providence has placed in their hands, have at last been crowned with success. Gentlemen, Mr. Asquith addressing the Benchers and the Members of Lincoln's Inn at a dinner given in his honour in 1908 said that no lawyer could ever be a revolutionist; similarly, gentlemen, I declare to-night that no Aligarh man could ever be disloyal or an anarchist, for it would be against the very training he has been given at his Alma Mater. The essence of loyalty is inculcated in the very soul of every Aligarh Boy ever since he enters the great institution. Moreover, the teachings of Islam are against the very idea of being disloyal to the sovereign who has been termed as millat. To repeat once more, I would say that the present awakening is the result of evolution and not revolution, and also of the Western education that has been given to us. Gentlemen, let me assure you that the younger generation of Musmans in India in general and Aligarh "Old Boys" in particular are loyal to the core. Their devotion to the person of the King and the laws of the realm is unshakable and unimpeachable. This is the message of the "Old Boys" I can convey to you all present in this hall and, to the world outside this hall I convey the same message through you, gentlemen of the press. Our political creed is and always will be unselfish loyalty to our sovereign, love for our country and a frank and straightforward criticism of the actions of the Government whenever it does wrong. Whether the Government would like it or not, it is incumbent upon us all as the loyal citizens of this great empire to warn the Government against the pitfalls and the risks rather than keep silent and as cowards throw bombs. To put the whole thing in a nutshell, the "Old Boys" are true and will ever be true to the traditions of their Alma Mater and the great trust left to them by their late lamented leader Sir Syed. They would cling to it as fast as possible till they perish. It is my earnest desire that those whom this message reaches will cease maligning us in future with ridiculous insinuations of disloyalty, ingratitude etc. But if they still desire to persist I would simply repeat for them what the Almighty said about the unbelievers:

ختم الله على قلوبهم وعلى سمعهم وعلى ابصارهم غشاوة

(God hath placed a seal over their hearts and over their ears and over their eyes is a veil.)

Now, turning to our Association, I have very little to say, for our Association is still in its infancy. Its organizers and supporters have chalked out for themselves and for the generations that would succeed them a programme which can be favourably compared with the programmes of other great institutions which aim at doing good to their country. We hope in the near future to play our proper part, however humble it may be, in the regeneration of our mother-land and our community.

Armenian Reform.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

At the present time a great many people in this country (and elsewhere) are very freely expressing ideas upon what they call the Question of Reforms for Armenia. The majority of them, it may be incidentally remarked, have never been in the part of Turkey which they refer to as Armenia, and as far as one can judge very few of them have ever been in Turkey at all. Probably it is this fact that makes the problem seem to them so simple of solution. For their writings would lead anyone to suppose that the Turkish Government has only to issue an order for the "reforms" to be brought about at once, for the country to assume another aspect, for everyone to become contented, for all crimes to cease, and for the Kurds, Armenians, Turks, Circassians, Lazes, Greeks and many other people who live in the eastern vilayets to become forthwith a kind of "happy family." This, however, is far removed from the reality.

There is no doubt whatever that an improvement in the administration of the part of the Turkish Empire referred to is essential for its very existence; and the Turkish Ministers would certainly be well advised to do all they can to have these improvements carried out without delay. But is there any good reason to suppose that the Turkish Ministers are not quite as well aware of the real facts of the case as their self-appointed mentors? Certainly the Minister of the Interior is quite sincere in his wish to bring about the improvement desired, and no doubt the majority of the members of the C. U. P. support him. But there are several aspects of the question.

The Armenians demand a government under European control, and the Powers, it appears, would like them to have their way. But on the other hand, the Turks do not feel able to fall in with such an arrangement, and the Powers are unwilling to force reforms on them by means of an armed display. The Turkish Government ask for foreign officials to be lent to them to carry out reforms, but the Powers will not allow these officials to accept the positions offered to them by the Porte, and so a deadlock takes place.

The people who suffer on account of the impasse thus brought about are the various races who inhabit the eastern vilayets; for during the negotiations and discussions little or nothing is, or can be done to better their lot. To the practical man with a knowledge of local conditions it seems strange that the Turkish Government cannot be granted the services of European advisers in the Eastern vilayets for a stated period; and then, if it should be found that no progress was being made another plan could be tried. But if suitable men were selected to act as administrators, advisers, or inspectors in these vilayets, and if they were not hampered by having their powers too clearly defined, there is no doubt that they would be able to effect a very great improvement in the country.

Legal inspectors would be able to see that cases were tried without unnecessary delay, and the administration would be able the Turkish officials to give common-sense decisions on the thousand and one questions that crop up every day at a Government centre. As things are at present, a Turkish official in a country town, who is living in daily intercourse with the various local notabilities, when he is called upon to decide some point affecting various interests and religions is naturally inclined to take the part of his co-religionists. If, however, there were on the spot a European to advise or assist him the Turkish official would, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, be only too glad to give a practical and just decision; for should it be subjected to adverse criticism the responsibility for the act would fall upon the shoulders of the European official; while if it met with approval the Turkish official would get the credit.

The prime difficulty, of course, in such an enormous tract of country is to say where a beginning shall be made, and to assure that the funds available shall be used to the best advantage. Any scheme of reforms, to be effective, must provide for improving the condition of affairs from the foundation upwards, and by making small improvements first. It is useless, and worse than useless, to talk of making electric tramways when the riding tracks between important towns are dangerous to pass along for lack of care in improving them. A start should be made in each vilayet to improve the organisation in the village communes, i.e., the Nahies, and thereafter a certain amount of progress could be gradually made to permeate the administrative system.

On such lines as these it would be possible to achieve solid results that would bring lasting benefits to all the inhabitants of the vilayets concerned. What is wanted to carry them out is goodwill; goodwill on the part of the Powers quite as much as, if not more than, on the part of the Turks. At the present time Turkey wants trained "advisers" and disinterested helpers more than advice from well-meaning but too often incompetent faddists. One of her chief difficulties is that while she can get any quantity of the latter, she cannot, for one reason or another, apparently get enough of the former.

A great many sympathisers with the Armenians are constantly crying out for so-called "reforms," but beyond saying that they want "European control," "justice," and "progress," they make no practical suggestions that are capable of being carried out forthwith. As a person who had a right to speak with authority on the subject remarked recently: "When doctors are in consultation concerning a patient they try to employ a treatment suited to his case and his means, and also one that can be applied in the circumstances of the case. But in the discussions concerning reforms for the Eastern vilayets all these essentials are commonly lost sight of. In Turkey, laws, regulations, and directions are often not applied or attended to at all. New laws are not required; but ordinary laws should be applied with common sense. At present this is not done. But as the Turkish Government is anxious to improve the state of affairs, why, for the sake of the Armenians, cannot an attempt be made to do it?" Perhaps the Powers could provide an answer to this question.

The most hopeful feature of the perplexing problem is that, in commissioning Lieutenant-Colonel Hawker to organise the Gendarmerie force, on the lines already described in The Near East, the Turkish Government has actually taken an effective step in the right direction. There are now at Trebizond nearly 1,500 soldiers who are in process of conversion into efficient gendarmes. Schools have already been opened for officers and men, and a considerable sum has been paid for uniforms for the 15,000 men who will shortly be in the force for the seven vilayets. The Government, clearly, is doing its best for Colonel Hawker, and if it continues to do so we may confidently expect that as far as his share of solving the great question is concerned it will be a case of "something attempted, something done."—The Near East.

Confessions.

The Despatch of the Government of India.

The following Despatch of the Government of India has been published among other papers on the subject of confessions, presented to Parliament by His Majesty's Secretary of State for India:—

No. 2, dated Simla, the 24th July 1913.

From—The Government of India, Home Department.

To—His Majesty's Secretary of State for India.

We have the honour to communicate for Your Lordship's information the result of an examination which we have made in consultation with local Governments of certain important considerations relating to the recording of the confessions of persons accused of criminal offences.

2. The enquiry formed part of a general examination, which was initiated in 1911, of the provincial rules in force governing various matters connected with the investigation of offences by the police, the object of which was to apprise all local Governments of the action which had been taken in other provinces towards dealing with the same subjects, and to ensure the further scrutiny of the local regulations with a view to remedying possible defects in them and embodying provisions which had been found useful elsewhere. With our Home Department letter of the 12th July 1911, we accordingly circulated a précis of the orders in force on the subject of the procedure to be followed in the production before magistrates of accused persons who had intimated a wish to confess, and in the actual record by magistrates of the confessions of persons who were thus brought before them, and while inviting opinions regarding amendments which might suggest themselves, we particularly asked for answers to the following questions, namely:—

- (1) whether, on a balance of advantages and disadvantages, it facilitated the ends of justice to have confessions recorded at all before the trial commences, except in very special circumstances and by the orders of the District Magistrates;
- (2) whether, assuming that the practice of recording confessions before trial continued, it was practicable to introduce more stringent safeguards against abuse; and
- (3) whether the actual procedure of magistrates in recording confessions was susceptible of improvement.

We annex copies of the replies received (enclosures nos. 2 to 11), and in reviewing the matter we have had regard to various suggestions which have been mooted by questions in the House of Commons and in the course of discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council, indicating possible lines of reform. Briefly these may be said to comprise the prohibition of all record of confessions prior to trial, or a legal instruction to the effect that no conviction could be based upon a confession once made but subsequently retracted, unless the commission of the offence was materially corroborated by direct evidence.

3. As Your Lordship is aware, the powers of magistrates to record statements or confessions made in the course of police investigations are defined in section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code which runs as follows:—

"164 (1) Every Magistrate not being a police-officer may record any statement or confession made to him in the course of an investigation under this Chapter or at any time afterwards before the commencement of the inquiry or trial.

"(2) Such statement shall be recorded in such of the manners hereinafter prescribed for recording evidence as is, in his opinion, best fitted for the circumstances of the case. Such confessions shall be recorded and signed in the manner provided in section 864, and such statements or confessions shall then be forwarded to the Magistrate by whom the case is to be inquired into or tried.

"(3) No Magistrate shall record any such confession unless upon questioning the person making it, he has reason to believe that it was made voluntarily; and when he records any confession, he shall make a memorandum at the foot of such record to the following effect:—

"I believe that this confession was voluntarily made. It was taken in my presence and hearing, and was read over to the person making it and admitted by him to be correct, and it contains a full and true account of the statement made by him.

(Signed) A. B.,

Magistrate.

"Explanation.—It is not necessary that the Magistrate receiving and recording a confession or statement should be a Magistrate having jurisdiction in the case."

The major issue raised in the discussion of this matter involves the cancellation of these provisions; the minor issues cover the possibility of adopting further precautions with the object of securing that confessions are only recorded if voluntarily made. Underlying this consideration of the whole question is the desire to prevent any miscarriage of justice, arising from the record of confessions which are not willingly volunteered, or which are taken down in circumstances in which it cannot be guaranteed that they contain a full statement of what the accused person really wishes to say; and with that desire it is needless to state that we are in complete sympathy. The dangers to be avoided are the misuse of their powers by the investigating police in order to induce persons charged with offences to make false admissions of guilt, and the intervention of inexperienced magistrates who do not appreciate the necessity of ascertaining the circumstances in which a statement is made or of recording it carefully and in detail. We have no wish to deny these risks or to refrain from any measure calculated to minimize them, and we think that it may fairly be claimed that they have long been generally recognized, as is shown by the instructions already issued. There are, however, considerations which deserve to be carefully weighed before the simple expedient is accepted of abolishing the recording of all confessions made before trial, and in dealing with the question we think it essential that it should be approached, not from the standpoint of condemning the whole police force as unscrupulous, but rather with the desire to encourage among the police a spirit of pride in their work, to discourage attempts to substitute confessions for intelligent detective methods, and to emphasise the disgrace which attaches to resort to the ill-treatment of prisoners. We believe that this feeling is to be found among the new generation of police to a greater extent than is frequently credited, and our policy should proceed upon its recognition rather than upon an attitude of widespread distrust.

4. Reverting to the main consideration whether the recording of confessions prior to trial shall be allowed at all, the salient feature of the correspondence is the practical unanimity of judicial authority against any prohibition. With the exception of the Lower Burma Chief Court, three Judges of the Madras High Court and one Judge of the Bombay High Court (differing, in the two instances last mentioned, from the majority of their colleagues), the leading Courts in other provinces traverse the arguments advanced in our letter of the 12th July 1911, and urge that no such departure of practice is required. That these high judicial officers are unwilling to approve of any such prohibition is a valuable indication of the fact that these confessions are not regarded in the majority of cases as false or tainted; in fact, the instances in which the courts express a positive opinion that a bogus confession has been obtained by reason of the tutoring or ill-treatment of the prisoner by the police are, we believe, few. It happens, no doubt, that the courts may think it unsafe, in the absence of other evidence, to convict upon the basis of a retracted confession, but this is not necessarily synonymous with a finding that the confession was untrue or that it had been obtained by improper means. The local Governments are in general agreement in this matter with the courts. The Government of Madras regard the idea of prohibition as unnecessary and inopportune; that of Bombay is convinced that to forbid the recording of confessions before trial would be to put a serious hindrance in the way of administering justice, which might end in the necessity of altering the law so as to make police officers competent to testify to statements made to them by accused persons. The Government of Bengal and the late Government of Eastern Bengal and Assam concur in the view of the Calcutta High Court that a man alleged to be implicated in a crime should be permitted to make any statement he likes before a trustworthy and experienced magistrate. The Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces draws attention to various orders which are in force prescribing the proper use of confessions, and the Lieutenant-Governor of Burma regards a confession as evidence, for what it is worth, which should not be intentionally ignored; he holds that it would be disastrous to discard the evidence of confessions. The Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces considers that the abandonment of the magisterial record of confessions would in no way reduce either the temptation, or the opportunities to put pressure on accused persons, and if this, therefore, is the main object of change, it would not be achieved. The Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province would encourage the making of confessions, leaving it to the judiciary to assess them at their proper value and to bring to notice any allegations of their having been extorted by improper means.

5. In the face of this consensus of opinion we are not prepared to support the radical modification of procedure which has been suggested. Practically the upshot of the discussion is that much experience shows that confessions are frequently willingly made in circumstances which afford no ground for doubting their truth; their prompt record by a responsible magistrate at least ensures that there is no conflict as to what the accused actually did say, and as long as statements made to a police officer are inadmissible in evidence, this result can only be secured in this way; the degree of credence to be attached to such a statement is for the court to determine, but because abuses may occur there is no cause to refuse entirely to accept this source of information: the proper remedy is to minimise the chances of its being abused. The advocates of prohibition are ordinarily actuated by two expectations, firstly, that it will do away with one of the principal incentives that the police have for ill-treating accused persons, and secondly, that it will compel the police to rely upon evidence and the pursuit of clues, in place of the confession of the accused, as a means of securing the conviction of the guilty. Of these two arguments most weight attaches, probably, to the second, which usually influences those executive and police officers who incline towards this policy, although it should be possible to achieve the end in view by other means. But the prohibition of confessions would do little in itself to diminish the risk of the ill-treatment of the accused, because the obtaining of a confession is not the sole, or even the principal motive which induces incompetent or dishonest police officers to resort to a mixture of coaxing, threatening, worry and ill-usage; their object is rather to induce the accused to give up stolen property or to indicate where some clue may be found, and the opportunities of putting pressure on him with this in view would still exist. If this is the case it seems to us to be unwise to ignore the proved fact that the novice in crime in this country is frequently unable to keep his guilty knowledge to himself, while even the more hardened criminal not infrequently insists upon unburdening his mind, and the prohibition of confessions would only deprive the courts of evidence which in many cases may be quite reliable and of value, without ensuring that a higher standard of police investigation will be attained in consequence. That confessions, after they are made, are frequently retracted is not surprising; once the accused finds himself awaiting trial there are his fellow-prisoners and, in some instances, possibly even the prison-warders, to advise him to withdraw his statement and adopt a line of defence, which they sometimes suggest. It is easy to represent that retraction can do no harm, while it may turn the scale in his favour, and after the first moment of excitement in which the confession was made these considerations may well prevail; but that fact does not inevitably indicate that the first confession was false, and, for what it is worth, we are strongly of opinion that the court should be able to consider it.

6. Our conclusion in this respect need not, however, prevent the adoption of any measures calculated to discourage the police from placing reliance on confessions and thus neglecting to pursue definite clues, to diminish the risk of the ill-treatment of accused persons, or to give surer guarantees that confessions made under section 164 are really voluntary and are carefully recorded, and we proceed to discuss seriatim the various suggestions which the correspondence has revealed. Some of these were put forward in our letter of the 12th July 1911, others have been advanced by local Governments.

(a) Proposal that the police should be forbidden to question a prisoner once he has been arrested.

The Madras Government recommend the issue of instructions to make it clear that when the police are endeavouring to discover the author of a crime there is no objection to their making enquiries of, or putting questions to, any person from whom they think they can obtain useful information, but that when once an accused person has been arrested, while they may, and indeed should, listen to any statements which he may voluntarily make, they should be strictly forbidden to interrogate him or press him to make a statement. The primary duty of the police after arrest is to take an accused person before a magistrate within the time prescribed in section 61 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and it is only in very exceptional circumstances that he should thereafter be returned to police custody. We understand that the instructions actually issued in Madras further stipulate that if the police desire to question an accused after arrest, the permission of the magistrate must be obtained. We welcome these suggestions as most useful, and are prepared to direct their general adoption. It is true that no rules will prevent the police from questioning a man if they wish to do so and have the opportunity while he is in their custody, but if they do so, they will know that they are acting contrary to rule, and it is only by the steady pressure of instructions that they will be made to understand that attempts to obtain confessions are not only improper but a sign of want of intelligence or a lack of industry. It would be irrational to forbid the interrogation of a man while he is merely a suspect, but once he has been arrested (and he should not be arrested on insufficient evidence) he should not be pressed to incriminate himself. The object, in fact, is to limit the use of section 164 as far as possible to cases in which the accused is really anxious to unburden his mind before a magistrate. Making allowances for differences in the Indian system as to the evidential value of statements made to the police, the remarks of Lord Brampton on the point in an address to English constables [of which we annex an extract (enclosure no. 12)] seem to us clearly to summarise the appropriate principles to be followed.

(b) Proposal that a prisoner who has confessed should, in no circumstances, be returned to police custody.

This was mooted in our letter of the 12th July 1911, and the general views of those consulted is that an absolute prohibition of remands to police custody after confession is impracticable, since the prisoner may be required to identify persons or property, to assist at the discovery of property, or generally, to be present while his statement is being verified. It is moreover to be remembered that it is not the prisoner who has made a confession that stands in much danger of ill-treatment; it is true that he might be further tutored, but it is rather the man who has been sent up to make a statement and who, at the last moment, declines to do so, whom the police are likely to molest. While, however, a rigid restriction of remands is opposed, there is evidence that the cautious exercise of the power to remand may rightly be insisted upon, and 14th February.

after consideration of the various suggestions made we think the following principles should be insisted upon:—

(i) A remand to police custody should not be given unless the officer making the application is able to show good and satisfactory grounds for it; a general statement that the accused may be able to give further information should not be accepted.

(ii) No such order should be passed by an officer of lower status than a stipendiary magistrate exercising 2nd class powers.

(iii) Whenever possible, where the object of the remand is the verification of the prisoner's statement, he shall be remanded to the charge of a magistrate. (The Calcutta High Court would forbid the presence of the investigating police and direct the magistrate merely to confine his attention to verifying the facts alleged, while refraining from any attempt to obtain admission in corroboration of new facts, but in practice, we think it impossible to attempt an absolute direction to this effect. The presence of the investigating police may, in certain circumstances, be essential, while the magistrate may be trusted to exercise a proper discretion.)

(iv) The period of the remand should always be as short as possible.

(v) A prisoner who has been produced for the purpose of making a confession, and who has declined to do so, or has made a statement which, from the point of view of the prosecution is unsatisfactory, should in no circumstances be remanded to police custody.

(vi) So far as is practicable, confessing prisoners while in jail awaiting trial should be separated from others.

All these safeguards should materially diminish any risk of abuse of the power to remand to police custody, and at the same time they recognise the practical conditions in which investigations, etc., are conducted, which in some instances preclude the issue of absolutely rigid rules.

(c) Proposal that confessions should only be recorded by a magistrate having jurisdiction, a 1st class magistrate or a specially empowered 2nd class magistrate.

There is practical agreement among those consulted that the more experienced and responsible the magistrate who records a confession the better. While the risk that a junior magistrate is likely to be improperly influenced by the police is apt to be exaggerated, the presumption is that the more senior officers are more likely to observe carefully the prescribed procedure and to bring a more mature judgment to bear. Good reason has been shown for discarding the condition that the magistrate before whom the accused is brought must be the one who will commit or try the case, but we are willing to limit the recording of confessions to sub-divisional magistrates, stipendiary magistrate of the 1st class, or of the 2nd class if specially empowered. We have not overlooked the opinion of the Madras Government that an absolute restriction to 1st class magistrates, who may be on tour may be inconvenient, or the suggestion of the Government of Bombay that recourse might be had to a magistrate of lower status if a higher officer cannot be reached within a specified time, which is analogous to a rule already current in the United Provinces to the effect that "every confession which a prisoner in police custody wishes to make should be recorded by the highest magistrate, short of the district magistrate, who can be reached in a reasonable time." The Calcutta High Court would also recognise that a magistrate of lower status may be called in if no other is available, but on the whole, we think that such instances of practical inconvenience will be few, and we would be prepared to ignore them in view of the advantages of restricting the record of confessions to courts of status and experience.

(d) Proposal that no prisoner should be produced for record of his confession unless he has spent at least one night out of police custody.

The answers received indicate that while the principle underlying the suggestion is recognised to be sound, no definite rule to this effect is practicable. We think that all that can be done is to deprecate the immediate examination of an accused person, directly the police bring him into court, and to suggest the advisability (where possible) of giving him a few hours for reflection, in circumstances in which he cannot be influenced by the police, before his statement is recorded.

(e) Proposal that no accused person shall be produced before a magistrate to make a confession until he has been examined by the district superintendent or assistant superintendent of police.

A rule to this effect is current in the Meerut district of the United Provinces, but while it is desirable that the orders of such an officer should be taken at this stage (and equally before a remand to police custody is asked for), a definite instruction to this effect is likely to be inconvenient, as the higher police officers are frequently absent on tour. The procedure might be enjoined as desirable, when practicable.

(f) Proposal that when a confession is recorded the investigating police shall not be present.

This suggestion is offered by the Bengal Government, with whom the High Court agrees, and in the United Provinces there is an instruction to this effect, as also that the fact shall be noted on the record. The precaution seems reasonable, and we would support it for general adoption.

(g) Proposal that confession should ordinarily be recorded in open court and during court hours, unless for exceptional reasons.

This too is favoured by the Bengal Government, the idea being, presumably, that all shall be done openly and above board. There may be circumstance requiring a different procedure, but ordinarily that suggested should be feasible, and it possesses some advantages.

(h) Proposal that confessing prisoners should be questioned by the court whether they have complaints of ill-treatment to make.

Of the Local Governments who have noticed the point, those of the United Provinces and Eastern Bengal and Assam support the idea, but the Government of Bengal is opposed to the inviting of complaints, and the Allahabad High Court notes that the procedure would be of little benefit. The Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province considers that it is open to strong objection. It appears to us that the essential point is that the magistrate should satisfy himself that the confession is being voluntarily made, and we would prescribe no direct interrogation of the kind suggested. If an accused person has been coaxed or intimidated into making a false confession, he will certainly have been tutored to deny that he has had any pressure or force put upon him.

(i) Proposal that a magistrate should question the confessing prisoner with the view of ascertaining the exact circumstances in which his confession was made and the connection of the Police with it.

This is advanced by the Government of Madras, and it merges in a wider proposition which emanates from other quarters (noticeably from Burma and the Central Provinces) that it should be the endeavour of the Court to record the confession in as much detail as possible, with a view of affording material from which its genuineness can be judged and of testing whether it is freely made or is merely the outcome of suggestion. We are aware that anything like the cross-examination of the accused has been rightly deprecated by the courts, but it seems to us to be desirable that, without any attempt at heckling or endeavour to entrap the accused, a magistrate should record his statement with as much detail as possible. The more detailed a confession the greater the chances of correctly estimating its value. It is also useful to know precisely how it came to be made, to what extent the police had anything to do with the accused prior to it, and in the confession itself the fullest possible particulars of the incidents involved. The questions and answers would of course be recorded, and any misuse of the procedure would thus be detected. It would also be expedient that the magistrate should add to the certificate required by section 164, in his own hand, a statement of the grounds on which he believes that the confession is genuine, the precautions which he took to remove the accused from the influence of the police and the time (if any) given to him for reflection. In the United Provinces nine definite questions are prescribed calculated to ensure that the confession is being voluntarily made, but such detail is, on the whole, to be deprecated. But if a record of the general character indicated was made, the attention of the magistrate would be directed towards the possible risks against which he had to guard, and the full circumstances of the confession would be stated at the time.

7. These proposals cover the different safeguards which, after careful examination of the circumstances surrounding this difficult question, we are prepared to recommend, and if they meet with Your Lordship's approval, we will address Local Governments requesting them to amend their rules in conformity with them, after such consultation with the different High Courts, etc., as may be necessary. So far as possible we would prefer to proceed by the issue of instructions, but the necessity of amending the law can be further considered when the policy to be followed is finally approved. We will await Your Lordship's reply, however, before any action on these lines is taken.

8. As it appeared to be possible that Your Lordship might desire to make public the discussions on the important questions now raised we have obtained the concurrence of the Judicial authorities who have been consulted to that course.

We have the honour to be,

My LORD MARQUESS,

Your Lordship's obedient servants,

HARDINGE OF PENSHURST.
O'MOORE CREAGH.
HARCOURT BUTLER.
S. A. IMAM,
W. H. CLARK.
R. H. CRADDOCK.
W. S. MEYER.

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HEREKE, CONSTANTINOPLE.Turkish Fezes made in Turkey

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpaks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

Benarsi Mansions, Delhi.

11-5-14

Sole-Agents for India

for Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople

The Delhi Academy of Architecture.

BENARSI MANSIONS,
CHANDNI CHOWK.

For imparting up-to-date training in Architecture and Building Construction on Western lines.

Apply to:—
THE PRINCIPAL.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that must is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (13s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhas necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

TO LET.

THE

"JEUNE TURC"

An Ottoman Daily Journal.

Address:—CONSTANTINOPLE, PLACE DU TAXIM No. 8.

The Jeune Turc is the organ of the modern life of New Turkey.

The Jeune Turc gives the most exact and early information about the Political, Economical and Social life of the Ottoman Empire and of the Balkan States.

The Jeune Turc publishes Political, Literary and Economical articles on all questions connected with the Near East and teems with humorous literature palpitating with Political life.

Whoever wants to keep himself well informed about whatever passes in Turkey and the Balkan States ought to subscribe

FOR THE

"JEUNE TURC"

A paper, having the greatest circulation in the East.

Subscription for Foreign Countries:

For a year Rs. 24/- For 6 months Rs. 15/- & for 3 months Rs. 7/8/-

RULING BY MACHINE

LEDGERS AND CASH BOOKS SUPPLIED

BINDING UNDERTAKEN

DIE STAMPING NEATLY DONE

MONOGRAMS ENGRAVED

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED

TRIAL ORDER SOLICITED.

THE COMRADE PRESS, DELHI.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER RECEIVED FROM THE
BOMBAY MUNICIPALITY PUBLIC HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

ESANOFELE and MALARIA.

" Treatment with ESANOFELE controlled with quinine in most cases was recently given a fair trial. The majority of the cases belonged to the Parel Hindu Orphanage, where MALARIA OF A PARTICULARLY SEVERE TYPE raged this year. 43 cases of Malaria were treated of which FIVE WERE CHRONIC, with considerable enlargement of spleen and General Malaria Cachexia." Result :

REDUCTION IN THE SIZE OF THE SPLEEN	+	+
DISAPPEARANCE OF PARASITES	+	+
INCREASE IN THE HAEMOGLOBIN VALUE	+	+
GENERAL CONDITION OF PATIENTS VERY SATISFACTORY.

Writing on the result of chronic cases the report states :—" Quinine would not have worked equally well in these cases and one is especially emboldened to give this opinion from the case of a Sukharam Jivaji, who was a chronic sufferer and ALWAYS TOOK QUININE OR QUININE AND ARSENIC MIXTURES WITHOUT MUCH BENEFIT.

" On the whole, ESANOFELE appears to have VERY GOOD EFFECT ON CHRONIC CASES.

ESANOFELE is obtainable from all Chemists and Dealers throughout BRITISH INDIA, BURMA AND CEYLON.

General Agents:—

Messrs. B. G. GORIO & Co.,
3, Wallace Street, BOMBAY.

FOR INFANTS
"ESANOFELINA."
AFTER MALARIA.
FERRO CHINA WINE.

MANUFACTURERS:—

FELICE BISLERI & Co., MILAN, ITALY.

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper, Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

81-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

For Stationery write to—

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

The Manager,

"THE COMRADE" Press,

Kucha-i-Chelan,

DELHI.

DEAR SIR,

We duly received six schedule books sent to-day and are quite satisfied with the work. Will you kindly send us as soon as possible three copies of the issue schedule, proof of which was sent to you the other day.

We hope you will endeavour to complete the order at an early date.

Yours faithfully,

Per Pro. THOS COOK & SON,

(Sd.) C. LUES.

EVERY KIND OF

PRINTING DONE

IN THE "COMRADE"

PRESS, DELHI.

Don't shoot but ring.
The Standard Electric
Bell sets, mounted on polished stand, 30 yds.
wire and 6 months
battery ... Rs. 7-8
24 yds. 1 year Rs. 11-0
Garrison Bell Set Rs. 8-0

EAST-WEST CO.

Chandni Chowk,
DELHI.

Make Hosiery at Home

AND EARN MORE MONEY.

As much as Rs. 60
per mensem can be earned regularly by making hosiery for us.

No experience is necessary. Men, Women, Boys and Girls, all can make themselves earning units in their family. No lengthy tuition—No Premiums—No monthly Fees to pay—Just the small price of a DURBAR AUTO-KNITTER and you become a worker and wage earner at once.

ANOTHER MILLION WORKERS WANTED

We have at present millions of workers, all over the world, all busy—very busy, supplying us with socks, stockings, etc., but they are not sufficient. We cannot meet the great demand for hosiery made on our DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS—We want a MILLION MORE—We WANT YOU. Write for full particulars TO-DAY.

READ WHAT A WORKER SAYS:—

DEAR SIR,
I beg to inform you that I have sent you two paid parcels, one on the 14th instant and the other to-day, containing half a dozen pair of Gent's Socks each and request that you will be kind enough to return me the quantity of wool consumed in them and pay my usual wages at an early date.
Thanks very much for the nice little machine you sent me, and it runs so smoothly that I can be able to knit daily half-a-dozen pairs of Gent's Socks and when speeds comes a few more pairs can easily be knitted.
Wishing you every success.

Puri, 16th August 1913.

I am, Dear Sir,
Yours faithfully,
(Sd.) MRS. N. PEDDING.

Genz. Wheeler & Co., HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS, 11-2 Lindsay Street, CALCUTTA.
Department No. 36,

THIS COUPON ENTITLES YOU TO FULL DETAILS.
FILL IT IN, DETACH ALONG DOTTED LINES, AND SEND TO-DAY.

Date

GENTLEMEN,
I wish to take advantage of your offer. Please send me immediately full particulars, whereby I can earn Rs. 3 a day. Enclosed please find Anna Stamp to help to pay postages.

Name

Address

GENZ, WHEELER & CO., Dept. 36, 11-2, Lindsay St., Chowringhee Rd., CALCUTTA.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. ~~N~~ 7
No. 8.

Single Copy
Annas 4.

Delhi: Saturday, February 21, 1914.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page.		Page.
WEEK	119	'SEED CAPSULES OF THOUGHT'...	159
OUR LONDON LETTER	151	ENGLAND AND EGYPT	160
TETE A TETE—		The British Control of Egypt	161
Christianity v. Islam	152	THE IRRIGATION OF MESOPOT-
The Confessions	153	AMIA	161
The Delhi Municipality	153	THE OPENING OF THE BARRAGE	162
The Sale of Meat	154	MR BALFOUR ON THEISM
LEADING ARTICLE		The Plain Man's Picture of
The Press Act—VI	165	Philosophy	163
THE MOSLEM UNIVERSITY	167	Emotion and Belief	163
CRUSADE AGAINST ISLAM PLAN-		THE PARIS PRESS	165
NET	168	ADVERTISEMENTS	166—168

The Week.

Home Rule.

London, Feb. 11.

In the course of his speech Mr. Lloyd George said that the Government would go to the very extreme, compatible with the main purpose of the Bill, but they could not, and would not, betray the majority of the Irishmen. After the proposals had been passed in the Commons, they would go the Lords over whom they had no control. The responsibility for what would happen there would rest with the Opposition. If after doing everything possible to allay the legitimate fears of Ulster the Government quailed before the threats of violence, they would violate their trust. Mr Lloyd George said that for some time they had been firing at long range, but their opponents were now face to face with them. The Government would submit its proposals on its own responsibility which was the heaviest that had devolved on any Government, but the responsibility for acceptance or rejection, which lay with the Opposition, was equally heavy. In the House of Commons to-day, the debate was resumed by Sir John Simon. He laid stress on the declaration that an election now would mean tearing up of the Parliament Act for ever. This the Ministerialists were determined to resist.

Sir Edward Carson, who, on rising was received with salvos of cheers, considered that Mr. Asquith's speech was absolutely disappointing. He should have outlined the actual proposals. Sir Edward Carson laid emphasis on the unparalleled gravity of the statement in the King's speech. He said that the Bill was condemned on the Government's own confession. Something had undoubtedly been gained. Colonel Seely, he said, would now perhaps cease telling his constituents that he (Sir Edward Carson) was insane. He believed that the Government were manoeuvring (loud cheers). They were making the position of the Irish Unionists intolerable. They were asking them to sit quiet and vote estimates while the situation in Ulster was becoming daily more difficult. Ulster did not want concessions. She wanted to be left alone. He declared with emphasis: "You laughed at the Covenant. Laugh at it now." (Cheers).

Sir Edward Carson inferred from Mr. Asquith's speech that the exclusion of Ulster did not conflict with the fundamental principles of the Bill. If exclusion were proposed, it would be his duty to go immediately to Ulster and consult with the people. If they attempted to compel Ulster to come under the control of the Dublin Parliament, he, regardless of personal consequences, would go with the people to the end in the policy of resistance.

Mr. Redmond said that the Nationalists were ready to respond to the plea for amicable settlement. He considered that the Opposition and not the Government should have taken the initiative. He accepted however the new situation. Mr. Redmond indignantly repudiated the suggestion that the Nationalists only wanted Ulster's taxes. He deprecated the talk of civil war. He did not take a tragic view in that connection. He desired most sincerely that the new Parliament should not be handicapped by any conflict between fellow-countrymen.

Mr. Bonar Law said that he fully accepted the responsibility of countenancing resistance on the part of Ulster. If ever a people in the world's history were entitled to resist, Ulstermen were. It was certain that the country had given no mandate to coerce Ulster. The single fact that armed coercion would be necessary entirely altered the situation. Mr. Asquith, on the 10th instant by offering special treatment to Ulster, had admitted her special identity. It inevitably followed that if Ulstermen were not convinced of the acceptability of his proposals Ulster should be excluded from the scope of the Bill. It was in Mr. Asquith's power to prevent civil war by making proposals acceptable to Ulster or going to the people.

Mr. Walter Long's amendment to the Address was rejected to-night by 333 to 255.

Debate in the House of Lords.

London, Feb. 11.

In the House of Lords this evening, Lord Loreburn resumed debate. He described the King's reference to the gravity of the situation as a courageous and honourable departure. He considered that dissolution did not offer a solution, but merely postponed the question. The Bill was a good one, but settlement by consent was better. The real danger was not so much bloodshed and civil commotion as the prolongation of discontent and disloyalty in Ireland. He believed that Federalism would prove the solution of the difficulty. He made a strong appeal for conciliatoriness and good will to all.

Lord Lansdowne affirmed that everyone was in favour of a friendly arrangement, but the Government made no suggestions. He was bound to say that the prospect appeared as hopeless as it could possibly be. Even if Ulster were excluded, exclusion would have to be accompanied by safeguards in the interests of extra-Ulster Unionists. The proper course for the Government as democrats and straightforward men to pursue was to frame whatever amendments they thought necessary and then go to the country.

Lord Haldane admitted that this specific Bill had never been before the country, but said that its principles had been fully discussed and unless the Unionists gave some intimation that they were prepared to meet the Government in principle, settlement would be impossible.

Allahabad, Feb. 11.

The Times publishes a review by Mr. Horace Plunkett of the condition of Ireland. Mr. Plunkett is convinced that Ulstermen will fight if necessary, and die for what they regard as a holy, righteous cause, and he suggests that Ulster should accept Home Rule on condition of being given the right to secede after the term of trial. The Times does not think that this provides a solution.

London, Feb. 12.

In the House of Lords, Lord Crewe said that the Government did not believe that the fears of Ulster were justified, but he was prepared to try to meet them. He would not remain in the office a day if he believed that the interests of anybody in Ulster would be imperilled.

The striking feature of the debate was a brief statement by Lord Roberts who declared that it was unthinkable that the Army should be called on to fight against Ulsterites. Such action, he said, would mean the ruin of the Army.

Lord Middleton's amendment was adopted by 243 to 55.

Oriental School.

London, Feb. 12.

A meeting is to be held at Mansion House on May 6th, at which Lord Cromer, Lord Curzon and members of the Cabinet will speak to inaugurate a campaign for obtaining an endowment fund, grants, and subscriptions for the Oriental Language School.

That Government has promised £1,000 and the India Office £1,250 per annum, leaving £8,750 to be assured annually for the establishment of an efficient school.

Pending legislation on the lines of the recommendations of Lord Haldane's Royal Commission, the school will be established under a Royal Charter, the draft of which has been approved by the Privy Council.

It is hoped to begin work on the structural alteration of the London Institute in April and to finish it early in 1915. A non-official committee, with Sir Montagu Turner as Chairman, has been formed to further the project and collect subscriptions.

Resignation of Lord Gladstone.

London, Feb. 11.

In the House of Commons to-day Mr. Harcourt announced that Lord Gladstone would resign at the end of the present session of the Union Parliament. His resignation was due solely to domestic reasons and had no connection whatever with recent events. His successor would be designated in a day or two.

London Feb. 11.

It is officially stated that Mr. Buxton will succeed Lord Gladstone as Governor-General of South Africa. The appointments of Mr. Burns, Mr. Masterman, Mr. Hobhouse, and Mr. Samuel are confirmed.

Natal Indians.

London, Feb. 12.

At question time in the House of Commons to-day Mr. Harcourt explained to Mr. Wedgwood the circumstances necessitating the sending back of a number of Natal Indians to the mines to work instead of to prison. He said that the procedure appeared to be legal, but fortunately it was not the normal state of affairs.

Aegean Islands.

Constantinople, Feb. 15.

The decision of the Powers regarding the Aegean Islands has been communicated to the Porte and a written reply asked for. Turkish official circles are disappointed and grieved, and it is not improbable that Turkey will endeavour to negotiate directly with Greece for the exchange of the islands occupied by Italy for Chios and Mitylene.

Constantinople, Feb. 16.

In reply to the decision of the Powers regarding the Aegean Islands, the Porte point out that it had hoped that with regard to the island in the vicinity of the straits and those integrally belonging to Asia Minor the Powers would have solved the question of the Aegean in accordance with the best interests of the directly interested parties. The Porte recognises the duties of peace, but says it will endeavour to assure its legitimate demands.

New Albania.

Berlin, Feb. 15.

The Prince of Wied has returned here.

ITALIAN WARSHIPS AS ESCORT.

London, Feb. 15.

The Italian warship Quarto is expected at Venice to escort the Austrian warship Taurus conveying the Prince of Wied to Durazzo.

Turkish Railways.

Berlin Feb. 16.

The draft of the Franco-German Agreement regarding the Turkish railway financial question has been initialled. It takes the form of an arrangement between the Deutsche Bank, representing the Anatolian and Bagdad Railways, and the Ottoman Bank, representing the Syrian Railway Company and the Company to be formed for the Black Sea basin.

Turkey.

London, Feb. 11.

Renter learns respecting the repeated rumours of a Turco-Bulgarian combination against Greece, the Rumania and Servia would certainly intervene in favour of Greece, though they would remain quiescent if Turkey alone attacked Greece.

Turco-Persian Frontier.

Karachi Feb. 14.

The Sind Gazette's Mahomerah correspondent writes under date February 7th:—The Frontier Commissions returned on Thursday night from Sabah, having had a very trying time in heavy rain. They have now delimited all the frontier within easy reach of Mahomerah, and it is understood that an early move will be made to a fresh centre. The results of their deliberations have not been made public, but it is understood that so far the delimited frontier follows the boundary lines hitherto, to mutually recognized by Turkey and Persia.

Hindus in America.

Washington, Feb. 14.

Mr. Sudhindra Bose, Professor of Iowa University, was one of those who appeared before the Immigration Committee of the House of Representatives to give evidence. He opposed the exclusion of Hindus from the country on the ground that kindred Aryan people were entitled to the rights of British subjects. When the Chairman observed that British Colonies were excluding Hindus, Mr. Bose replied that the Imperial Government had not yet endorsed their exclusion.

Persian Budget.

Teheran, Feb. 11.

A proclamation will be published on Friday, the birthday of the Prophet, fixing the Coronation for July 21st. A commission consisting of two Belgians, is drafting the Budget in readiness for the meeting of the Majlis. Hitherto, Persia has had no regular Budget.

The following telegraphic communication has been received from the Foreign office at Teheran by Sir Mirza Eavood Khan, Miftaboe Sultaneh, Consul-General for Persia, at Calcutta:—

"On the 13th instant in the Durbur Salami in Teheran on the occasion of Id in honour of the anniversary of the Prophet, it will be declared by His Highness the Regent, that according to the 18 Article of the Constitution, the coronation of His Imperial Majesty the Shah will take place on the 27th Shaban corresponding with the 22nd July 1914."

Frontier Raids.

Kohat, Feb. 11.

Some few days ago the village of Jhandari in the Chutra Valley was raided and three houses were looted. In the first, a young bachelor, on the eve of concluding the bargain which was to provide him with a wife, was tied to his bed and robbed of Rs. 200. Luckily he had already sent away the two hundred rupees to Shukardarah in part payment. Let us hope the young woman's relatives will not be hard-hearted enough to make him wait for his bride till he has once again saved up enough money to pay the price in full!

In the next house, a widow was robbed of all her money and jewels. Raiders have rather a predilection for rich widows.

Whilst searching the third house, one of the household, who had managed to slip away, raised the alarm and the raiders made off before help arrived. It is very possible, however, that local bandushes were responsible for this dacoity. But raids and robberies have had a stiff set back owing to the vigorous measures the Amir has been obliged to take with the Khost outlaws. Shaurang and his gang, who it may be remembered raided Jatta Israil Khel rather more than a year ago, have been captured by the Governor of Khost and a Khattack of these parts and some Hindus have been released.

It is believed that of the three Hindus, who were carried off on the Kohat-Baunni road on the 11th of last month, two have been killed, their captors and the third hidden away somewhere in Trans-Border territory. Of the captives one was a Public Works Department road contractor, and it is probable that he is the one who is still alive.

South Africa.

Capetown, Feb. 13.

The Reverend C. Andrews lectured before a distinguished audience in the City Hall to-day on the subject of Rabindranath Tagore. The Mayor presided.

Mr. Merriman, moving a vote of thanks to the lecturer, emphasised the necessity for a better understanding of the Indians, particularly of Indian intellectual life.

Lord Gladstone, seconding the motion, said that he had listened with great pleasure to the lecture which was one to make them think and realise in a fuller degree what India was, what their duties were to a people who were members of the British Empire. Lord Gladstone said that the subject had interested him when at Oxford. He had made a special study of Indian history, and had later visited India. He wished more South Africans could go there, and by so doing rise to the highest appreciation of what the Indians were. They would then think less of India as a country which sends its coolies to the South African coast, and would realise that there was in the personality of Rabindranath Tagore an intense expression of an imaginative national life. In fact, India had developed perhaps far above the line attained by some parts of the British Empire in its civilisation, and the efforts to rise to a higher life. His Excellency joined with Mr. Merriman in thanking the Reverend C. Andrews. He believed his lecture would do much to induce a feeling which would help to a solution of the troubles which had stood in the way of good relations between India and South Africa. They were troubles which, they all hoped and expected, would be solved before long. He thanked the lecturer heartily for his efforts to bring about a better understanding.

Our London Letter.

THE LONDON INDIAN ASSOCIATION.

London, 30th. January, 1914.

This Association, which owes its creation and popularity mainly to the efforts of Mr. M. A. Jinnah, is gradually though steadily becoming an integral part in the life of the Indian Colony in London. It holds regular fortnightly meetings at Caxton Hall, Westminster, when subjects of varied interest are keenly discussed and debated upon. Apart from acting as a happy means for social intercourse between the Indians, the Association undoubtedly serves as an excellent training-ground for those who are aspiring to gain oratorical distinction and fame in future. The recent "parliamentary" debate, arising from the formal introduction of the "Hindu and Moslem Universities Bill," reached a fairly high degree of efficiency and several hitherto latent speakers were "discovered" during the subsequent discussion. The "House" followed the debate with intense and genuine interest. The Association is suffering from the want of permanent headquarters, but it is hoped this drawback will soon be set right.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL CLUB.

A very large and representative gathering responded to the invitation of the President and Committee of the above Club to a New Year Reception, which was held on Saturday, the 21st inst., at the Connaught Rooms in Great Queen Street, Kingsway, from 3 to 6 P. M. An extremely interesting musical programme had been arranged and the various amateur "artists," whose names appeared on the programme, exhibited an unusual standard of perfection, which could certainly do justice to any professional troupe. Mrs. Naidu, who has just recovered from a severe illness, was seen after a long period of absence, and her numerous friends and admirers were greeting her on her recovery. Her presence at any social function never fails to infuse an element of cheeriness into the very soul of her fellow-guests. Her temporary absence from Indian Society had left a gap, which was only filled by her welcome re-appearance amongst us last week.

THE "MORNING POST" ON HINDU-MOSLEM UNITY.

The question of Hindu-Moslem unity has been dealt with by the Morning Post in a leading article. The sinister motives of the writer will become evident even to a most casual observer. Instead of welcoming the new situation, which is decidedly favourable for a Hindu-Moslem entente in India, as would be the duty of a great journal, which has placed its Imperialism before everything else, this paper has spared no efforts to misrepresent the case to its readers to a degree almost reaching the stage of tragic criminality. A studious perusal of the article will readily indicate the high degree of utter and deplorable ignorance of the writer on Indian questions, which is also unhappily visible in various other newspapers in this country, which handle Indian problems from time to time.

The Morning Post article, however, will not be without its good effect, as, leaving aside the merits or demerits of such communications, the Indian cause will undoubtedly gain by the occasional presentments of its case before the British public, through the medium of the great organs of the Press; the thinking public will thus meet with the opportunity of reflecting for itself upon the importance and vitality of this truly Imperial issue. From this point of view, if for no other reason, those who are devoting their energy and time towards the solution of the numerous problems affecting India and the Indians, will no doubt welcome the article in the Morning Post which will, no doubt secure for the Hindu-Moslem entente an advertisement of no little magnitude.

Evidently the writer, who poses as more or less an authority on the Indian question, has thoroughly failed to grasp the simple yet significant fact that, in spite of the various sections and creeds in which the Indian population is divided, there are certain issues on which the 300 millions of India, whether Hindu or Moslem, are absolutely united, and on which they can speak with one voice. The writer of the article need not stretch back his memory to more than only a few weeks ago, when the Indian crisis in South Africa was at its height and when, much to his surprise and astonishment, the differences between the various communities in India, which he has taken much pains to describe in his communication, did not for a single moment prevent the masses of India, irrespective of caste or creed, from showing their feelings and indignation in no unmistakable manner. The wave of passion which overcame the Indians and which shook the very foundation of British Rule in India, as was so rightly stated by Lord Ampthill at the United Empire Club the other day, was the most impressive demonstration of Indian unity and Indian co-operation in matters affecting the Indian Empire as a whole. The writer apparently requires a sound knowledge of modern Indian history, as, in the article, he is exhibiting a supreme and colossal ignorance of facts. He seems to be absolutely out of touch with the present-day events in India. It will, perhaps, be a rude awakening for him to be told that to-day no important Bill, affecting the condition of the Indians as a whole, could come before the Supreme Council, on which the votes of the Indian Members, whether Hindus or Moslem, would not be practically unanimous.

The writer adopts a sad tone of flattery—or what he, no doubt, intends as flattery—when he describes the Moslem to be, in sentiment, probably "nearer to the Christian than to the Hindu." Bearing in mind the policy of grab, which the Christian Powers of Europe have been of late following in their dealings with the weaker non-Christian States, it is indeed questionable whether the above remark will not be received by the Moslem in the same spirit in which it was intended to be accepted.

The current number of Blackwood's Magazine also contains an unsigned article on India. Its writer, who is evidently a stout party-man, deplors the Indian chaos caused by the present Liberal Administration, enumerates the numerous blessings to the country under Lord Curzon's reign, describes the present Viceroy as "ready to yield to violence and let law-breakers go unpunished," expresses a sincere hope that Lord Kitchener may be India's next ruler, defends the Civil Service and suggests various remedies of an autocratic character. The article in question is so utterly inconsistent with the realities of the situation that it hardly deserves any serious attention.

HOW "NEWS" IS MADE IN TURKEY.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Daily Telegraph gives an excellent account of the methods adopted by the representatives of the European Press in the Turkish Capital for collecting "News," which are subsequently flashed across the wires as coming from some "reliable source." The able correspondent of the Telegraph is entitled to the deep debt of gratitude of all those who have the real interests of Turkey at heart for his timely exposure of this reckless fraud committed on the reading public at large. Incidentally, his information and his lucid statement of facts indicate the real and business-like method in which the Turkish authorities attend to their official duties and that, in spite of various sensational reports which are circulated so often in the European Press, concerning the Sublime Porte's intentions or schemes regarding current questions, the Turkish statesmen are extremely careful in observing official secrecy in matters of consequence.

According to the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph in Constantinople, not far from the Embassies at Pera is a place frequented at all hours of the day by newspaper correspondents, who are eager for sensational news. All the hatred and spite against the Young Turks is collected there; Levantines, Greeks and Armenians anxiously wait there for the return of certain Levantine reporters who have proceeded earlier in the day to Stamboul in search of information.

In the way of some of the foreign correspondents, these reporters spend the whole of the afternoon wandering about the long and dismal corridors of the Porte and the Ministries watching for functionaries, both great and small, and obtaining from them a few odds and ends of conversations, the sum-total of which constitutes a piece of news, which on their return to Pera they season according to the taste of the correspondents employing them. The latter, in their turn, embroider the news, and then go to obtain information of its accuracy at the Embassies, which have such a deficient news service that it may be regarded as non-existent.

The Embassies, except one or two, on receiving the information, hide their ignorance under the veil of diplomatic reserve, feigning to know more than they dare tell, and while repeating and propagating the news confidently, give it a quasi-official diplomatic stamp. The news is now ready to be spread throughout the world. Most of the sensational reports regarding Turkey have an origin of this kind and, therefore, it is necessary to receive them with the greatest circumspection.

LORD AMPHILL ON THE "INDIAN PROBLEM IN SOUTH AFRICA."

A debate on the above subject, which was held at the United Empire Club, Piccadilly, on the 28th instant under the chairmanship of Mr. Fitzjohn Oldham, produced a striking declaration by Lord Ampthill. His Lordship, who opened the debate in a powerful speech, said that this question was not one of a mere strike for the abolition of a £3 poll-tax in Natal. The real origin of the controversy was to be found in the year 1858, when the memorable proclamation of Queen Victoria to the people of India established for them the Charter of their rights and their liberties. The Indians of South Africa were not agitating for votes or for equal political rights with the white inhabitants of South Africa, but were only asking for that which had been actually promised to them, not only by the British Government but by successive Governments in South Africa. If British subjects were ill treated in a foreign country we should demand that their wrongs were righted and would enforce that demand with Dreadnoughts and troops, and we should certainly prevent one of our own partners from doing irreparable damage to the Imperial concern. It had been urged that the solution was to be found in deporting the Indians and helping them to colonise elsewhere, but the Indians in South Africa did not want to go, and they had every right to stay there. They had more right than some of the cosmopolitan riff-raff who received an undue welcome there. The colony of Natal would have been impossible without Indian labour in the fields and in the mines.

With regard to the present situation, after 12 years of persistent appeal, patient endurance of suffering, passive resistance, and heroic self-sacrifice and repeated disappointed hopes, an arrangement was made between the Union Government and Mr. Gandhi, the high-minded leader of the Indian community, and if the Union Government had faithfully carried out their part of the agreement, the trouble would have been at an end, but they did not do so. It was agreed (1) that legislation should be passed in the following Session repealing the obnoxious Act of 1907; (2) that there should be no racial bar in any future legislation; (3) that existing rights should be maintained; and (4) that there should be an amnesty for passive resisters. The promised legislation was not passed till last year, and then it did not fulfil the two essential conditions of the compact—removal of the racial bar and maintenance of existing rights. The Immigrants' Regulation Act, moreover, prejudiced the rights of Indians and brought about a new grievance in failing to recognise the validity of marriages among Hindus and Mohamedans. The poll-tax was always oppressive, and it was promised that it should be repealed. That tax was required simply as an instrument wherewith to drive back the coolies into indenture. He reminded them of the public spirit displayed by the Indians when they refrained from taking part in the strike which took place on the Rand some time ago. If there were much delay in the settlement of the question there might well be a dangerous agitation in India which would be fraught with the gravest peril. The South Africans were a virile race and had a virile way of managing affairs as we had seen during the past few days. What they wanted was straight talk from the Imperial Government. The people of this country had not the faintest idea what this question meant to them nor how completely it was within their right that it should be settled with justice, and immediately.

India, from every point of view, was worth more to us than South Africa, and if it were a choice between offending India and offending South Africa, there could be no shadow of doubt which alternative should be chosen; but there was no need to offend either if wiser and fairer counsels at last prevailed. The real enemies of the Indians in South Africa were not for the most part Englishmen or Boers, but the cosmopolitan class of aliens of whom we had some knowledge even in the heart of this great metropolis—people who repaid the protection and excessive hospitality they enjoyed under the British flag by bringing discredit upon the British name. It only required a little statesmanship to bring about a just settlement of this vital problem of Empire. (Cheers.)

Referring to the present industrial unrest in South Africa, as a result of which General Botha has deported ten Labour leaders, Mr. H.M. Hyndman, the Veteran Socialist, on being approached by a Press representative yesterday for an expression of his views on the situation, declared himself as follows:—"It serves the white people right that they should have some experience of the sort of treatment that has been served out to their fellow Indian subjects in another part of South Africa."

TETE À TETE

Signs of uneasiness and alarm are of late becoming increasingly manifest in the Christian missionary world regarding the rapid progress of Christianity v. Islam. Vigorous discussions have been started in the Press and on the platform and a number of conferences have been held at various places to bring home to the Christian conscience the rebuke implied in the comparative failure of the missionary propaganda in Africa and to concert more energetic measures for combating the forces of the rival creed. The recent conference at Kikuyu was a notable event, as it sought to band together the various Christian Missions in Africa into the common resolve to adopt a uniform policy and mobilize their forces in the face of "the common enemy." And this resolve was consecrated by a remarkable ritual in which clergymen of various persuasions received the Holy Communion from the Bishop of Mombasa. The furious storm, by the way, that the Kikuyu ceremony has aroused in the Church of England is not very edifying, and one may well be amused at the spectacle of Christianity riven into warring sects going forth to deliver Africa from the horrors of Islam and Heathenism. It would, however, be wrong to infer that genuine religious fire has ceased to burn in Christian lands, or that there are no honest souls aflame with missionary zeal who are ready to face any hardship in preaching the Gospel and striving to bring the heathens into the Christian fold. Enormous sums are raised every year by means of contributions from the pious Christians for carrying on the missionary campaign throughout the world. The various Christian Missions planted amidst people of other faiths have met with a degree of tolerance that was unknown in any previous period of history. And though their aims and methods have occasionally borne the taint of things of the very earth earthy, the non-Christian races have in the main shown little resentment at the open preaching of Christianity in their midst. As long as the ring has been kept fairly and missionary efforts have displayed no militant and aggressive zeal, the peoples of the East have never gone out of their way to thwart Christianity in its battling with rival creeds. But the Christian missionary has on occasions not despised other weapons when his straightforward spiritual appeals have failed. A new change would now seem to be coming over the spirit of the dream, mainly as a result of the failure of Christian preaching in Central Africa. The tone is becoming more aggressive, and the challenge of the Christian missionary rings with furious cries to-day. The breath of the missionary world is hot with irrepressible anger at Islam and the rapid advance it is making amongst the heathen tribes. As a sample of the worst passions of jealousy and religious hate we may take the following extract from an article by Dr. Norman Macleuan which appeared in the Manchester Guardian and which was reproduced by the Pioneer in its issue of 7th instant. The writer after referring to the evils which evoked the Kikuyu conference, goes on to say that the great peril in Africa is the peril of the conquering Islam. Every Mohamedan, he says, is a missionary. "There is no God but Allah, and Mahomet is his prophet" is the watchword which sounds wherever a Mohamedan is found. "It is far otherwise with the Christian trader and planter. Too often he says: 'I don't believe in Missions.' In heathendom the Christian too often is utterly indifferent to his faith." In face of such excellent reasons to account for the failure of Christian Missions one would have thought the writer's chief concern would be to preach Christianity amongst the so-called Christians before he undertook to convert the heathens of the world. But, no, he would rather have few good Christians than see Islam advancing in Africa. He is convinced that "in the great fight now being fought for the religious destinies of a continent the united power of Islam will rout the forces of Christianity and conquer Africa for Mahomet unless the Christian Missions organise themselves into an army united by a common policy." He thus states the real issue before him: "It is not the triumph of this church of that church which is at stake in Africa; it is the fate of Christianity which lieth in the balance. Islam conquered Christianity in Asia, in North Africa—is it now to conquer in Central Africa? Is the whole of Africa to fall under the sway of a religion whose God is an Oriental tyrant without love or fatherhood, which degrades womanhood, and which fanaticises the people which fall under its sway? It was in face of that problem that the Missions in British East Africa sought so to organise themselves that they might do something to save Africa from the withering blight of Islam." The lines that we have italicised afford a glimpse into the spirit of the faith that moves this canting Christian. We would not presume to vindicate the God of Islam, nor need we explain the position that it assigns to women and the message it has delivered to mankind. It is not our business to track down every pharisee masquerading as the messenger of light, or put down religious firebrands. What we would like to point out is that writings of such inflammatory character should be reproduced by papers like the Pioneer in India without being called to book under the Press Act. We need hardly say what effect such vulgar attacks on Islam may in all likelihood have on the Mussalmans. When we remember the fate that has been meted out to purely religious journals like Al-Hadis of Amritsar and the Badr of Qadian, because they had written something of Christianity with the sole object of refuting the false charges brought against Islam, we can not but be astonished to see the latitude that certain class of newspapers in this country are permitted to enjoy. We cannot think of any reasonable ground in view of which the Pioneer's latest effort to bring into hatred and contempt an important section of His Majesty's subjects in India should not be dealt with as it deserves.

We published last week a despatch of the Government of India to the Secretary of State embodying the result of an examination which had been made in consultation with local Governments "of certain important considerations relating to the recording of the confessions of persons accused of criminal charges." The proposals that the Government of India have submitted to Lord Crewe are expressly designed with a view to provide more safeguards in the recording of confessions. They do not recommend any radical modification of the existing procedure by doing away with the recording of confessions altogether, and this decision is based on the consensus of opinion formed of the views of the local Governments and the majority of the Judges of the High Courts and the Chief Courts. The advocates of prohibition, as the Government of India say, are ordinarily actuated by two expectations, firstly, that it will do away with one of the principle incentives that the police have for ill-treating accused persons, and secondly, that it will compel the police to rely upon evidence and the pursuit of clues in place of the confession of the accused, as a means of securing the conviction of the guilty. The Government of India attach small weight to the second argument, for, in their opinion, "the obtaining of a confession is not the sole, or even the principle, motive which induces incompetent or dishonest police officers to resort to a mixture of coaxing, threatening, worry and ill-usage: their object is rather to induce the accused to give up stolen property or to indicate where some clue may be found, and the opportunities of putting pressure on him with this in view would still exist." Even if this were correct the prohibition would still materially diminish the chances of ill-treatment where no stolen property is to be traced. But the Government of India fail to grasp that the prohibition would act as a deterrent to ill-treatment of every kind, the police would realise the danger of relying on old methods and police investigations would gradually come to be conducted on intelligent detective lines. The only plea that can be urged in favour of retaining the existing procedure is that confessions are sometimes true, and in some cases they afford valuable clues even if they are retracted later on. Now the novice in crime who, through remorse or any other impulse, wishes to unburden his mind would do so to the police of his own accord, while the hardened criminal would hasten to make a statement mainly to escape torture and possibly to send the police off the scent. In either case there is no likelihood that the ends of justice would be defeated if the existing practice were abolished. As Mr. Justice Beaman of the Bombay High Court says in his strikingly able and candid minute, "every Sessions Judge of any experience who knows the native, would upon vigorous self-examination, I think, admit that the average mofussil criminal would never confess if left entirely to himself. In fact he confesses literally in shoals. The Sessions Judge of experience who knows the mofussil police as well as he knows the native, knows very well why." He goes on to say that with the exception of violent crimes when the murderer is half mad or actually proud of what he has done, all other retracted confessions have been directly or indirectly induced by improper means. Where actual torture is not used, the widespread belief that it ordinarily is used upon obstinate suspects and the knowledge that it will be used, may induce a number of criminals who would not otherwise confess to do so in anticipation of the methods they dread being employed upon them. This is the utmost that can be said by way of concession to those who believe that all confessions made by prisoners while in police custody and uniformly retracted at the Sessions trial are voluntary. Where the confessions are genuine they are superfluous. They ought to be superfluous in all cases. The safeguards now suggested by the Government of India will not materially affect the existing situation. They are, however, a move in the right direction and may ultimately disappear with the abolition of the practice now in vogue. The real thing is the training of the police in more intelligent methods of work. This can be achieved only by shutting them off from the easy way of getting convictions. A police investigation should be the collection of evidence and not the extraction of confessions.

The Confessions.

SINCE the transfer of the seat of Indian Government the affairs of the Delhi Municipality have been growing in importance. The old, settled parochial outlook is being enlarged by an accession of new responsibilities, and new schemes are being broached or formulated which have a large bearing on the welfare of the citizens and will decidedly affect the pocket of the taxpayer. There is little indication as yet whether the people realize adequately the change that is coming over the methods of the Municipal administration and the fast-quickening pace at which it has got to move. They have yet to learn to take active and intelligent interest in civic matters, and till that time the city father may serenely continue to be what he usually is—an undisputed ornament to himself. Honestly speaking, it is difficult to blame an average elected member of the Municipal Committee for doing what he does, or rather—to be more correct—for being occasionally ignorant of, and often indifferent to, what is generally done in his name. He is the creature of an unwholesome tradition. As long as votes are given as a mere matter of personal compliment and the candidate values the possession of a seat in terms of his prospective dignity, things would remain pretty much where they are. Educative influences are already at work and the average voter may before long begin to perceive the real significance of his vote as something quite different from what he regards it at present—an opportunity to discharge a social obligation or lay by a favour. Men having genuine enthusiasm and capacity for municipal work should come to the front and give the people intelligent lead. The people's conceptions of civic duty may at present be vague, but they have enough common-sense and would never fail to respond to the call of all earnest workers. The affairs of the Delhi Municipality are, as we have said, assuming greater importance every day. Questions involving drastic changes and new taxation are bound to arise in increasing number. It is essential that men of proved ability who would truly represent the views of the people should guide the deliberations of the Committee at this juncture. All new sanitary measures and improvement schemes mean new and enhanced expenditure, and only such men can be expected to exercise efficient supervision and safeguard the general interests of the public who, if not experts in municipal finance, are at any rate intelligent and industrious enough to form correct judgment. These remarks have a special bearing in view of the existing financial position of the Municipal Committee. According to the report of the President for the year 1912-13 the receipts from various sources of income were 10.57 lakhs, while the normal expenditure on the payment of establishment and up-keep of Municipal properties was 11 lakhs. The Chief Commissioner in reviewing the Municipal Report observes that "it is clear that in order to carry on ordinary Municipal administration and repay loans, without any special expenditure on improvements or large works, a normal deficit of about three-quarters of a lakh has to be faced." In view of this he requested the Deputy Commissioner that immediate orders would be passed to close down all work which could be deferred without actual loss of money and to avoid giving out fresh contracts. He further urged close scrutiny of the accounts with a view of reducing expenditure to a minimum. But in the opinion of the Chief Commissioner the imposition of fresh taxation to meet the deficit had become inevitable, and he proposed an increase in the House Tax. On last Tuesday the question came up for consideration before the Municipal Committee with the remarks that a deficit of about half-a-lakh shall have to be made up even after a careful revision of the Budget estimate and the effecting of all possible economies. Whatever the ultimate decision may be we must say that resort to fresh taxation will be viewed with widespread alarm by the public. The cost of living has risen very high within the last two years, and the people are experiencing considerable difficulties in trying to meet the new situation. The addition of a fresh tax will prove another burden, and it should not be imposed until all other means to make up the deficit have been exhausted. We are curious to know if it is not possible to effect economy in the existing expenditure. The Health Department has grown enormously within the last year or so and we would like to be convinced if it has not over-grown its needs. There are other departments which require a careful scrutiny. The expenditure on establishment and the upkeep of Municipal properties is very high and efforts should be made to see if there is no waste going on anywhere. Several Municipal Commissioners, referred in the last meeting to excessive generosity in paying for things purchased or work done for the Municipality and there was more than one hint of corruption on the part of the Municipal establishment. These are matters which should be looked into, for corruption is a not infrequent accompaniment of local self-government in all countries. The rapid growth of expenditure in the past two years has been mainly due to the change in the status of the city from the divisional headquarters to the Capital of India, and it would not be unreasonable if the Municipal income is supplemented by necessary grants from Imperial revenues.

The Delhi Municipality.

ANOTHER important matter that came up for decision before the Municipal Committee related to the final sanction of the Bye-laws for the licensing of premises for the sale of meat and the carriage of meat within the municipal limits of Delhi. These Bye-laws had been framed and approved by the Committee at its special meeting held on the 2nd December, 1913 and were subsequently published for general information. They require in the first place that no person shall expose or keep for sale meat in any premises until such premises have been licensed according to the prescribed form. The conditions attaching to the license are that (1) the licensee will keep the premises structurally fit for the sale of meat, that (2) he will keep the premises in a clean and sanitary condition to the satisfaction of the Committee, that (3) he will comply promptly with all notices issued by the Committee in respect to sanitation, that (4) a copy of this license is always posted up in the licensed premises and that (5) the license may be withdrawn by the Committee if any of the foregoing conditions are broken or for any other reason given in writing. Now, these conditions are very drastic and wholly unnecessary in some respects, even from the point of view of sanitation. Structural fitness for the sale of meat is defined to include "the existence of stone floors, walls well plastered and white washed, suitable drains and at least one ventilator." We do not see why stone floors are insisted upon when it is obvious that meat is never placed on floors and zinc covered boards would meet all requirements. Drains within the shop are altogether unnecessary, for meat is brought in for sale only after it has been properly cleaned and washed elsewhere. Then, again, only ignorance of the conditions in which the actual selling takes place must be responsible for the suggestion regarding "a ventilator." Meat is not sold in dark, insanitary cells away from the public gaze. It is kept exposed in as open a situation as the shop can permit, i.e., near its very door. The ventilation of the place is as good as can be desired, and a "ventilator" beyond satisfying the pedantry of a sanitary enthusiast would be of little practical utility. All that this insistence on stone floors and drains and a ventilator is likely to achieve is to enhance the rents of butchers' shops if, indeed, any landlord is found willing enough to carry out "improvements" according to the new-fangled sanitary notions. In fact it was these difficulties which had led the butchers to infer that the conditions had been made deliberately stringent to force them to go to Municipal markets. We are glad the President of the Municipality in his note on the objections received from 310 butchers and the general Moslem public of Delhi makes it abundantly clear that "this allegation is untrue—entirely untrue." The President goes on to say that "the markets have been built in order to provide sanitary premises which meat-sellers can occupy if they cannot make sanitary premises for themselves. If they can obtain private premises which are sanitary—and these rules show what are the requisites for sanitary premises—there is no reason to ask the meat-sellers to take up stalls in the market." This is a clear statement and will serve a useful purpose if any trouble arises on this score in the future. But with all this assurance it is plain that the new Bye-laws would make the butchers' lot in private premises much more difficult, and the consequences of it all will be borne by the meat-eating public. It is further laid down that no license shall be granted unless a fee of Rs. 2 has been paid. This fee is justified on the ground that the inspection of premises and the issue of licenses will entail expenses to the Committee. If we understand aright, the fee is to be levied once for all and is not an annual or a monthly imposition. It would not bring in a large income to the Committee, while it will most certainly furnish a plausible excuse to the butchers to enhance the price of meat, voting on this question in the Committee was instructive as indeed on several other questions relating to the Bye-laws. It was decided by 8 votes to 7 that the fee should be levied. All the Mussalman Members with the doubtful exception of Maulvi Abdul Ahad voted against and all the Hindu Members with the notable and welcome exception of R. B. Sultan Singh voted for the motion. Maulvi Abdul Ahad insisted that the fee should be levied, though he generously conceded that it might be reduced to Re. 1. We can not but be amused at this fatuity. The Bye-law that aroused much discussion relates to the hawking of meat. As originally approved it provided that "meat may be hawked for sale after 2 p.m. by the occupiers of licensed premises or stalls in a Municipal meat market and their authorised servants. Such hawking shall be confined to Mohallas in the occupation of Mohomedans; the Municipal Committee may by resolution forbid such hawking in specified streets or areas." Objection was naturally raised that there should be no time limit to the hawking of meat, and cogent reasons were advanced. It was urged that several Mussalman parlanashin ladies who could not afford to keep servants and invalids got their daily meat supply at their doors in this way, and R. B. Sultan Singh said that he had actually seen this being done on several occasions. We would like to ask the great framers of this restriction on the hawking of meat what purpose it is intended to serve. Is it sanitation? If so, why is it less sanitary to hawk meat before 2 P. M. when it is fresh than after 2 P. M. when it may be getting bad? Is it a regard for Hindu susceptibilities? If so, when "hawking shall be confined to Mohallas in the occupation of Mohomedans"—a needless condition if it is not ambiguous (for there are Mohallas in occupation of both communities) and "the Municipal Committee may by resolution forbid such hawking in specified streets or areas," what have Hindu susceptibilities got to do with the matter? The votes on this motion were equally divided, all the Hindus with the exception of R. B. Sultan Singh being on the one side i.e., for the motion and all the Mussalmans against it. The President did not give the casting vote and the matter was left for subsequent decision after an inquiry about independent hawkers (i.e., those who had no shops but sold meat only by hawking) had been made. But we must ask here, why is it necessary for "independent hawkers" to exist before the city fathers permit hawking before 2 P. M.? Why should not a shop-keeper have his meat hawked before that hour if for some reason he cannot attend to its sale at his shop or would prefer it for some other reason to be hawked as well as sold at his shop? We are, however, glad to note that M. Bashir-ud-Din Sahab vigorously urged his objections and insisted on an adequate recognition of the butcher's difficulties and the convenience of the public, and we are surprised to see that Lala Wazir Singh Sahib, considered by some to be an independent Municipal Commissioner, was as vigorous in opposition. We will not surely be asked to believe that he has developed all of a sudden a consuming passion for "sanitary" reform, for he has seldom been known to feel the sting of much graver evils nearer home. The hawkers of puri-lachuri and other stuffs not frequently fit for human consumption may be allowed to ply their trade without let or hindrance. But a meat-hawker must be "controlled" to satisfy Lala Wazir Singh's sense of Municipal duty. After such exhibition of party feeling and petty prejudice it would be hopeless to aspire for Hindu-Moslem co-operation even in small local matters, were it not that there are men in both the communities like Lala Sultan Singh Sahab, whose honest and straightforward conduct holds promise of better things. The Bye-law No. 7 is still more stringent as it insists on carrying meat through public streets and places in clean receptacles and covered by a clean cloth in such a manner that the meat shall not be visible to passers-by. These conditions are almost impossible to carry out, and may expose the hawkers to infinite trouble and persecution at the hands of unscrupulous Municipal functionaries and policemen. We have every desire to support Municipal activity whenever it is directed to secure reasonable sanitary conditions for the sale of meat. But the conditions imposed by the new Bye-laws are in several cases harsh and impracticable, and we trust the Commissioners would not finally pass them in their present form. We appeal to the President who has already secured the good will of the citizens and the butchers by stopping a blundering locum tenens from needlessly worrying them both.

The Sale of Meat.

Self Consolation.

What though thy hand no wond'rous work hath wrought
Of Art or power, to glorify thy name?
What though the far-resounding voice of Fame
Breathe not the music of thine uttered thought?
If still, within, thine earnest soul hath fought
Gainst Self, and learnt its ministers to tame;
If, still regardless of Man's praise or blame,
The Good, the True, the Beauteous thou hast sought,
Be thou content : each thought, though unconsign'd
To word or act, God's piercing eye doth see Far down the deep recesses of the Mind ;
So thy true worth, though unexposed, will be Still in thy Maker's eye, ordained to find
A deathless record in Eternity !

NIZAMAT JANG.

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

VI.

In our last article in this series we had pointed out that according to the Calcutta High Court the statement of the grounds of Government's opinion is a mandatory condition of a valid declaration of forfeiture under section 12 of the Act; that "the repetition of an opinion cannot be its grounds"; that "the specific relation of the elements that the law requires to be present in order for legal consequences to follow" is merely such a "repetition of an opinion"; that the statement of grounds is "an essential part of the Legislature's scheme, for it might help the High Court to perform the duties cast upon it under section 17"; and the absence of such a statement would "sensibly add to the High Court's difficulties in discharging the peculiar duties cast on it by the Act"; that "it is intended that the Court should be in as good a position as the Government to judge the merits of any proscribed thing"; that "the less particulars are alleged the more difficult it is to say that a publication does not come under section 4"; that as the Act stands "it may be the case that a statement of facts too meagre to give an applicant under section 17 any real assistance would be sufficient to satisfy the requirement of section 12"; and that those appearing for Government in a Press Act case are not averse to arguing that "nothing need be set out at all" in the declaration of forfeiture by way of a statement of grounds.

To these scathing criticisms of the three senior-most Judges of the premier High Court in India—a "competent judicial authority", on the showing of the Executive itself—how did the Executive reply? All effort was concentrated on showing that Mr. S. P. Sinha had given no pledge with reference to a forfeiture under section 12, but had provided in the Act itself in all other cases the so-called safeguard of stating or describing the words, pictures, etc. That as we have shown, is a very minor point indeed. One can construe Mr. Sinha's speech in 1908 rigidly or otherwise, according to his inclinations and requirements. It is even possible to exclude the keeper of a printing-press from the supposed benefits of the "safeguard" on the ground that Mr. Sinha spoke only of a man who had written and not of one who had printed anything objectionable. The fact is that, on the face of it, it is quite as unjust to punish the owner of an offending publication "without allowing the man to know what he is being punished for" as to punish the publisher or printer of an offending publication in this manner. We readily recognize that section 12 is in many cases likely to be applied only to such publications as have been published abroad or secretly in this country, and when Government cannot reach or does not know the printer or publisher thereof. We also recognise that Government would be giving a free circulation to matter which it considers to be of undesirable character if it reproduced it in a Notification in the official Gazette. But surely it is not beyond the pale of practicability to amend the law in such a way as to inform the owner of a "book, newspaper, or other document" by private notice in writing, what words, pictures, etc. have induced Government to declare its forfeiture. For instance, when the District Magistrate of Delhi issued a warrant for the seizure of all copies of the Macedonia Pamphlet and of the Comrade and Howard in which it was reproduced or translated, could he not have informed us why our property was being confiscated? It would have saved us considerable embarrassment in our defence if we had known which words or pictures were, in the opinion of the Government, likely to produce undesirable results. As it was, we had to rack our brains to discover wherein we had offended, for we never learnt what classes of His Majesty's subjects in British India were likely to be brought into hatred or contempt before the Advocate-General, on being called upon in Court, explained that they were—Greeks! On being asked by the Court whether there were any Greek subjects of His Majesty in British India, he hastily modified the answer and said that the classes likely to be brought into hatred or contempt were Christians and Englishmen. "Still," as Sir Lawrence Jenkins writes in his judgment, "the answer in the original form is not without its significance though it was afterwards modified." One need not be plainer than this, and we desire to remove the "significance" of all modified answers by requiring Government to notify what classes are likely to be affected and of the two diverse sentiments apprehended whether it is hatred or contempt. All this can appear in the public Notification without doing the slightest harm, and the person whose property is to be confiscated should be privately informed in writing on what words, pictures etc., specifically Government has based its order of confiscation. This, as we have repeatedly stated, Government does not do at present even in orders of forfeiture under sections 4, 6, 9 and 11. But this is essential in all cases, and not a word has yet been said by any official which may even remotely suggest that this is impracticable or for any reason undesirable.

But the statement of grounds which is a mandatory condition at present of forfeitures under section 12 only should be made a mandatory condition of all forfeitures under the Act, and it is not an approximation of section 12 to sections 4, 6, 9 and 11 that is necessary, but, on the contrary an approximation of those sections to section 12. This we hope the Hon. Mr. Surendramath Bannerjee will note, and the Press Act Amendment Bill which he is now drafting should embody this important reform of the existing law.

Here we may add that although in the majority of cases section 12 is likely to be applied to a few copies of publications sent gratis to a person by some unknown publisher either abroad or in India which would be of trivial value, there is nothing to prevent its application to thousands of copies of a book published abroad and worth a good deal of money which a bookseller in India may import in all good faith in the ordinary course of his business. There are a number of well known books to which the Press Act can be far more reasonably applied than to our innocuous Macedonia Pamphlet, and a bookseller is not likely to order them from abroad so long as this Sword of Damocles hangs over his head, no matter how great the demand. In fact the extent of the demand would in itself be an indication of the risk involved in the enterprise. Can Government rightly contemplate such a state of affairs with complacency? All this is, of course, due to the uncertainty of the law on account of the "all comprehensive" nature of section 4 (1).

In this connection, however, we would quote a very just observation of the Hon. Mr. Pundit. In the course of his speech in support of Mr. Bannerjee's resolution, although he was a keen critic of some observations of the Hon. Moyer, he said:

Every right of property deserves to be respected. Whether it is only a few copies of books worth a hundred rupees or so or whether it is the security for Rs. 5,000 or Rs. 10,000 or the press itself of considerable value, every person who owns property is entitled to have the grounds definitely stated to him because the provisions of this Act partake of the nature of a penal enactment. In the simplest criminal cases the accused is entitled to be informed as to what the charge is against him, and similarly in a case like this I venture to think that justice requires that the person against whom an order of forfeiture is passed ought to be informed as to what it is that is taken exception to.

It should be quite possible and quite easy for if (a Local Government) to give those extracts upon which the opinion is based which renders the publication liable to forfeiture.

As regards the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in our case in connection with the statement of grounds, namely that it is a mandatory condition of a valid declaration of forfeiture, we are glad to note that neither the Hon. the Advocate-General nor the Hon. the Home Member insisted on the contention that the words in section 12 were merely directo. And yet the learned Advocate-General had only four months previously urged at great length before the Hon. Judges of the Calcutta High Court that the statement of grounds was not a mandatory condition, and had with true forensic skill ignored the fact that if this was not mandatory, it was no more mandatory to give a notice of forfeiture in writing to the keeper of a printing press or a publisher under sections 4, 6, 9 and 11, or to state or even describe the words, signs or visible representations which, in the Government's opinion, were of the nature described in section 4 sub-section (1). Had this been the law, the Press Act would have been reduced to an even greater farce than it is at present. An intimation to the offending keeper of a printing-press or publisher to the effect that his security had been forfeited, or even a warrant given to the police to seize the offending printing-press without any further ceremony, would in that case have been enough, for the rest could have safely been neglected at pleasure as "directory" and therefore superfluous. This the Supreme Executive Government of India has evidently come to recognise as an untenable position; but if we turn to their attitude as regards the other conclusions drawn in the judgments of the Calcutta Special Bench, we shall see that this provides no consolation for those who may be adversely affected.

Having tacitly accepted the ruling of the Calcutta High Court that the statement of grounds is a mandatory condition, the Executive Government has refused to accept the ruling of that Court as to what constitutes a proper statement of grounds. The Hon. the Advocate-General who generally "submits" when appearing before the Hon. the Judges of the Calcutta High Court, evidently "lays down the law" when he stands up in the Legislative Council behind the Hon. Members of the Executive Council. In the course of his speech in the debate on the 29th January he said with reference to this matter:

Section 4 contains six clauses which prescribe the various grounds on which a publication may be forfeited. These clauses consist of several sub-heads, and if the section is carefully read and analysed it will be seen that there are some thirty grounds on which a publication by means of its criminal and mischievous tendencies may be forfeited. Now the Government in exercising their power of forfeiture under section 12, has always notified the particular ground in respect of which the matter comes within the section. In Notification of forfeiture of a particular pamphlet or paper it is invariably stated in respect of which particular ground of these thirty in the opinion of the Local Government the document offends.

The Hon. the Advocate-General goes further and declares that the Hon. Judges should have merely said that the forfeiture in the particular instance which was submitted to the Court was valid in law, and all the rest in the judgment amounts to mere obiter dicta. Evidently the Hon. Dr. Keurick is not inclined to have much respect for what he calls the phitar dicta of the Chief Justice, and with the assurance born of the occupancy of a seat behind the Executive in the Legislature he brushes aside the whole of that famous judgment.

Turning to the Hon. the Home Member, we find that the same treatment is accorded by him also to the judgment of the Calcutta High Court. He said:

I now pass to the statement that the obligation of the Government in issuing the Notification under section 12 of stating the grounds for its opinion had not been discharged. The learned Chief Justice undoubtedly said that the Court had felt some embarrassment from the absence of these stated grounds in the Notification. But it has always been understood by local Governments that, when ordering the forfeiture of a publication under section 12, it is sufficient for the Notification to specify which of the four clauses in section 4 and the sub-clauses attached to those sections (say) were held to be applicable to the particular

Now there is these deliberate expressions of opinion even a syllable to show that either of the two speakers had ever heard of the unanimous judgment of the three seniormost Judges of the peer or High Court of India to the effect that what they still declare to be grounds of the Government's opinion are not "grounds" in the sense required by the law, whatever the Local Governments may or may not have always understood, and that they do not constitute facts, but are "merely a citation of the words of a section which are invoked," or, in other words, "the specific relation of the elements that the law requires to be present in order for legal consequences to follow." The law, even as it stands, requires the Government before it declares a forfeiture to state not only which of the forty-two, or thirty—according to the Advocate-General—offences contained in "the six clauses in section 4 and the sub-clauses attached to those sections" has been committed, but also why it thinks so. When a Local Government issues an order of forfeiture, it does so because in its opinion at least one of the forty-two offences mentioned in section 4 (1), which it specifies, has been committed. This opinion, if it is to have any value, must be based on some grounds. Unless these grounds are stated the reference of the order of the executive to the judiciary can have no reality, and the High Court can perform no function. There may be reasons why a certain publication of an offensive character which it would be quite legit to proscribe should or should not be proscribed by the Executive at a particular time. That is a matter not of law but of statesmanship. The High Court does not lay any claim to pronounce on "the wisdom or unwisdom of executive action." But if it is called upon to pronounce on the legality or illegality of executive action which the Legislature has authorised it to do, then it must have before it not only the order of the executive, and its opinion that one of a number of offences described in the various clauses and sub-clauses of section 4 (1) has been committed, as the basis of that order, but also the grounds that are the basis of the Government's opinion. Take a parallel case. If an ordinary citizen commits an offence for which the Indian Penal Code provides a punishment, would it be sufficient for Government to order his arrest and make a statement declaring that in its opinion the offence is one under the section which it specifies, and having done so, leave it to him to go to a law Court and satisfy the Judges that he has not committed that offence? Would not the Government be required by the Court to state what grounds it has for its opinion that that particular offence has been committed by the accused, and why the order of arrest should not be cancelled and the accused discharged and set at liberty? It is true that the burden of proof has in the Press Act been curiously enough put on the person adversely affected by the order of the Government and the benefit of doubt is to be given to Government. But that is all the more reason why Government should place the person adversely affected by its order, and the Court which entertains his application, in possession of the grounds on which it has based its opinion. Surely it is absurd to think that in the parallel case which we have suggested the statement that an offence mentioned somewhere in the Penal Code has been committed by the accused is the opinion of Government while the specification of the section of that Code applicable to the particular case is the ground for that opinion. Ye that is exactly what the learned Advocate-General and the Hon. the Home Member have declared after four months' deliberation over the judgments of the Hon. Sir Lawrence Jenkins and the Hon. Sir Harry Stephen.

In view of the declarations of Dr Kenrick and Sir Reginald Craddock, the Hon. Mr. Vijayaraghavachariar was, we believe, fully justified in saying in the course of the Council debate that the position taken up by Government, "if it means anything clearly, 'practically amounts to saying 'We do not care what the High Court has said and we will do as we please.' . . . What the Government say amounts to this: 'The High Court may say "and do what they like, but we will pass our own orders as we have been hitherto doing under the Act.'" Every reasonable man would agree with this speaker's observation that "the Act has been construed and declared to have a particular meaning by the High Court, and I believe even the Executive Government is bound to abide by that declaration and interpretation—unless and until it amends the Act itself." If the Government is not willing to amend the Act with a view to validate for the future its practice in the past, and yet refuses to abide by the interpretation of the existing law by the judiciary, it will most assuredly be guilty of bringing into contempt the administration of justice in a part of British India, unless it thereby brings its own self into contempt.

That may be its own concern, but what we have to see is that the only Court to which a very limited jurisdiction is permitted in the Act should be able to perform the duties cast on it under section 17, and the person adversely affected by an order of the executive could go up to the judiciary to contest the legality of executive action with some hope of a fair trial. According to the Hon. the Chief Justice of Calcutta, "it is intended that the Court should be in as good a position as the Government to judge the merits of any 'proscribed thing', and unless this is done the reference to the judiciary would have no reality at all. In the words of Mr. Justice Waddroffe, 'the less particulars are alleged the more difficult it is to say that a publication does not come under section 12,' so it follows that to be put to a person adversely affected by its order Government should give as full a statement of the grounds of its opinion as possible. On the other hand, in the opinion of Sir Harry Stephen, 'it may be the case that a statement of facts too meagre to give an applicant under 'section 17 any real assistance would be sufficient to satisfy the 'requirement of section 12,' and we have seen that those appearing for Government in a Press Act case are not averse to arguing that 'nothing need be set out at all.' Under the circumstances it is not desirable that the Press Act, if it is still to remain as a stain on the statute book, should be so amended that the statement of grounds should be obligatory on Government in all cases of forfeiture; that it should be as full as possible; and that the benefit of doubt should be given not to the Government but to the person adversely affected by an executive order. In fact, the burden of proof should be on the Government, for the onus of proving a negative is even in ordinary cases an unfair burden with which to saddle the individual in contesting a case with the State.

It may, however, be stated that the Hon. the Home Member did make some attempt to convince the Council that nothing could be done to remove these defects of the Act. He said:

But although the Chief Justice complained of embarrassment, neither he nor the Judges who sat with him indicated precisely what kind of facts or what information would be held to comply with the letter of the section.

Now, in the first place, it is not the duty of the judiciary to declare beforehand on what grounds a forfeiture for any offence under the Press Act must be based for it to be upheld by the judiciary. In the course of the hearing of our appeal the Hon. the Advocate-General, on being pressed by the Hon. Sir Harry Stephens, admitted that the Notification was "not satisfactory," that it was "loosely worded" and that it "could not have been drawn up by a lawyer." This is a pretty confession, indeed, of the ways of the Executive when out on a raid on people's property armed with "loosely worded" Notifications which "could not have been drawn up by a lawyer." The learned Advocate-General was willing enough to have the Notification amended, but the question which the Hon. the Chief Justice put to him was unanswerable, and we make a present of it to the Executive Government. "Do you want us," asked Sir Lawrence Jenkins, "to order the Executive to amend its order?" What more does the Hon. the Home Member want? Does he, the custodian of the power and prestige of the all-wise and all-powerful Executive, want the much-maligned Judiciary to suggest on what grounds the Executive should base its opinions of the character of publications?

In the next place, even if the Judiciary was inclined to advise the Executive on the subject, it could not do so for the obvious reason that it is, in the words of the Chief Justice's judgment, "no more informed than the man in the street." In the course of the hearing the Chief Justice had clearly intimated that "we do not know the facts: only the Government has the facts." Obviously, therefore, only the Government could declare on what facts its opinion was based. Where the work of the Executive ends the work of the Judiciary begins. Having decided what to disclose as the basis of its opinion and what to keep secret, the Executive must retire, and must leave it to the Judiciary to pronounce, not upon the wisdom, but upon the legality of the order of forfeiture, in the light of the facts disclosed. "We can do nothing," said the Chief Justice, "except in the eye of the public. Whatever our convictions 'may be of the character of the Government, we cannot form any 'opinion apart from the facts.'" If the Executive was convinced that it would be called upon to declare the forfeiture of publications, societies and printing-presses on information that could not be disclosed in a law Court, that it would be moved by impressions and personal experiences to which no expression could be given in a law Court, and that its action would be based on considerations forbidden to law Courts, then its obvious duty was to ask the Legislature for powers to declare such forfeitures without having to submit its orders even to a subsequent judicial scrutiny. Regulation III of 1818, as we know, is still extant, and only in 1878 the Vernacular Press Act had freed similar executive action from all judicial shackles. What was it, then, that prevented our progressive executive in 1908 from progressing backwards to 1818, or applying permanently to a far more developed profession, which now included in its ranks some of the ablest and best educated men in the country, the law applied in 1876 only for a few years to far less informed and far less developed vernacular journals only? In a word, it was a wholesome fear of public opinion in India, and still more so of public opinion in England. Well, it is to the same authority that we appeal to-day. If it could not tolerate such a retrogression openly, it should tolerate still less the same retrogression under false pretences. And is there the least doubt in the mind of any reasonable person that the sole safeguard under the Press Act, namely a reference to the judiciary, is a sham and a simulacrum and a piece of imposture, if unintended, hypocrisy?

The Moslem University.

Among the things that really make a searching test of the mental virility and strength of purpose of a people, the project embodying the desire of the Mussalmans to have a University of their own is one. Our chief concern at present is not to examine the ideals underlying the project, which have moved the Moslem community for upwards of a generation and sum up its finest hopes about the future. Aims and ends have been discussed threadbare in the course of the last thirty years, and practical unanimity had been reached about them even before the organised effort about ways and means came to be launched in 1911 under the guidance of H. H. the Aga Khan. The prompt and enthusiastic response to appeals for the Moslem University Fund furnished a measure of the popularity that the ideals had achieved with the mass of the community. When it became apparent after the first appeal was made for the collection of funds that the spirit behind the movement was earnest and resolute and public response ungrudging, the project of the early seventies, which had germinated in the brain of the late Sir Syed Ahmed and to which clung the aspirations of his life time and of those who had hoped and striven with him, emerged from the dreamland and began to be hammered into shape to suit the exigencies of the day. The framing of a suitable constitution for the Moslem University was not an easy task, but it was tackled with great thought and care and with the united labours of the ablest and most experienced Mussalmans in the country. No time was wasted in unnecessary delays. The Moslem University Constitution Committee did its work in a business-like way, and the draft Constitution that it finally drew up, though not ideally perfect in all respects, was, nevertheless, the fruit of a monumental task broadly conceived and carefully executed on lines generally approved by the Moslem community. But before the Constitution Committee had finished its labours, it was borne in upon its intelligence in a dramatic manner that it had left certain "exigencies" out of account which if not properly met might wreck the whole University scheme and condemn the Mussalmans to wild and bitter dreaming for another generation. These "exigencies" were set forth in a remarkable letter which was received all of a sudden by the President of the Constitution Committee from the Head of the Education Department of the Government of India. This amazing communication called the attention of the members of the Constitution Committee for the first time to certain "final decisions" beyond which they were warned not to go. For the members nothing could provide a more disillusioning experience than this new situation. They had entered on their task with strong faith in their ideals and full confidence in the sympathetic attitude of the Government. They had consulted the wishes of the Member for Education at every step and had tried to mould their scheme in the spirit of their own ideals and in the light of all the reasonable suggestions they had received from their friends and advisers. And now, that they had matured their scheme and were almost at the end of their labours and imagined the fruit to be well within their grasp, came the sudden intimation that they would have to recast their plans and radically change their whole design to suit official pleasure. It was a rude awakening to the Mussalmans in general, for they had fondly imagined that purely educational schemes based on the needs and prompted by the united wishes of a whole community would be immune from arbitrary official checks. But they learnt at the right psychological moment in their educational history that they were mistaken.

What "the final decisions" of the Secretary of State communicated by Sir Harcourt Butler have achieved needs no telling. At the time they were first made public the whole community was filled with dismay. It seemed as if the cup of its hope, which had taken years of devoted service and sacrifice to fill, was suddenly dashed to the ground. The disappointment was naturally as bitter as the enthusiasm had been keen, and it sank deep into the hearts of the people. Only those could measure the shock with accuracy who had known exactly what the ideal of a Moslem University had meant to the Mussalmans. It had been their one infatuation, their supreme hope for years, the master-purpose that had sustained and inspired them for a full generation. They had dreamed and toiled for it in utter disregard of everything else, and had been waiting in glorious contentment to see it grow into bodily shape as the crown of their endeavour. And just when the goal swam into their ken and they were hurrying to reach it with sure and joyous strides, "the final decisions" were flung across their path like some dark and dismal finger of fate. The result has been no better than what would have been were these "decisions" a mere caprice of a despot. The clear motive and purpose that the University scheme had evoked have been turned into doubts and misgivings. The scheme itself has not been definitely abandoned—we hope it never will. But the energy needed for its practical realisation is being just now wasted in pathetic attempts to devise some means for propitiating the Fates that preside over its destinies. The wave of genuine enthusiasm evoked by the movement would have been an asset of incalculable value in the growth of Moslem education. The wave, however, has almost spent itself against the formidable rocks that have suddenly risen across its path. The effect of reaction has been felt all along the line. The bitter disappointment of the University muddle has had the most depressing effect on the Moslem educational effort as a whole. The workers everywhere have been forced to pause and wonder in blank surprise what sort of a coping-stone they would be ultimately allowed for the edifice, or whether they would have to shift as best they can without a coping-stone at all. It is worth remembering that the announcement of "the final decisions" led directly to the immediate stopping of all further contributions to the funds for the proposed University. If adequate funds had not already been collected the financial aspect of the question would alone have proved a great handicap. As it is, the University funds have been deprived of a sum, at least equal to half the amount already subscribed, which could have been easily collected but for the general pessimism that has settled over the community. Those who are tempted to accuse the community of lack of sustained zeal and purpose, would do well to bear in mind that no people in the world can be induced to waste their hard-earned substance in pursuit of shadows or on mere caricatures of their blasted hopes. If the Mussalmans had been quietly told at the start that they would not be allowed to have the sort of University they were hoping for, there would have been deep disappointment indeed, but they would have been spared the anguish of wasted efforts and the sense of balked desires. The decisions formed and announced almost at the eleventh hour have changed the whole aspect of the situation. Not only the Mussalmans have failed to create the University for which they had been striving with a singleness of purpose rare in the recent history of India, but their whole educational effort has also received a serious moral check. The leading spirits that were actively helping forward the movement have been everywhere depressed. The funds of the University have been deprived of almost all further help, at any rate, till the scheme is finally disposed of one way or the other. Even the Aligarh College has suffered materially in this period of general bitterness and dismay. All these results are the direct outcome of the "final decisions" which the Secretary of State had been pleased to impose on the Moslem University. It is not very difficult after this to realize why the Mussalmans of India have been forced to cogitate inwardly as they had never done before. During the past two years the world has witnessed a variety of events that have deeply stirred Moslem feelings. The most prominent among these have been the wars of aggression against Moslem States and the terrible sufferings to which they gave rise. The excitement amongst the Mussalmans of India was due chiefly to their deep grief for the distress and misfortunes of their co-religionists abroad, and it was so general and great that their own grievances and disappointments were for the time being forgotten. But it should be worth while pointing out that the real thing that has festered in the Moslem mind is the treatment meted out to their deep-cherished scheme for the Moslem University. If anything could really affect their attitude it is this all-important question. Let those who wander far and wide in quest of "reasons" for a supposed change of attitude amongst the Mussalmans ponder this carefully.

Now, what are these "decisions" which the Government calls final and which would shatter Moslem hopes altogether if there is to be no limit to their finality. Briefly, they are that the proposed Moslem University shall have no powers to affiliate schools and college outside Aligarh, that it shall have as its Chancellor, not the Viceroy, but the Governor-General in Council and that it shall be styled, not "The Moslem University", but "The Aligarh University." As regards the last we would not say anything except that only those who have little sense of the value of sentiment would cry out: "What is there in name." The questions of Chancellorship and of affiliation are of vital importance. The framers of the Moslem University Constitution vested large powers in the Chancellor solely on the assumption that the office would be held by the Viceroy in his ex-officio capacity. The substitution of the Governor-General in Council would practically mean that the powers of the Chancellor would be exercised by the Education Department of the Government of India. This would constitute a grave departure, for it would result in bringing the administration of the vital affairs of the University directly under the control of officials with their fixed standards and ideas and pre-conceptions formed in a wholly different educational atmosphere. The proposed Moslem University would be nothing if not a novel experiment on new educational lines. The lines are to be laid down by the Moslem Community and nobody else. But if it is to sink into the commonplace pattern and become another copy of the State Universities, it had better be not created at all. Yet this is exactly to what the control by a State Department would finally and inevitably tend. If the Government of India or the Secretary of State cannot eventually agree with the Mussalmans on this point, the only course open to the latter is either to have an unofficial Chancellor or to revise the powers reserved for the Chancellor, as it would otherwise be impossible to guarantee reasonable freedom for the success of the University experiment on lines laid down by the Mussalmans themselves.

The question of affiliation is not less important than that of the Chancellor. It is an integral part of the scheme matured by the Mussalmans mainly because it lies at the root of the whole question of Moslem education. Moslem disappointment is keenest on this point, and as far as present indications go the community is in no mood to change its attitude in the matter. We need not argue why. We have said enough on the subject, and those who care to know Moslem standpoint would not fail to do so for want of adequate material for knowledge. For the present we are only concerned with seeing if it is at all necessary or desirable for the Government to persevere in its existing attitude. The question of efficient control of affiliated institutions and the supervision of teaching would not prove an insuperable barrier. The State Universities somehow contrive to exercise efficient control and supervision, if we are to believe the best official testimony; and why it should be an impossible task for the Moslem University we fail to see. Let the standards be as high as possible, the rules as stringent as you please. The University would have to provide itself with a competent inspecting staff, and for its own reputation and convenience as well as for the sake of Moslem education generally, it would weigh every case on its merits and exercise the utmost care before it decides to grant affiliation. What effect a separate inspecting staff and examinations simultaneously conducted at different centres can have on the teaching spirit and tone of the college or colleges at Aligarh it is difficult to conceive. Aligarh will retain its own atmosphere and its own traditions, and by the facilities for higher studies and research that it would provide on a generous scale it would attract the most promising boys for post-graduate study at the seat of the University. It would at the same time transmit its spirit and energy through innumerable channels and co-ordinate Moslem educational effort throughout the country. In view of these considerations we fail to see why the Government should insist on depriving the Moslem University of the powers of affiliation.

Rumours of compromise on this question have long been in the air, and we are told the Government would be willing to grant the University the power of affiliating high schools. This would be an important concession, though it is not clear to us why permission should be withheld in the case of a few Moslem colleges which exist or are likely to come into being in the near future. In fact the arguments that might be urged against the affiliation of schools lose all their validity and force when applied to affiliation of colleges. The only consideration that should weigh with all reasonable men is that the Moslem University should, so to speak, find itself, before it can be fit to exercise efficient control and supervision outside its locality. The best safeguard in this case would be to grant the powers of affiliation to the University with the stipulation that they should be exercised, say, five or six years after it comes into being. We trust the Hon. Sir Harcourt Butler will reconsider the whole matter in the light of the observations we have made and let the Mussalmans get out of a state of suspended animation. Their whole educational programme is hanging on the fate of the Moslem University. The Moslem University Foundation Committee had decided at its last meeting to appoint a deputation of representative Mussalmans from every province to submit the views of the community to the Government and ascertain the latter's wishes in regard to the points requiring settlement. The deputation has not been given a blank cheque, but it would be composed of some of the best and most trusted men in the community and its united and considered views should carry weight with that Government as they do with its own people. We hope that the necessary steps will soon be taken to carry out the resolutions of the Moslem University Foundation Committee, and an endeavour will be made to rescue the University project from the impasse into which it has fallen. No time should be lost. The delay that has already occurred has wrought incalculable harm to the best interests of the community.

Crusade Against Islam Planned.

The rapid growth of Islam is causing a great alarm among the great leaders of the Christian World these days. Well-constructed plans and elaborate schemes are being made in Europe and America to thwart this progress. At a special committee of the World's Sunday School Convention, appointed this week in New York, it was decided that an attempt should be made to conquer Mohamedanism by educating children under Christian guidance. The modern crusade will be conducted not by the sword, but by the primer and the blackboard. Sensational reports are being published in the American and European newspapers, and a great enthusiasm is shown by the people. The furious storm is coming with great threats, and if we, True Believers, fail to hold our positions, destruction is sure and certain. The enemy has got to be faced and a fierce battle has to be fought. It's up to you, brother Moslems, to realize the gravity of the situation.

Here is the exact copy of the plan your enemy has worked out to carry on the warfare against your faith. Read it over and again, and ask yourself what you should do to avert the danger:

A modern crusade against Mohamedanism more sweeping than the crusades of the Middle Ages may be the result of plans elaborated this week by the Special Committee of the World's Sunday School Association in New York.

Alarmed by the rapid progress of Mohamedanism which is far outstripping Christianity in Africa and some parts of Asia, the continuation Committee on Mohamedan lands of the World's Sunday School Convention held at Zurich last summer has undertaken to make a religious and social survey of the Moslem World. The survey will be conducted along scientific lines by special investigators, and the findings will be reported at the World's Sunday School Convention to be held in Tokyo in 1916. The results given in the report will be placed at the disposal of all the missionary boards as the basis for a concerted campaign against Islam.

Missionary leaders of world-fame will make a tour of thirteen cities, from February 2 to 11, holding conferences and public meetings to lay all the details of the plans before the denominations.

Bishop Joseph C. Hartzell, Dr. S. M. Zwemer of Egypt, and Dr. E. F. Freese of North Africa are members of the Continuation Committee. Mr. H. J. Heinz, Mr. E. K. Warrens and Mr. M. Lawrence, as officers of the World's Sunday School Association, will assist in directing the survey. A general secretary for the Committee will be appointed with headquarters in Cairo, and it is hoped that special secretaries will be appointed for Egypt, Turkey and Albania.

TO WORK THROUGH CHILDHOOD.

To capture the Mohamedan world by capturing the childhood is the ultimate project for which the survey will be a preparation. Since it is believed that illiteracy and ignorance are the chief bulwark of Mohamedanism, special study will be devoted to ways and means of introducing modern educational methods under Christian direction in Moslem countries. The modern crusade will be conducted not by the sword, but by the primer and the blackboard.

The survey experts will co-operate on inter-denominational lines with representatives of different missionary boards in Moslem lands and with the Government officials in arriving at the best types of childhood literature, picture tracts and simple textbooks, suitable locations and buildings and the most effective methods of teaching. The results from time to time will be published and placed at the disposal of all the missionary forces and public authorities, pending the final report in 1916.

"Mohamedanism is having a larger success than the Christian religion especially in Africa," said Bishop Hartzell, chairman of the Committee, in discussing the prospective survey. "One eighth of the world's population is Moslem. The proportion is increasing yearly. To-day nearly all the sacred places named in the Bible are under Mohamedan rule."

ISLAM OUTSTRIPPING CHRISTIANITY.

"In Africa Islam is leaving Christianity far behind in the race. Mohamedanism is absolutely dominant in the Persian Empire. Many more native Indians are becoming Mohamedans every year than Christians."

"There are eighty million Moslem children. The vast majority of them are stunted in mind and body as a result of ignorance, superstitious practices, early marriage and licensed immorality, which are incident to the Mohamedan religion wherever it has prevailed. Infant mortality is enormous, due largely to the prevalence of sex diseases. In Algeria it is said to be 60 per cent., in Sierra Leone 50 per cent., in Egypt 75 per cent., in Morocco over 75 per cent."

"In Egypt during the year 1911, 74,000 children were born. In that same year 22,000 or nearly one-third, died at less than twelve years of age. It is estimated that in Persia only one child out of ten reaches the age of 20."

"Only the best modern education, by elevating physical, intellectual and moral standards can change these conditions. No immediate results can be looked for. We cannot be too conservative in forecasting the outcome of the present survey. Illiteracy, ignorance and fanaticism are to be fought down and this will take many years."

"Statistics of illiteracy in all Moslem lands are alarming. Careful investigation shows that from 75 per cent. to 95 per cent. of the Mohamedans in Asia and Africa are unable to read and write."

Univ. of Washington }
Seattle, U. S. A. }

SAIYED M. MAHMOUD.

'Seed Capsules of Thought.'

UNDER the auspices of the Bombay Students Brotherhood the Hon. Mr. Justice Beaman delivered a few days ago a lecture on 'Seed Capsules of Thought' in the Wilson College Hall, Chowpatty, Bombay.

Commencing his discourse, Mr. Beaman said he did not intend to preach a sermon or deliver a college lecture to enable them to get so many marks in their next examination paper or better evade the wiles of the devil; but he wanted to talk to them in the friendliest spirit for half-an-hour or so of anything which came uppermost in his own mind while he was thinking over what they should talk about. For after all there was only the thing (although its complexities and wide ramifications were almost inexhaustible) that was worth talking or thinking about, and that was—Life and how to make the most of it. He then proceeded to deal with the philosophy of life in its various phases.

'Earnestness,' he said is one of the dominant notes of the day. Almost every one I have listened to, addressing you from this platform has been very earnest and has exhorted you to be very earnest. Usually the exhorter was, let us say without offence, middle-aged; but you are young and I wish your teachers and preachers would not insist so much upon the need of this earnestness. Is the round world about you very earnest? Not at all, Nature is full of humours, rude jests, earthquakes, storms, avalanches, alternating with smiling almost purring moods of quiet happiness, and again riotous exhilaration as when a fresh wind is blowing over a laughing sea, and kissing every dimpling wave. People who are always in earnest usually have little imagination and no humour. Earnestness without humour is like lamb without mint sauce and young men really have no business to be earnest; they should be too full of the joy of life for life's sake and the desire to live out every hour of it in its fullest intensity. If all the world were filled with earnest folk only, we should indeed be a drab and scentless flower on the top stalk of evolution.

NO NEED FOR SERIOUSNESS.

It is a dreadful thing to have a serious purpose too young, to fondly devote yourselves while still in the class-rooms to some High sounding mission. I mean of course, any serious purpose outside the most serious and at that time important of all the development of your own faculties to the utmost pitch of receptivity and powers of assimilating all the healthy and normal life with which you come in contact, and also of giving out again enriched by your own personalities all the best of life you have taken in. What are we to say of those good attenuated souls, who profess to have devoted themselves to the cause of humanity? Frequently indeed while under the influence of this high-sounding but rather nebulous notion they may be very nice and kind to humanity but extremely disagreeable devastating fellows in the family circle. Let me remind you in this connection of Ruskin's 'Brandt.' It is not in the least incompatible with expressing the best within you to open yourselves in youth to all the glory and the gladness and the laughter of the world as naturally as the sunflower turns to the sun. Benvenuto Cellini was perhaps the greatest master of his own craft yet observe how high the sap of life rose in him, how full his veins were of its richest, most exuberant wine.

Life needs to be affirmed not denied, and the ascetic idea with its teaching of renunciation and a pallid selflessness is the negation of all natural life. Altruism in concept is an absurdity. If everyone were equally altruistic the word would have no meaning and life, as we know it, would have no meaning either. But every reality if recognizable at all, must be recognised in universals, and a universal altruism is a contradiction in terms. The notion of altruism is only intelligible because the majority of men are not altruistic and those who are, are only partially so. The virtue of altruism, like a chalk mark on a blackboard, is thrown into relief by the mass of non-altruism and, it thus becomes clear that in proportion to its relative exiguity is it to be apprehended and admired. The greater its extension the more rapidly it approaches annihilation.

PHRASE WITHOUT MEANING.

'And I should like to remark that while a great many of us are very fond of talking about loving humanity, although that sentiment is prominent in a great many slightly overwrought societies where the freest play is given to all amiable emotion, it is a phrase without a meaning. Love is a very easy thing to profess but a thing not so easy to feel. You can promise conduct but you really cannot promise sentiments. Thus you can promise to love a woman from the age of say, 20, to the end of your natural life, and if you are a man of your word all that means is that you will promise to act towards her as though you loved her. But you might as well promise not to have a toothache in the next twenty years (provided you have any teeth of course) as that you will not cease to love her during an equal period. But if it is so difficult to command love even in the closest and most intimate personal relations, it is merely absurd to talk of loving millions and millions of human beings whom you have never seen and never will see. If you mean that you are in love with the abstract notion of humanity, all that I can say is that having tried as an honest man very hard to make out for myself what this means, I have been forced to the conclusion that it means nothing.

'The plain truth is, no one ever has loved humanity and no one ever will; and the 'great cause of humanity,' though it is sometimes a convenient and compendious expression for a group of commendable purposes, is just nonsense. For this—for no other reason—I am speaking of course of what we as human beings are capable of knowing and experiencing not of what may or may not be under other conditions of which we have not, and as men never will have any knowledge—this reason then that human life is so ordered that radically like all else in the organic world man depends for his very existence upon conflict. The struggle for existence, to use a hackneyed phrase from the vocabulary of a happily moribund evolutionism, implies this much at least, that practically everything which religion calls evil is inseparable from organic life.

DEMOCRACY AND SOCIALISM.

Preceding, the lecturer said:—'In these sentences very colloquially worded I have been hinting at rather profound things, sowing I hope seed capsules of thought which may bear fruit in some of your minds later. There is hardly a topic of the many I have just touched upon which I could not have spoken to you for several hours at a stretch, if I had wished to exhaust it or really lecture you. But that is exactly what I don't want to do. My idea has been to take your various knowledge boxes and give them a good shake up so as to set the contents in motion, set you thinking again for yourselves about so much that I fancy most of you are rather apt to take for granted. Take such a word, for example, as democracy and what does it mean? We all placidly resign ourselves to the growing power of democracy, but does anyone pause to reflect what a perfected democracy would be? Just as a single man may impose laws on himself, which are very good laws as long as he chooses to obey them, but no longer, so now we are invited to witness the spectacle of a people imposing laws on itself. This means one of two things, that no one ever would obey the laws, or that the laws will be enforced by majorities. That is to say 100 persons will hodgepodge 99 persons into obeying them. It is quite possible that the 99 may comprise all the wealth, talent, intellect, ability of the total 100, but still they must obey, for this is democracy. Could you imagine any worse, more intolerable tyranny in the world? Happily it always breaks down long before it reaches perfection and begins to breed all sorts of inferior bureaucracies or plutocracies or other 'cracies.' But the only 'cracy' that is etymologically and practically sound is aristocracy. Rule by the best. You young gentlemen, of India, historically and constitutionally the most aristocratic country in the world, would do well to think out seriously each for himself the full content of those words now glibly bandied from lip to lip, democracy and socialism.

WISDOM OF CASTE SYSTEM.

The great cause of Negro emancipation anti-slavery with which England was athrob and America worked to such a white heat of zeal all through the middle of the 19th century produced mighty results. Millions of lives were sacrificed, hundreds of millions of money spent and a very ancient and respectable institution was overthrown. It may be doubted whether the Negroes of America are really much better off as free men than the majority of them used to be as slaves; it cannot seriously be doubted but that the great white people who wrought so strenuously and fiercely to set the negro free have suffered to grow up in their midst, in every one of their great cities and centres of industry forms of slavery worse socially and morally, harder to bear, harder to eradicate because masked under the smug conventions, the high sounding shibboleths, and the bourgeois hypocrisy of republican plutocracy. I must own at the risk of some unpopularity to an ever-growing admiration for the wonderful system of caste finely conceived and admirably adapted to social needs by your sagacious and most rightly venerated ancestors. Proof, if any were needed, of its essential soundness, is best given by its long duration and the general social stability which it ensured. Not the least popular of current, and 'causes' in the abolition of caste, and a philosopher may be permitted a large note of interrogation. A vast amount of generous, high enthusiasm, is being focussed upon the demolition of this stately old edifice. When these amiable and high-minded zealots have accomplished their work, when the venerable and imposing fabric of Indian society lies about them in ruins, I suppose they are much too earnest to be able to spare a moment for nursery rhymes or possibly they might pause upon the sad fate of Humpty Dumpty. For the simple truth is that men are not free and never can be free, as long as they group themselves in societies, that men never were, never are and never will be equal and that universal brotherhood is a chimera, a more emotional mirage.

PERFECTION OF SOCIETY.

'But do not misunderstand me. Try to distinguish. I am not disparaging genuine purpose, and lofty enthusiasm, least of all do I wish to undervalue ideals. It is only against an ebullient, impetuous and sometimes rather premature determination to force our own notions of heaven upon the world that I venture a gentle warning. The direction, not the quality of the effort, may sometimes give rise to misgiving and doubt. And surely before squandering ourselves in modern 'causes' we may well remember the sonorous and stately words, 'No man may redeem his brother for it costs more to save his own soul so that he must let that alone for ever.' The psychology of crowds has long been the subject of curious study; the psychology of much social 'reform' is perhaps closely allied with it. The mottoes, formulae and war cries of all militant organizations in proportion as they prove to be intellectual anodynes, prove to be in other directions, the most powerful emotional stimulants. It is only by a gradual change of moral climate, that the worst moral weeds can be extirpated, and the fairest moral flowers brought to perfection. I do not wish to dogmatize, because I particularly dislike anything like dogmatism, pedantry and pedagogism in the fine regions of thought in which I would fain greet you. And as you may have guessed I should be the last to lay profane hands too rudely upon any arc of the covenant. But I may I hope make this suggestion for what it is worth without giving offence to any of my listeners that you can hardly put your lives to a better or more useful purpose than by each striving in life, every detail and part, as well as in the whole shown forth in conduct and the man's total reaction upon the universe about him, to be the best possible exemplar of your type or race. In this way by first perfecting yourselves working upon material within your own power and control, you may surely hope to help on the perfection of the group or society in which you live and of which each of you is an integral part. Life is I believe given to us, that we may make out of it the highest and the best we are capable of, by the ray of the Divine within us.

England and Egypt.

By ALI FAHMY MOHAMMED.

I write these lines at a favourable time, when England, the dominant Power in Egypt, and Turkey, the nominal suzerain of Egypt, would appear to be drawing together more closely after a period of estrangement; when England seems really desirous of giving satisfaction to the Egyptian people, if she can find means of doing so, as compensation for the use of their country as a military post in her scheme of Imperial defence. I believe that the British Government were perfectly sincere in their desire to get rid of the Egyptian muddle in 1887, when Lord Salisbury declared in the House of Lords (January 15) that the object they aimed at was "the neutralisation of Egypt." I believe they are still anxious to find some plan that may at the same time safeguard their Imperial interests and satisfy the aspirations of the Egyptians. I believe, too, that England is in Egypt not to exploit the resources of the country to her own advantage, but to protect the high road to her Indian Empire. Nor do I forget that the Occupation costs her a round sum for the maintenance of her garrison. If the Egyptians are prepared to accept the inevitable, I think that the British authorities and the British public are no less prepared to do so.

So much for one side. On the other side, I feel confident that no reasonable Englishman would blame the Egyptians for disliking the occupation of their fatherland by foreign troops. And if the Egyptians have been humiliated in this way for more than 6,000 years, that is no reason why they should be humiliated thus for ever. The masses, no doubt, do not yet grasp the idea of political independence. But the educated classes are ever ready to appeal to their sentiments, even to their sentimentality, to drive "the unbelievers" out of the country. Another side of the question is that Europeans, particularly those English who possess a good knowledge of the country and a perhaps better experience of the modern Egyptians, believe, rightly or wrongly, that were the British to leave the Nile valley it would at once fall into a state of chaos and disorder, fomented to their own advantage by the "enthusiasts." The Europeans, I recognise, truly believe, in the words of a former correspondent of the Times, that "Egypt for the Egyptians" means Egypt for a handful of people, some of whom are not Egyptians at all." Nevertheless, the Egyptians are aspiring to a noble purpose, but our efforts to attain it seem to be altogether ineffective, and "the sum of energy expended" (to quote the same Times correspondent again) "in vainly crying for the moon would be a mighty force for good, if directed in other channels." But recent experiences and developments seem to me to prove that Egypt could be regenerated by one of two alternatives—(1) That the country should be handed over to a powerful and benevolent despot, such as Lord Cromer, but devoted to her cause, irrespective of all considerations of haute politique; or (2) that it should be entrusted to some superior surveillance inspired by foreign advisers or bodies, also entirely independent of colonial obligations.

I have no intention of dwelling here in detail upon the issue that it is believed in Europe would follow upon the British evacuation of the country. Nor would any worthy Egyptian wish to substitute another foreign supremacy for the British. For, then, as Shakespeare well said:—

"Thus must we from the smoke into the smother."

My contention is that England is tied hand and foot by many restrictions and considerations in preparing us for self-government until the Grand Egyptian Question is settled on some permanent basis.

"Our promises of conditional evacuation," says the Daily Telegraph, "are on record, and whether the Egyptians prove capable or not, we may be sure that other nations at times, when it suits them to do so, will not fail to remind us of our engagements; at these times they will insist that, whatever experiments we may make in fulfillment of our promises, law and order shall reign in Egypt."

In this sense M. de Freycinet wrote:—"L'Europe le ferait-elle? Nul ne le sait. Mais ce dont je ne doute pas, malgré les apparences contraires, c'est qu'à un moment de l'histoire l'Egypte cessera d'être sous la domination anglaise." Once I formulated "Proposals for the Solution of the Egyptian Question" (dated September 7, 1908). The essence of those proposals is the substitution of an international garrison for the British Army of Occupation for a limited period, after which the peace of Egypt would not be threatened from within or from without, and the substitution of a temporary international control for the British Administration—the whole arrangement would finally result in the neutralisation of Egypt. This solution seems now, however, to be less than possible, despite the fact that the proposal was received with appreciation by many high authorities on Egyptian and international affairs, among them one no less than Lord Milner, who wrote to me: "Although, as you say, your point of view is different from mine, still, you argue your case in a reasonable manner."

The solving of the Egyptian question is looked upon now by British statesmen and diplomats as a question of "life and death." They are naturally afraid that Egypt might fall into other hands. "When I speak of the loss of Egypt," says Lord Cromer, "I do not mean the withdrawal of the British garrison and the establishment of a purely indigenous Government in that country. I allude to the much more probable contingency of the withdrawal of the British garrison and the establishment in its place of a military force belonging to some other European Power." In this sense the Times' military correspondent says:—"We can never for one moment dream of accepting the arrival of the foreigner in Egypt without giving him a fight which will make the welkin ring... The vast importance of Egypt as a link between East and West makes it not impossible that a great contest for the Empire may be decided upon this historic ground, and it is not too much to say that the Minister who loses Egypt will deserve to lose his head."

Now, in the face of these declarations, coming from such competent authorities, it is idle to ignore that, by the logic of facts, England is determined, if not to retain her hold over Egypt, at least to oppose, at all hazards, any other ascendancy in the land of the Pharaohs. We all, Egyptians, quite realise that this is our ideal too, and therefore there is common cause and common interest between England and Egypt. As I have pointed out, England is in Egypt not to profit materially from her, but to keep other foreign comers out and to safeguard her high route to India. These being the advantages and disadvantages of the situation, I believe the following suggestions may be of interest to English and Egyptian politicians and statesmen. The question, being of vital importance, necessitates much sacrifice on both sides. There was never a nation that did not pay dearly for her national emancipation, and, till now, we Egyptians cannot claim to have offered the sacrifice. Moreover, it is a monetary sacrifice, which will not affect the economical condition of the taxpayer. Nor do I think the British authorities would hesitate to offer the required sacrifice in exchange for the political and military support and co-operation of Egypt in Imperial defence. We have seen them inviting their colonies and dependencies to co-operate in that Imperial defence. And I think it would prove ultimately fatal to their cause if British diplomats attempt to incorporate Egypt within the British Empire. I firmly believe that if the relations between England and Egypt are carefully developed into mutual cordiality and help, British statesmanship will only be doing its duty towards human progress and Imperial defence. There is now a growing desire to promote good understanding between England and Turkey; and Egypt might well serve as the link of Anglo-Mohammedan co-operation. It is not for me to dwell here in detail upon the concessions that may be exchanged between the principal contending parties; but, as an Egyptian, I put forward certain suggestions which directly concern the destiny of my country.

A.—ON THE PART OF EGYPT.

1. The equipment of an Egyptian army from 300,000 to 500,000 men strong, to be employed, in the first place, for the defence of Egypt against any foreign aggression, and, in the second place, for safeguarding other clauses of the proposed Anglo-Turkish Alliance. This army should be commanded by two British and Turkish generals and officered mainly by Egyptians.

2. The expenses of the proposed naval station at Alexandria to be borne by the Egyptian Treasury, as well as all other expenditures found necessary for the naval defence of Egypt.

3. The construction of an Egyptian fleet to co-operate with the British squadrons in the Mediterranean.

B.—ON THE PART OF ENGLAND.

1. The withdrawal of British troops from the capital (Cairo), and their restriction to the ports. These troops are to be gradually replaced by Egyptian troops within a reasonable time, during which political confidence should be established between the two countries.

2. The proclamation of a moderate and reasonable Constitution.

3. The attempt by England to abolish the Capitulations or, if that be not possible, to transfer the jurisdiction of the Consular Courts to the Mixed Tribunals.

4. The revision of the schools programme and the re-organisation of the Egyptian University and the University of Al-Azhar.

5. The unification of the Egyptian Public Debt and the reduction of the interest thereon.

6. The gradual but steady decrease of foreign functionaries in the Government service.

These are my ideas, which I publish for consideration. I hope they will make others endeavour to find some way out of the muddle, without being objectionable to either side. Lord Kitchener seems anxious to give satisfaction to our legitimate desires; he is busy in developing the material and economical resources of the country. But it is not merely by materialism that a country can be regenerated. It is essentially by the uplifting of its moral and social conditions that a nation can revive. By various restrictions, which it would be out of place to cite here, England is tied hand and foot in dealing with these questions, unless and until the Grand Egyptian Question, in its international aspect, is solved one way or another on a permanent basis. The Near East.

The British Control of Egypt.

From Sir Harry H. Johnston.

To the Editor of The "Near East."

SIR,—I think you have rendered a service to all who are studying the problems of the Near East by publishing Mr. Ali Fehmy Muhammad's suggestions for a permanent settlement of the relations between Britain and Egypt. These suggestions aptly illustrate the utter impracticability of the Turkish or the so-called Egyptian Nationalist point of view. I write "so-called" because the "Egyptian 'Nationalist' Party" contains very few descendants or representatives of the Copts and the Fellahin, and mostly consists of men of Turkish, Kurdish, Circassian, or Syrian race.

There is no reason whatever, based on the past history of the British Empire, why Egypt should not, as a protected kingdom, come within the recognised limits of the British Empire, on the same lines as the more notable of the great Indian feudatory States, as Sarawak, the Malay Sultanate, the Kingdom of Buganda, or the Sultanate of Koweit. Egypt can never become a British "colony"—no British statesman has ever conceived of her as such—though she is probably destined to be a European health resort and to accommodate an even larger element of Levantine Christians than she possesses at the present day. But an Egyptian kingdom entirely uncontrolled by some European Power is an impossibility, not only now, but for fifty or perhaps a hundred years to come. And the only alternatives to the present form of British control and protection are a re-incorporation in the Turkish Empire or the transference of the European supervision to France, Italy, or Germany. Such alternatives would carry with them the break-up of the British Empire in East Africa and the Sudan, and in Southern Asia; so it is a waste of time for an Englishman to discuss them. That it is the duty of Britain at the earliest opportunity to abolish the Capitulations in Egypt and to organise instead a well-equipped national administration of justice, dealing alike with natives and foreigners, no one on this side is inclined to dispute, any more than another of Mr. Fehmy Muhammad's propositions—the unification of the Egyptian Debt and reduction of interest thereon (as a set-off against increased security of payment)—would be scouted by British reformers of Egypt. But the foreign capitalists would never agree to this last measure of reform if the British troops were to leave Cairo.

Of course, there will gradually grow up a form of native constitutional government, responding more and more to the needs and aspirations of the masses of the people, above all of the eight and a half millions of patient agriculturists; in the same way that under the British ægis in other dependent States constitutional government is being gradually and reasonably established. The decrease of the non-Egyptian officials, especially in all the lower grades of employment, is a matter which depends largely on the progress of real, practical, twentieth century education in Egypt, the education which will impart a sound knowledge of history, geography, zoology (especially etymology), botany, engineering, chemistry and sanitation. This together with the drastic reform of the Al Azhar University and the rescue of the funds of religious foundations from greedy misappropriation by fanatics or corrupt functionaries, is a direction in which the Egyptian Nationalists might bestir themselves, to the great advantage of the country they profess to love. When a Mohamedan Egyptian is found showing an intelligent appreciation of the beauties and the history of Saracenic art, or becomes an apt pupil in Egyptology of Flinders Petrie or Maspero, or initiates or prosecutes some additional great discovery i.e., palæontology, or finds a seam of coal or a well of petroleum or vein of emeralds, it will be time to talk of filling the great educational and industrial posts in Egypt with natives of that country. I write without a sneer and with some hope, for I know that in medical science Turks and Kurds have risen high in the Egyptian service, and have received full recognition of their attainments and abilities at the hands of the British Government. But amid all their clamour in the Press and on the platform, what Mohamedan Egyptian has ever referred with legitimate pride to the results of British and German discoveries by which Egypt has been shown to have had a wondrous past as a creative centre, to have been the theatre in which not only the whales and the elephants, the hippopotamuses and the manati, the old and new world monkeys and anthropoid apes, but possibly even man himself have been evolved? No "Nationalist" Egyptian I have ever met has once referred to the amazing developments of human genius which took place in Egypt between 10000 B. C. and 100 B. C., or has in any way identified himself with the glories of his country prior to the destructive invasion of the Arabs in the seventh century A. C.

If the Mohamedan Egyptians prefer to regard the Quran and the medieval elaboration of the Quran as the last word, the dominant and ultimate authority in law, science, sanitation, morals, and social economy, so long will Mohamedan teaching institutions be utterly futile in coping with the requirements of the twentieth century, and so long will Mohamedan peoples be unfitted to govern themselves and still less to govern more intelligent fellow-citizens of more enlightened faiths.

But it is in the proposal to revive Turkish militarism, to saddle the revenues of Egypt with the upkeep of an army of "300,000 to 400,000 men" and the creation and maintenance of a navy, that Mr. Fehmy Muhammad's letter reveals most clearly the discrepancy between the outlook of the Young Turk and the Egyptian "Nationalist" and that of advanced European statesmen. So long as the present British control lasts Egypt needs little more in the way of internal protective force than a good constabulary. The power of the British Navy and the efficiency of the British and the Indian Armies are sufficient guard against aggression from any outside direction; so that the mass of Egyptian manhood can devote its muscle and its energies to the fight with nature, to conquering the desert and the marsh, the rock and the mud, and to making Egypt ten times more productive and populous than in any previous period of her history. From out of this prosperity and increase there may slowly be built up once again a real Egyptian people, no longer miserable serfs under the brutalising tyranny of Arab, Turk, Kurd, Circassian, Armenian, or Levantine renegade; a people worthy of a Rameses for king, worthy to be the ally and no longer the ward of the British Empire.

H. H. JOHNSTON,

The Irrigation of Mesopotamia.

THE greater part of Lower Mesopotamia may be regarded as a gift made by the rivers Euphrates and Tigris to man; and thanks to the composition of the alluvium, which provides a soil of extraordinary fertility and richness, it is a gift of the highest value. To-day the great mud bar at the mouth of the Shatt-el-Arab bears witness that the rivers are still building up the land at the head of the Persian Gulf; they have never ceased from piling up the riches they have plundered from the Armenian mountains; but for many centuries man has been too busy, or too careless, to take advantage of the opportunities they have offered him. Lately, however, he has bestirred himself in the matter. East and West have taken counsel together. And with the opening of the Hilloh Barrage, last month, the reviviscence of Babylonia may be regarded as having begun.

The temptation to draw the strongest possible contrast between Past and Present is always a strong one; and by their free use of hyperbole the Assyriologists have perhaps invested the days of the Babylonian rulers with a false glamour and accustomed us to estimate that period of the country's prosperity by a distorted scale. The discoveries of the last twenty-five years enable us to see the facts in truer perspective, and to-day we can hardly accept as literally correct the description of the plain in old days as "one wide-stretching field of splendour and blooming gardens," which is how an enthusiast described it. In point of fact it would appear to have been a patchwork of cultivation and wilderness, just as it is to-day; but in the past there was more cultivation and less wilderness, while nowadays there is much—very much—more wilderness than cultivation.

Ancient inscriptions leave little room for doubt that in the past the cultivator was faced by the same problems as is his successor of to-day—how to get the water where it is wanted in the dry season, and how to keep it from finding its way where it can do nothing but harm in the season of flood. Thus, among the records unearthed by the American expedition on the staff of which I worked at Nippur—in the very heart of the country—were found official reports upon the “shutting off” of canals and the inundation of districts, and the destruction of cities by floods. Again, a tablet discovered at Abu Habba, by Professor Schiel, contains the complaint of an official who, being “stationed at Dur Sin, on the canal Bitimsikirim,” can find there no food that he can eat. This hardly seems to indicate a land of plenty, “one wide-stretching field,” etc. Finally, we have it on the authority of Sir William Willcocks that “never in the history of Mesopotamia has the whole of the country been under irrigation at one and the same time,” and that “the whole of the area of 5,000,000 hectares in the Delta is not capable of being irrigated at the same time.” The brightly coloured picture presented to us by the Assyriologists must, then, clearly be regarded with some scepticism. At the same time it is beyond question that both in Babylonian days and in the times of the Abbasside rule at Baghdad the country was in a very much more prosperous condition than it is now. The fields and gardens did undoubtedly exist in plenty in those times, and though the cultivated lands were not unbroken by patches of waste, they were very extensive, and capable of supporting a large population.

Such being the case, it appears almost incredible that the greater part of this fertile country should have been allowed to fall out of cultivation and to deteriorate into a wilderness in which the Bedawi wandered at will, grazing his flocks and herds where he pleased and pillaging his more industrious—or less adventurous!—brother who sought to follow an agricultural life of sorts at one or other of the small villages that lie on the banks of the rivers or the chief canals that have survived the silting-up process. Yet such was the state of the country when I knew it. In crossing the plain one saw long lines of mounds that marked the course of old canals, numerous other mounds, of varying size, that covered long-dead towns and cities; but save for Baghdad, Nejef, Kerbellah, Hilla, and Busrâh there were no towns of importance in all the district, and even villages were far scattered and pitifully poor. As a rule the Bedouin and the Ma'adan (half-settled) Arabs had things pretty much their own way; night was right; law and order ran only where the Vali of Baghdad felt himself safe in sending troops. The whole region was a wreck of its former greatness. And the trouble was nearly all due to the water, too much, or too little, as the case might be.

To do them justice, the Turkish governors saw this, though dimly; and from time to time they made efforts, feeble and erratic, to remedy the existing evils. Unfortunately, owing generally as much to lack of funds as to lack of thought, these efforts usually did more harm than good. An example of this is afforded by the case of the well-meant but, as the event proved, disastrous closing of the Saklawia by the too energetic and unlucky Midhat Pasha, and the subsequent tinkering with the Hindieh Barrage. Cynics declared that the Turk would “never make a job of it,” and it almost looked as if their cynicism would be justified.

It remained for the Young Turks to tackle the problem, which (with others, no less difficult) formed part of the legacy they took over from their predecessors. And the fact that they lost no time in grappling with it is infinitely to their credit. They set about it in the right way—calling in the best advice obtainable, and following it as far as their resources would permit them to do through times of extraordinary stress and difficulty. That they should have found the help they so urgently needed in this country is a point on which both they and we are to be congratulated—they because the advice that has been given them and the service they have been accorded have been as disinterested, as honest, and as skilled as they could possibly have obtained anywhere; we, because in helping them we have carried on a tradition of service in Mesopotamia which rests upon a very solid foundation indeed. The work on the Hindieh Barrage is the first step towards restoring Irak to prosperity. The work on the Habbaniya Escape will be the second. I should like to see the work of preventing the wastage of water on the Tigris (which constitutes such a serious difficulty to navigation) made the third. Beyond that one can hardly see at present. The work of providing Mesopotamia with a perfect system of irrigation is too vast to be undertaken all at once. The country must grow up to it gradually, the tract opened up by each new section being developed before other sections are put in hand. But it has been begun. Turkey has put her hand to it at last, with British help. I hope that Turkey and Britain together will see it through.

Valentine Geere, in the Near East.

The Opening of the Barrage.

(BY AN EYE-WITNESS)

Baghdad, December 31, 1918.

About forty-five years ago Midhat Pasha, the then Vali of Baghdad, closed the Saklawieh branch of the Euphrates in order to avoid floods which frequently inundated the district between Baghdad and Felooja. In doing so he did away with an escape for the flood water of the Euphrates and gave that river more water than it could carry. The original Euphrates divided into two at Hindieh, and the two branches were known as the Hilla Branch and the Hindieh Branch. The Hindieh Branch had the lowerlying bed, and the result was that most of the surplus water went down the Hindieh, and the higher (Hilla) branch gradually silted up. Some twenty-eight years ago the Turkish Government attempted to dam the mouth of the Hindieh Branch in order to raise the level of the river sufficiently to keep the Hilla Branch supplied with water at all seasons of the year. This Barrage was designed by Mr. Schoeneder, who commenced the construction of it. He was succeeded by Mr. Mougel, who in his turn was succeeded by Mr. Cugnin. The Barrage was built out into the river from both banks and it was intended to join the Barrage in the centre. As work proceeded and the distance between the two ends of the Barrage decreased the strength of the water increased, and the three above-mentioned engineers found it impossible to complete the Barrage.

In 1909 Sir William Willcocks was asked by the Turkish Government to close the opening in the centre of the Barrage. A Mr. Medlicot was put in charge of the work, and in 1910 he succeeded in the closing of the opening and thus increased the level of the water by two metres, which was sufficient to divert it down the Hilla Branch.

Sir W. Willcocks had grave doubts about the strength of the Barrage, and suggested to the Turkish Government that a new Barrage should be built about 800 metres above the site of the then existing Barrage, and that a canal should be dug above the proposed Barrage to take the water into the Hilla channel at a point some distance from its old mouth, which was very much silted up. This proposal was accepted by the Turkish Government, and the work was commenced and handed over to Sir John Jackson, Limited, in about March, 1911.

On December 12 the construction of the Barrage and the subsidiary works were completed, and Mohamed Fazel Pasha Daghistani performed the ceremony of the opening of the new Hilla Canal. The system followed in the carrying out of the work was as follows. The new Barrage was built on dry land on the left bank of the Euphrates River with a bed about one metre lower than the bed of the existing river.

The ground in front and behind the Barrage was dug out also to a depth of about 2 metres, below the existing river to a distance of about 500 metres in front of the Barrage and 400 below the Barrage so as to make a new river-bed. A thin strip of land was left between the new channel and the river.

When the construction of the Barrage was completed and the excavation work finished this strip of land was taken away both above and below the Barrage, and the water flowed into the new channel, which was one metre deeper than the old river. A large embankment was then constructed across the old channel so as to divert all the water into the new one. This embankment consisted of a number of large sausage-shaped rolls of mats and reeds measuring about 20 yards long by 9 feet high. These were rolled into the river one after the other and gradually packed up with brushwood until an embankment was formed. This embankment was then filled up with a large quantity of earthwork, and it is now about 20 metres wide and appears to be quite strong enough to prevent the river returning to its old bed.

While the excavations were going on at the Barrage the canal which connects the river above the Barrage with the old Hilla Branch was being dug. This canal has a width of 30 metres from the top of the banks, but shelves down to about 20 metres. At the head of this canal there is a regulator which consists of six doors of 5 metres each and one lock of 8 metres wide. When the works were completed some of the doors of the Barrage were closed, and the level of the water above the Barrage was gradually raised by manipulating the doors of the Barrage. When the level had been raised about one metre the water was allowed into the Hilla Canal, but at a distance of about 200 metres from the mouth of the canal a temporary earthen dam was erected.

When the Vali, his staff, and guests arrived at Hindieh on the evening of the 11th inst. they were provided with accommodation in the engineer's houses. About half-past nine in the morning a company of about eighty infantry and a troop of about fifty cavalry lined up near the house in which the Vali was staying.

There was a large marquee where the guests awaited the arrival of His Excellency. When he arrived he greeted the guests, and accompanied by the soldiers walked up to the temporary earthen dam on the Hilla River. Mr. Whitley, the manager of Messrs. Sir John Jackson, Limited, made a speech in which he intimated that the work of construction was now finished, and that he had pleasure in handing over the Barrage in working condition to His Excellency the Vali as the representative of the Turkish Government. Mr. Whitley mentioned the difficulties that had to be overcome by the Deftardar of Baghdad and the Minister of Public Works at Constantinople, and pointed out that the works had extended over a longer period of time than was anticipated owing to financial difficulties.

His Excellency the Vali replied in a short speech in which he expressed pleasure at having the honour of assisting at the inauguration of the first of a number of schemes for irrigation, which, when all completed, would bring Irak back to the position she had at one time held in the universe. A well-known Mullah said a prayer, and His Excellency the Vali was handed a spade, with which he took one or two spadefuls of earth out of the dam. The Kadi followed his example, and Mr. Whitley, also at the invitation of the Vali, removed a spadeful. The Arabs sacrificed some twenty sheep on the top of the dam, and after the carcasses had been removed about forty Arabs lined up and at a given signal commenced to dig away the dam. The Arabs entered into the spirit of the thing, and the water soon found its way through the dam. As soon as there was a fair amount of water on the lower side of the dam a number of Arab women dashed in and washed their faces in the hope that by so doing they might eventually be blessed with offspring. The whole scene was most picturesque, but owing to a heavy mist the photographs taken are not too clear.

After the ceremony Sir John Jackson, Limited, invited the Vali and his guests to a most excellent lunch, at which various speeches were made, including one by Mr. Edmond Bechara, the Chief Irrigation Engineer for the Turkish Government in Mesopotamia, who spoke in four different languages—Arabic, Turkish, English, and French. The most interesting item of his speech was the figure he gave as being the total cost of the Barrage, namely, £380,000, this figure including the expenses incurred by Sir William Willcocks while he was preparing his various schemes for the irrigation of Mesopotamia.

The water arrived at Hilla about thirty-eight hours after the opening ceremony, and we understand that there is now 1½ metres of water at Hilla, and that this level is maintained down to Diwanieh. The water, at its present level, enters the Hilla Canal at a depth of about 1'30 metres. This will gradually increase as the floods come down. It is very interesting to remark that the level of the Hindieh Branch has not been materially effected by the opening of the Hilla Canal. This is to be accounted for by the fact that the waters in the Hindieh are held up by the lake at Shenafieh.—The Near East.

Mr. Balfour on Theism.

The Plain Man's Picture of Philosophy.

Mr. Balfour delivered in Glasgow in Mail week his Gifford lectures. A special correspondent of the Times writes:—

The first lecture was introductory and expository. Mr. Balfour attempted to do no more than to indicate the topics to which he would devote the 20 lectures, 10 in two successive years, which are required by the Gifford trust. He spoke of the great problems which every man has to face, and he admitted the failure of philosophy to solve these problems to the general satisfaction. Hardly any man of science treats philosophy seriously, and the plain man feels that philosophy does not meet his difficulties or even look at them from the same point of view. The plain man's picture of philosophy was of men generally quarrelling in an unknown tongue. He himself had never been able to accept any of these great systems. He had none to offer, and he did not intend to devote much time to showing where he differed from those of others. At this point Mr. Balfour told his audience that his subject is to be Theism, and he felt it necessary to say at once that he could not be satisfied with the conclusion that from the very notion of experience the idea of God could be extracted by a logical process. "When I speak of God," he said, "it is not the absolute of which I am speaking. It is the God Whom a man may easily love and adore, not merely the end or conclusion of the logical process." Some critics might describe his statement as anthropomorphism, but he hoped to commit worse crimes than that in their eyes if modern man's idea of God was descended from ancient and corrupt myths, the very permanence of that was proof that it could not be ignored; and it was inadequate, but not untrue, to say that God takes sides, and works with Him. The plain man's conception for great ends and asks us to work of God and the philosophical conception must ultimately be brought into harmony and connexion.

THE ARGUMENTS FROM AND TO DESIGN.

Mr. Balfour began his second lecture by remarking that his view that beliefs can best be treated as reasonable in a theistic setting might seem to carry us not further than the argument from design, the drag of old-fashioned apologetics, and a discussion of that argument would form the preface to his lecture. If the argument from design was sound, what, he asked, could it prove? It could of finite creatures due solely to matter? But its reply to the question did not carry us very far for the mere belief that mind lies behind matter is compatible with the wildest heresies in the development of thought. Yet the idea of mind as existing behind matter is a big step towards natural theology, and there is force in design when we do not consider matter by itself and when the design we find is a design which has value for sentient beings. He believed that the heavens do declare the glory of God, but only if there are men and if there is a God, and he held with Bacon that if the universe is the result of blind chance the glory vanishes.

But this is an argument, not from design, but to design. The 'argument to design' became the key-note of the lecture. The two arguments are, Mr. Balfour insisted, vitally different, and he would have frequent occasion to refer to the latter, but he had still something to say about the former. The argument from design is from an adaptation to a contriver, it has force in dealing with organic life. Recent advance in biology has increased its force a thousand times. Why, then, do we not agree that we cannot be dealing with mere chance? The answer is that Darwin has shown that, given certain conditions, you could build up an infinite wealth of varied organic life. Natural selection shows a method by which design can be mimicked, given the premises of life and variation, and yet he thought that Kelvin's view still stands, that if we trace back the present distribution of energy into the past, we come to a time when our arguments fail us. There was a beginning of the physical universe as we know it, and we are approaching a time, not to be absolutely reached till after an infinite duration, in which there will be no more transformation of energy out of which work may be obtained. We have regular process before us, after which we can infer nothing. In the middle we have life, feeling, thought, the equations of which settle the relations of energy, and matter remained the same, but there were added the feeling of feeling beings and the thought of thinking beings. This fact of importance from the point of view of the argument from design, was, he said, still more important from the point of view argument to design, for it is reasonable to conclude that because matter cannot make will and reason, then will and reason must have made matter.

THE RATIONAL VALUES OF OUR BELIEFS.

Unless behind our reasoning there is ultimately a rational cause, behind our ethics a moral cause, and behind our belief in beauty, a belief in a God who cares for beauty then our scientific, our ethical, and our aesthetic beliefs all lose value to a degree which nobody can seriously contemplate. It might be asked, 'Cannot natural selection which can mimic design mimic also creative reason. This, said Mr. Balfour, is an important objection which he proposed to keep in view, but for some reason or another all things which have the greatest value for thought, for morality and for beauty seemed to him to have no survival value at all and they cannot be mimicked because they do not affect the survival of the fittest or the multiplication of the race.

Emotion and Belief.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Glasgow, Jan. 16.

Even a Glasgow fog had no appreciable effect upon the numbers who waited in the cold corridors outside the Bute Hall to-day to listen to Mr. Balfour's third Gifford lecture. They were rewarded by an address which excited in enthusiasm with which philosophical disquisitions are rarely received, and the cheers, which on Wednesday emanated from youthful anxiety to find a joke, came to-day in more suppressed volume from eager listeners glad to discover that a Gifford lecturer could defend what they themselves had the wish to believe.

Mr. Balfour began by referring to the classification of beliefs with which he concluded his last lecture. He had, he said, adopted that classification because of the varying degree to which emotions are associated with our beliefs. In aesthetics, with which he proposed to deal to-day, emotion absorbs almost the whole of the belief, for the sense of beauty is an emotion and its value lies, not in the judgments, but in the emotions associated with the judgments. In ethics judgments are of fundamental importance, yet the emotions or moral sentiments must be there also. In science emotion is the vanishing quantity: there is an emotional element, but it is of little value.

ORIGIN OF AESTHETIC EMOTION.

What, he proceeded to ask, are aesthetic emotions? And he described them as always existing in contemplation and never leading to action. He admitted, of course, that beautiful things might be used for practical ends, that the creative effort which produced the beautiful thing was not included in his definition, and the very act of contemplation itself requires much effort and preparation. But when a great artist had put a great effort of concentrated will into a great work of art, and when the observer had put himself into harmony with it, the result was not action but contemplation. It had been said that the essence of tragedy is that it "purifies by terror and pity." The pity," said Mr. Balfour, "does not suggest assistance: the terror does not prompt to fight. Nobody rushes to rescue Desdemona." How did these aesthetic beliefs, and the contemplative emotions associated with them, come into existence? Are they due to any process of natural selection? He believed, with regard to ethics and knowledge, up to a certain point the beliefs and the emotions connected with them are due, or may be plausibly attributed, to the general process of organic evolution. But he could find no such pedigree for the æsthetic emotions. They cannot be shown to have in any effective sense their root in the attributes bred into the race by the struggle for existence. Herbert Spencer had tried to contribute to the explanation of how we of the 19th or 20th century feel in the presence of a great work of art by saying that our ape-like ancestors howled in moments of emotion. The audience laughed, and Mr. Balfour told them that to ridicule Mr. Spencer was not his object. If Mr. Spencer could have shown in the anthropoid ape an element of musical appreciation, and traced its development into our elaborate appreciation of a symphony of Beethoven, he would have produced a causal connexion between the two. As it was, he had mistaken an historic account of origins for a theory of genesis, and the two were in this instance unconnected. From the naturalistic standpoint, Mr. Balfour insisted, the whole psychical complex of æsthetic emotions and beliefs is a chance by-product, a happy accident of evolution; and the geniuses themselves who produce works of art are equally accidental products, for poets and artists did not greatly contribute to the destruction of tribal enemies and the survival of the fittest. This view, he held, really destroyed the values of æsthetic beliefs. He did not refer to the minor manifestations of the æsthetic emotions, and he admitted that a cinematograph can be enjoyed without reference to cosmical theories.

THE SPIRITUAL INTUITION.

It is the æsthetic emotion in its highest manifestations that has most to lose from a purely naturalistic origin. The poet or the artist is generally supposed to have an insight into reality. The men who are most alive to the higher æsthetic emotions feel that their emotions open up something that contains an intuition greater than knowledge. There is always in a work of art the sense of communication from its creator. Behind the poem, the picture and the symphony are the poet, the painter, and the composer, and works of art must be communications from one spirit to another spirit. The most perfect kaleidoscope could never be a work of art or convey æsthetic emotion. Could they, he asked, accept this view for works of art and deny it for the manifestations of natural beauty, before which, he thought, the greatest works of art faded into insignificance? Were there two principles of æsthetic? Beauty moves upon the surface. Only what appears is beautiful. If we could perceive the æther and the scattered electrons which are the real facts, such insight would merely excite curiosity and wonder. We must regard the beauties of nature as signs, as symbols, as a language, just as we do chords and colours. The entire value of the glories of nature is lost unless we conceive behind nature one who has designed it. Art, he pointed out, clings obstinately to personification, in spite of the teachings of science. We live and move and have our being in available energy, but we cannot write an ode to it. Poetry clings to personification, not by the staying power of long tradition, nor by a feigned literary conceit, but because the naturalistic explanation is felt to be intolerable, in that it destroys æsthetic values. It is, of course, possible for a reader of Wordsworth to accept conventionally the notion of a God of nature, while he is reading Wordsworth, just as a man who does not believe in ghosts may read a ghost story with a conventional belief sufficient for his artistic purposes. But it is not possible to enjoy the best of Wordsworth as it should be enjoyed unless you take the same general view of the universe as Wordsworth did.

Mr. Balfour had now reached the culminating point of his argument, and he drove it home in some eloquent sentences. He argued that what is true of Wordsworth is true also of natural beauty, and he invited his hearers to recall the moments, too rare in any life, when the sight of some magnificent spectacle seems to drive out not merely all the smaller cares and anxieties of life, but all the smaller pre-occupations of art itself. At such moments it is true that a man has something better to do than to think of cosmogony. But, just as no pain is so severe but that it leaves a man some corner of consciousness in which to ask how long it will last, so there is no beauty, however overpowering, but allows of the thought that it means something and is not simply a matter of æther and electrons and brain and visual nerves. To persuade a man to attribute no such significance is to weaken fatally those æsthetic values which can only exist if, behind that great appearance, is a reality, and if it contains a message from spirit to spirit. If we desire to preserve those values, to argue to design from value, we can say that, unless men are willing to sacrifice the æsthetic emotion in its highest development and in its greatest examples, we must believe in a Great Spirit whose manifestations those things are.

Limitations of Natural Selection.

(FROM THE "TIMES" SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Glasgow, Jan. 19.

Mr. Balfour devoted his fourth Gifford lecture to demonstrating that our ethical ideas can retain their value only in a theistic setting. He began by admitting that natural selection has played a large part in the development of our ideas of right and wrong, for ethical values, unlike æsthetic values, do not hang loosely upon the evolutionary process, but are up to a certain point dependent upon it, while the æsthetic emotions lead only to contemplation. Ethics has essentially to do with action, and if there is any truth in the modern theory of evolution, it would be strange indeed if ethical beliefs and emo-

ALTRUISM IN MAN AND ANIMALS.

At this point Mr. Balfour introduced a distinction similar to that on which he based his argument regarding æsthetic values. The whole stress of his reasoning was laid upon the higher values in the ethical scale, and these higher values he defined as being those dependent upon the group of altruistic and unselfish feelings which operate for the interest of other individuals or of the family or of the State, or of mankind. How far, he asked, are our altruistic values the result of the mimicry of design by natural selection? How far can they retain their value if we refuse to put them in a theistic setting? Mr. Balfour began his answer to these questions by pointing out that we find no altruism in the lower organisms; only certain powers of reacting to environment for the benefit of the individual. There is no effort of the individual to serve the species other than instinctive efforts under the impulse of selective forces. Such instinctive efforts were not, indeed, the limits of the power of natural selection. Animals higher in the scale show parental, and especially maternal, love and sacrifice, and give examples of altruism in one of its purest shapes. We cannot, of course, say what goes on in the consciousness of the animal, but we cannot deny it something of true altruism marked by the higher qualities which we admire in the devotion and the self-sacrifice of men. This, however, did not amount to social instinct, for it did not outlast the early days or months after birth, and it did not help towards the social organization which is essential for human existence.

It is true that bees and ants give a resemblance to social organization, but each bee has only one desire—that of subserving the good of the whole hive. In the bee self is lost in the interest of the society, and the very mechanical perfection of these amazing societies impaired their interest. There can never be a conflict of impulse in the case of a working bee, never the problem of the self against the whole, or the more difficult problem of the divergent interests of two wholes to each of which the self belongs. Such conflicts we cannot avoid, because we have a choice of ends. Here Mr. Balfour explained that he used the word "whole" to mean such a collection of other individuals as a family, a town, a state, a profession. It is not simply a choice between self interest and one of those societies to which a man may well, and even a selfish man constantly does, sacrifice his interests, but it is a multiple choice, because the interests of these wholes come into collision. Mankind must have progress, not unchanging perfection. Loyalty to family or tribe is essential to progress, and it was essential to very early and primitive progress, and is therefore a direct product of the individual. The argument that it is folly because it involves a loss to the self-regarding instincts was an appeal from the later stages of evolution to the earlier.

EVOLUTION AND MORALS.

Coming to the central point of his argument, Mr. Balfour said that the essential point is the answer to the question whether, granting that selection has improved the altruistic feelings in their earlier stages, we can attribute the growth of morality and the higher ideals to the continued action of natural selection. The higher emotions, he argued, can have no effect upon the struggle for existence. Nobody could maintain that in that brute struggle the virtues of mercy, charity, and loving kindness are to the advantage of the race from the point of view of a biologist, who studies what it is that enables one organism to out another. For this view, the lecturer said, he could quote high authority. Nietzsche was perhaps the best known in this country by the references to superman made by a brilliant dramatic writer, but he had many disciples in his own country. Nietzsche held that the higher virtues are what he called denaturalized—that they have no place in the natural development of morals, and that they have only been made possible by religious beliefs. Mr. Balfour summoned him as a witness to his premises, not to his conclusions, because Nietzsche's conclusion was that the higher virtues are not merely express products, but even harmful products, of the biological process, and ought to be stamped out. His own conclusion was diametrically opposite, but he agreed that the higher virtues cannot retain values if they are to be judged simply as helping or hindering the internecine struggle for existence.

As another Witness Mr. Balfour quoted Huxley's Romanes lecture delivered in 1893. It was, he said, an impressive and a pathetic lecture, because, while Huxley accepted no form of religion and was an agnostic, and, indeed, the coiner of that convenient word, and while he took a purely naturalistic view of the universe, he felt, as Mr. Balfour himself felt, that the higher values cannot be hitched into the evolutionary process, to which he assigned everything around him and behind which he saw nothing but energy and matter. It was with the utmost diffidence that he differed from so eminent a biologist, but he thought Huxley went too far when he said that all that is ethically best is opposed to success in the cosmic struggle. In opposition to this unhappy conclusion stood maternal love, one of the highest things in the ethical scale, and still unsurpassed. He could not himself pass upon the evolutionary process the same heavy condemnation which was passed on it by that great man, who had done so much to make it intelligible to the world, but he asked how any one who takes Huxley's view even in a less extreme form could imagine that the higher scale of ethics is going to retain its value as a by-product or a dangerous product of evolution.

In an impressive passage Mr. Balfour then reminded his hearers nature." If the simple teaching of nature is that the higher virtues are useless and noxious, is not the teaching of Nietzsche an inevitable conclusion? Men will argue that if development and the course of progress must always be the result of constant internecine warfare, then they must pin their faith on the untrammelled licence of that struggle, and the return to nature would mean the abandonment of all the higher and tenderer virtues in which the value of life entirely depends for us.

THE RELIGIOUS FRAMEWORK.

In conclusion, Mr. Balfour referred to the efforts of philosophers and preachers to show that there is no real discrepancy between self-interest and altruism. Such efforts are not founded on past experience; they represent the ideal of a future reconciliation. Such an ideal has no meaning on a naturalistic basis, and we wish to keep and to improve their higher values. If we feel that progress in ethics has been as great as in knowledge and in the arts of life, we cannot rest content with the belief that ethics has now no survival value and no root in some higher moral purpose which, as the world goes on, will ever give it more and more meaning. "If," said the lecturer, "we are to keep the highest of all values in the scale where religion has placed them, and where we instinctively feel they ought to be, we cannot tear away that religious framework and suppose that the ideas remain." A theistic setting, he again insisted, is a necessity for ethics. The argument from design, he added, might show the ingenuity of the contrivance, but it required such an argument as he had been placing before them to add to the conception of a powerful and, if he might say so, an ingenious Deity, the conception of a God, the author of all that is beautiful and of all that is good.

The Paris Press.

(FROM THE "TIMES" CORRESPONDENT.)

Paris, Jan. 2.

To those who are accustomed to the aspect of English or American newspapers the Paris Press, including those journals which have adopted big headlines, seems at first sight quiet and unenterprising. This, however, is far from being the case, and it may be questioned for example whether there are half a dozen journals in the world that give such elaborate and up-to-date information on foreign affairs as does the Temps, which sometimes by half-past four in the afternoon produces with the aid of the telephone the greater part of a debate that has begun in the German Reichstag at 1 o'clock. The Temps is one of the few Paris journals which retains its old literary, philosophic, and scientific flavour, while keeping pace with modern demand for full and early news on all the events of the day. The Journal des Debats, with a considerably less elaborate news organization, likewise retains many of its old traditions, but there are a number of flourishing halfpenny journals. The Matin, the Journal, the Petit Parisien, and the Petit Journal, which relegate both literary form and party politics to a second place, and frankly devote themselves to purveying fresh and lively news.

The history of Parisian journalistic enterprise during the last 60 or 70 years reveals the fact that a great many innovations which are supposed to be English or American in origin originated in la ville lumiere. Take the great news agencies of the world; Havas is the father of them. The Agence Havas was founded about 1835 by an enterprising translator, M. Havas, who used to select the most interesting news from foreign journals and supply it to the Constitutionnel. He subsequently opened a little office in the Rue Jean-Jacques-Rousseau, and began to supply his foreign news to all the Paris newspapers, but his first great success was the establishment of a service of carrier-pigeons between Paris, London and Brussels. His pigeons left London at 8 A. M., and he got his news culled from the English Press at 2 P. M. From Brussels to Paris the pigeons only took four hours. M. Havas likewise was first in the field in the employment of railways and telegraphs for news purposes. The founder of Reuter's Agency, it is believed, came from his office, as did M. Wolff, who established the agency of that name in Berlin.

THE ORIGIN OF "LA PRESSE."

These and a great many more interesting details of Press development in Paris are given in a comprehensive article by M. Louis Latzarus, the first part of which is published in the current number of the Revue de Paris. M. Latzarus traces the editorial and business history of modern Paris journalism from what he describes as the decisive date of July 1, 1836, when de Girardin founded La Presse. Up to that date the Paris newspapers had been essentially organs of opinion, and addressed themselves exclusively to the well-to-do classes. The annual subscription was uniform and it was 80f. (£3 4s.). Louis Philippe's Prime Minister, de Villele, when proposing for revenue purposes to raise the newspaper postage, calculated that a journal with only 3,000 subscribers made a profit of £2,000 a year. At that time there were about a dozen daily papers in Paris which led a tranquil existence and realized what their proprietors regarded as a reasonable profit, ranging from the figure just mentioned. Here is de Villele's calculation of the cost of production for the Constitutionnel, with 20,000 subscribers. According to his calculation, the production of the first 1,000 copies cost annually just under £2,000 and that of the remaining 19,000 about £4,350. The total cost of production was thus about £6,350 a year. The stamp tax was six millionths of a penny, and the postage for the provincial sub-these two items together amounting to about £21,480. The total expenditure was thus about £27,800. The subscriptions produced £57,600, so that the net profit was about £30,000.

The Constitutionnel, however, challenged these figures in its own interest, and made out its profits to be only £14,000.

In any case, there was a great opportunity for a newspaper which would appeal to a wider circle of readers, and de Girardin seized it. He founded La Presse, and reduced the subscription by half—to £1 12s.—calculating that with 10,000 subscribers he would lose £8,000 a year, but counting upon making good his loss and securing a handsome profit from advertisements. He soon had 10,000 subscribers then 20,000, and ultimately 25,000. The paper, instead of expressing political views of its own, invited contributions from all political camps. It introduced the feuilleton and the column of daily gossip, and it had among its contributors Balzac and Victor Hugo. There were scientific, agricultural, and industrial reviews, and general articles on various aspects of life in foreign countries. The modern journal was thus established.

The later development, after the Presse had been freed from the stamp duty and also from the censorship during the Second Empire, is marked by the foundation of the halfpenny Press in the form of the Petit Journal in 1863, a paper containing such petty news touching all sides of practical life and giving no place to polemics or even discussion. The Petit Parisien followed on the same lines, and these two papers soon ran neck and neck with a circulation of over 500,000—"records" in the period between 1880 and 1900. Here is M. Latzarus's explanation of their success:—

These two papers are intended for the mass of the people—peasants, workmen, and petites gens. They give these classes exactly what they want—a popular, easily-read article on some incident of the day, a sentimental feuilleton, a full and moving account of all the dramas of the police-court, reports of the proceedings in the two Chambers without comment, and very little foreign news. The assassination of a dairymaid has more chance of interesting readers than a Speech from the Throne.

CIRCULATIONS TO-DAY.

The Matin, somnolent when it was bought by M. Poidatz in 1898, soon adopted a still more ambitious programme, and became a six-page paper. In three years it attained a circulation of nearly 286,000. M. Poidatz then thought that it had its utmost development and parted with it, but he was mistaken, as the Matin has altogether increased its circulation by 1,000 per cent. In Paris the circulation of newspapers, in addition to their own calculation, forms the subject of police statistics. The Matin produces good evidence that its average and normal circulation is a million copies; the Prefecture of police says 640,000 copies. Similarly for the Journal, the police estimate is 997,000, but M. Latzarus has "sure information" that its circulation is over 1,200,000. In the case of the Petit Parisien, the two estimates are 1,090,000 copies and 1,550,000. There are now 65 daily so-called political newspapers published in Paris, and it is calculated that their total circulation is six million copies a day, of which no fewer than 4½ millions are accounted for by the Petit Parisien, the Journal, the Matin, and the Petit Journal. Among the remaining 62 papers there are 25 which have only the appearance of life. Some of them do not issue more than 200 or 300 copies, and there are others which have only an issue of 100, 50, or even 25 copies.

"They have neither an office," M. Latzarus says, "nor a staff nor readers." They have only a name, which may once have been famous, and it is mysteriously added:—"To issue a dead journal is nevertheless a fairly profitable occupation." The method of making it so is not explained.

The great journals which cost more than a halfpenny, the Temps and the Figaro in particular, do not require a circulation counted by hundreds of thousands in order to pay. The class of readers to whom they appeal makes them most potent mediums for advertisers. Many of the smaller journals live upon the Temps in respect of their information, as it has a splendidly organized news service both at home and abroad, besides its special scientific and literary articles by eminent writers, who place their pens at its service. M. Latzarus considers that there are only three Paris halfpenny journals which have a permanent organization that renders them independent of the Temps news. These are the Petit Parisien, the Petit Journal, and the Matin. The Petit Parisien publishes six and sometimes seven editions a day, of which five are dispatched to the provinces, the first at 6 p. m., and the fifth at 11 p. m.; the Paris and the suburban editions appear at 2.30 a. m. and at 4 a. m. The Matin contents itself with publishing a special edition whenever there is any piece of news of quite first rate importance. The Petit Parisien and the Petit Journal require to have an editorial staff at work all day, in addition to their night staff.

There is a great deal of further interesting and detailed information in M. Latzarus's article. He shows, for example, how the Petit Parisien was the first halfpenny paper to devote systematic attention to labour movements and trade unionism. Its halfpenny contemporaries soon had to follow its example as their circulation increased and an ever-growing proportion of their readers belonged to the working classes. He traces the development of newspaper photography, which was begun by M. Poidatz, of the Matin, in 1903. That paper can now produce a sine cliché ready to be inserted in the form in 82 minutes. The methods of the newspaper photographer as well as of

Make Hosiery at Home & Earn More Money.

As much as Rs. 60
per mensem can be earned regularly by making hosiery for us.

No experience is necessary. Men, Women,
Boys and Girls, all can make themselves earning units in their family. No lengthy tuition—No Premiums—
No monthly Fees to pay—Just the small price of a DURBAR
AUTO-KNITTER and you become a worker and wage earner at once.

Another Million Workers WANTED

We have at present millions of workers, all over the world, all busy—very busy, supplying us with socks, stockings, etc., but they are not sufficient. We cannot meet the great demand for hosiery made on our DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS—We want a MILLION MORE—We WANT YOU. Write for full particulars TO-DAY.

Read what a worker says:—

DEAR SIR,—I beg to inform you that I have sent you two paid parcels, one on the 14th instant and the other to-day, containing half a dozen pair of Gent's Socks each and request that you will be kind enough to return me the quantity of wool consumed in them and pay my usual wages at an early date. Thanks very much for the nice little machine you sent me, and it runs so smoothly that I can be able to knit daily half-a-dozen pair of Gent's Socks and when speeds comes a few more pairs can easily be knitted. Wishing you every success.

Puri, 16th August 1918.

I am, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,

(Sd.) Mrs. N. PEDDING.

Genz. Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS, 11-2 Lindsay Street,
Department No. 36, CALCUTTA.

RULING BY MACHINE

LEDGERS AND CASH BOOKS SUPPLIED

BINDING UNDERTAKEN

DIE STAMPING NEATLY DONE

MONOGRAMS ENGRAVED

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED

TRIAL ORDER SOLICITED.

THE COMRADE PRESS, DELHI.

THE

“JEUNE TURC”

An Ottoman Daily Journal.

Address:—CONSTANTINOPLE, PLACE DU TAXIM No. 8.

The Jeune Turc is the organ of the modern life of New Turkey.

The Jeune Turc gives the most exact and early information about the Political, Economical and Social life of the Ottoman Empire and of the Balkan States.

The Jeune Turc publishes Political, Literary and Economical articles on all questions connected with the New East and teems with humorous literature palpitating with Political life.

Whoever wants to keep himself well informed about whatever passes in Turkey and the Balkan States ought to subscribe

FOR THE

“JEUNE TURC”

A paper, having the greatest circulation in the East.

Subscription for Foreign Countries:

For a year Rs. 24/- For 6 months Rs. 15/- & for 3 months Rs. 7/6

EVER SINCE INVITED.

"LEUCODERMA" Specific is the only cure for WHITE LEPROSY". Numerous testimonials from all parts of India. For particulars apply—

B. N. DIXIT, 69, Shanwar, Poona.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhez necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

25 Years Ago

was founded the business of Uberoi, Ltd., Sialkot, which to-day is the largest Athletic Manufactory in the East. The accumulated experience of these years plus the knowledge of English Experts is embodied in all our products and is at the disposal of all interested in games of any description. A copy of our catalogue—free for the asking—will show that quality for price we offer the best value obtainable.

The Delhi Academy of Architecture.
BENARSI MANSIONS,
CHANDNI CHOWK.

For imparting up-to-date training in Architecture and Building Construction on Western lines.

Apply to:—
THE PRINCIPAL

A Turkish ex-official of high standing who is now established both in Constantinople and London desires to undertake any important business for export and import especially in minerals; Best references.

Address:—

MAHMOND BEY,

London Chamber of Commerce,
LONDON, E. C.

The Best Companion of Women!

After forty years practical experience and on the principles of modern science, I have with great labour compiled two books, viz. :—

Sehatun-Nisa, which treats of the ordinary complaints and serious complications of married and unmarried women; and

Mohafizus Sibyan, which treats of the ailments akin to children, with easily obtainable prescriptions for each and every case and rock-bottom principles of hygiene and sanitation; about which Lt.-Col. Z. Ahmed, I.M.S., (Retired), writes that these books ought to be in every household and H. H. the Begum Sahiba of Bhopal having approved of them brought a large number. For the benefit of my sisters at large I have reduced the prices for two months—

	Actual Price.	Reduced Price.
	Rs. a. p.	Rs. a. p.
Sehatun-Nisa	1 10 0	0 12 0
Mohafizus Sibyan	2 8 0	1 0 0
Urdu Medical Jurisprudence with Illustrations	2 8 0	1 0 0

To be had from:—

Dr. SYED AZIZUDDIN,

Medical Officer, Dujana State,
P. O. Beri (Rohtak).

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper, Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

For Stationery write to—

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

From Agony to Health.

How sufferers from RHEUMATISM, LUMBAGO, SCIATICA and all similar pains may find speedy, welcome relief, and certain cure through

KEPHALDOL.

At last the victims of these torturing complaints—men and women whose lives are long-drawn-out agony—may look with hope, confidence, certainty, to pain's most glad departure.

In Kephaldol is offered, for the first time, a remedy which not only has medical endorsement for its efficacy in all cases of Rheumatism, Lumbago, and Sciatica, but is also guaranteed to be a perfectly safe pain-reliever, containing nothing to injure the heart or any other bodily organ.

Kephaldol brings, indeed untold blessing to pain wrecked humanity; joy of perfect life again to those who, perhaps for many years have dragged through a tormented existence. Kephaldol is prescribed and praised by doctors.

Kephaldol leaves no after depression, or bad effects on the heart, or ears, as quinine, and all similar preparations do. It can be taken regularly without losing its effects. Never be without Kephaldol, as its constant use guarantees your health.

Kephaldol may be obtained from all Chemists and Stores throughout India in two size. In case of difficulty in procuring locally write us, and one tube, large or small, will be sent at Rs. 2-4 or Re. 1 respectively, on receipt of a money-order, or per V.P.P.

Complete directions in English and Vernacular languages are supplied with each package.

Kephaldol, Ltd., 15, Elphinston Circle,
BOMBAY.

WANTED.

An English-knowing Mohamedan experienced Head Clerk for the Office of the All-India Muslim League from 1st April. Only those who know accounts, type-writing and short-hand need apply with testimonials to the undersigned. Salary Rs. 50—70 per mensem.

An experienced Mohamedan typist for the said Office from 1st April. One acquainted with short-hand is preferred. Salary Rs. 25—30.

Mohammad Yusuf Khan,
Assistant Secretary,
All-India Muslim League, Lucknow.

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HEREKE, CONSTANTINOPLE

Turkish Fezes made in Turkey

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpacks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

Benarsi Mansions, Delhi.

11-5-14
Sole-Agents for India
for Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople.

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 7.
No. 9.

Single Copy
Annas 4.

Delhi: Saturday, February 28, 1914.

Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page.		Page.
THE	... 169	SNEHALATA'S MARTYRDOM	... 178
OUR LONDON LETTER	... 171	THE LAHORE MEDICAL COLLEGE	... 178
FROM A TETE—		STRIKE	... 178
The trouble at the Medical		THE LAPSE OF MR. LOVAT	... 179
College, Lahore	... 172	FRANKER	... 179
The Students' Grievances	... 172	JOURNALISM AS A CAREER FOR
The Attitude of the Principal...	173	INDIAN YOUTHS	... 179
The Resolution of the London		WARM GIRLS	... 181
Hospital Students	... 173	THE OTTOMAN ASSOCIATION	... 181
India in England	... 173	Memorial to Sir E. Grey	... 181
"Food Capsules of Thought..."	174	Islam	... 182
Snehalata's Martyrdom	... 174	RUSSIA AND ARMENIA	... 182
LEADING ARTICLE—		THE PROBLEM OF ASIATIC	... 182
The Press Act—VII	... 175	TURKEY	... 182
Education of Mussalmans	... 176	INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA	... 185
		ADVERTISEMENTS	... 186—188

The Week.

Frontier Outrage.

(FROM THE ENGLISHMAN'S SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Peshawar, Feb. 19.

A report has come in that the Sussex Regiment now under canvas at Jelasai, on manoeuvres, were fired on by a band of men said to be two hundred who are known to have been in that neighbourhood some weeks.

Army bearers have been sent out in case of eventualities and artillery horses are kept in lines, pending orders.

Nothing authentic is known as to casualties, but the Cantonment is practically on the quatre vive.

On Monday night raiders attacked the west abutment of Attock Bridge. The police resisted wounding some raiders. After a fusillade of some hours the raiders retired.

Noushera, Feb. 23, 7 a.m.

The greatest excitement prevails here and at Peshawar and all kinds of rumours are afloat regarding a pending expedition. Nearly all the troops in Noushera have marched for Hoti Mardan where a whole Brigade is now encamped. The official explanation is that the troops are engaged in manoeuvres. It may be remembered that the same explanation was offered in 1908 prior to General Willcock's raid into the Zakkha Khel country. Colonels Murray and Roddy, Supply and Transport Corps, have arrived here from Peshawar to superintend their department. Additional troops have been ordered to hold themselves in readiness at Peshawar, including two companies of the 14th Sikhs, who are under orders to move to Hoti Mardan when required.

I am informed that no general advance will be made till Friday. The opinion is that the troops are off to wipe out the tribal raiders, but cannot advance till the sanction of the Home authorities to the move has been obtained.

The roads are bad for mobile columns.

Aegean Problem.

London, Feb. 16.

The replies of Turkey and Greece regarding the Aegean Islands, each making reservations, leave the situation much what it was prior to the presentation of the Notes. The Porte's reply is somewhat strongly worded, and expresses keen regret that the Powers have not taken into consideration the vital interest of the Turkish Empire.

Greece and Turkey.

London, Feb. 16.

A telegram from Athens states that M. Venizelos has returned from his European tour and has told the Cabinet that the close understanding between Greece, Rumania and Serbia has secured the maintenance of the status quo in the Balkans and has rendered complications between Turkey and Greece impossible. The Greece Cabinet to-day discussed various matters, including the immediate strengthening of the Navy.

Turkey.

London, Feb. 16.

The Ottoman Bank Public Debt and the Tobacco Regie have advanced the Porte £400,000 to pay one month's salary to officials in Constantinople which are three months in arrear, excluding the salary for December which has been abandoned to help the increase in the Navy.

Constantinople, Feb. 16.

An Infantry Captain, Djemal Eddin Bidhri, has been sentenced to death and his property confiscated on a charge of attempted revolution and participation in the assassination of Mahmud Shekhet Pasha.

London, Feb. 16.

Colonel Aziz Ali Bey, the distinguished Egyptian Arab officer who revived Arab resistance in Cyrenaica after the departure of Enver Bey, has been arrested in Constantinople on arriving from Egypt. He will be court-martialled, being suspected of belonging to the Arab Political Association, the object of which is to undermine the authority of the Committee of Union and Progress. The greatest indignation prevails in Cairo where the arrest is attributed to Enver Pasha's jealousy.

Constantinople, Feb. 23.

Lieutenant Kemal has been court-martialled for deserting his post at Janina, and furnishing the enemy with plans of the forts. He was shot this morning.

Servia and Bulgaria.

Belgrade, Feb. 18.

King Peter to-day received in audience M. Tchappachicoff, Bulgarian Minister, in the presence of the Premier and Foreign Minister. Speeches were made referring to the benefits resulting from the renewal of diplomatic relations.

Greece and the Powers.

Athens, Feb. 22.

The reply of Greece to the Powers was presented yesterday. It declares that Greece is ready to conform to the decision of the Powers. It assumes that the Powers will decide that islands which they do not allow to be fortified will never be the object of attack, and agrees to evacuate the territories assigned to Albania within the time fixed. It also undertakes not to encourage resistance to the decisions of the Powers, but urges the incorporation in Greece of certain villages in the Argrocastra Valley, for which Greece is prepared to pay Albania 2½ million francs and accept modification of the frontier extending from the Albanian coast to Cape Paganis.

Greece thanks the Powers for an equitable solution of the question of the islands, and assumes that Turkey will not be allowed to fortify the coasts opposite the unfortified islands. Greece is prepared to give Turkey guarantees on this point and will also effectively prevent smuggling between the islands and the mainland. Greece will likewise guarantee protection for Mussulman minorities in Greek islands, and hopes that the Powers will demand a similar guarantee for the religious and educational liberties of Greeks in Imbros and Tenedos.

Albania.

London, Feb. 16.

The Prince of Wied will visit London to pay his respects to the King, and to confer with Sir Edward Grey, prior to leaving for Albania.

London, Feb. 18.

Prince William of Wied lunched with the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace, and conferred with Sir Edward Grey. He also visited various ambassadors. The Prince of Wied has been invested with the G. C. V. O.

London, Feb. 21.

Prince William of Wied has received the Albanian deputation and formally accepted the throne of Albania.

Newspier, Feb. 22.

The Prince of Wied was ceremoniously received to-day by an Albanian deputation led by Essal Pasha, who said that the deputation, on behalf of Albania, asked the Prince to accept the throne of free and independent Albania. The Prince replied that he would devote himself with heart and might to his new country, and hoped, with the support of the Albanians, to lead Albania to a glorious future.

Berlin, Feb. 22.

The Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung announces that the Prince of Wied will visit Petersburg on the 26th instant, and meet the Tsar and Russian statesmen.

Bagdad Railway.

London, Feb. 16.

The French and German Governments will now deal directly regarding certain details of the agreement on the Turkish Railway, and financial questions which will not take effect until both came to an understanding with Turkey.

The Berlin correspondent of the Times adds that the next steps will doubtless be the completion of the already practically perfect agreements between Britain, Germany and Turkey regarding the Bagdad Railway and the Gulf, and the early arrangement of a Turkish loan in Paris with Djavid Bey. The ostensible object of the agreement is to prevent all further disputes about rival railway rights and claims. The real effect will doubtless be to settle the whole railway map of Asia Minor, establishing Russian and French claims in the north and French claims throughout Syria, leaving Germany free from all possible interference over the whole Bagdad Railway sphere of action, including various northern branches, but precluding access to the Black Sea.

Persia.

Teheran, Feb. 18.

Fighting with the Baluch raiders ceased this morning when the Gendarmes returned to Bam owing to insufficiency of ammunition. It is hoped that it will be possible to obtain reinforcements from Kerman.

It is stated officially that the Russian troops at Kazvin will begin to leave in April, and it is explained that the new force recently landed at Enzeli was to replace troops whose time had expired.

Arnold Appeal.

London, Feb. 16.

The appeal of Mr. Channing Arnold against his conviction for libelling a Magistrate in Burma in 1912 was before the Privy Council to-day.

Sir Robert Finlay, opening on behalf of Mr. Arnold, reviewed the case at length. He had not concluded when the Court adjourned.

London, Feb. 18.

The hearing of the appeal of Mr. Channing Arnold was resumed before the Privy Council to-day. Sir Robert Finlay argued at some length that the Magistrate should not have ignored the petitions against his hearing the original case as he was a friend of the accused, McCormick. Mr. Andrew should have held his hand until the Chief Court had disposed of the application that another Magistrate should hear the case. Sir Robert Finlay maintained that Mr. Arnold had acted in good faith.

Indians in Africa.

Capetown, Feb. 19.

The Rev. C. Andrews will sail for England on the 21st instant. He has paid a farewell visit to General Botha and General Smuts on behalf of the Union Government, they both warmly thanked Mr. Andrews for the services he has rendered towards a peaceful solution of the Indian question. General Smuts assured Mr. Andrews of his sincere desire and hope for a speedy settlement, which he would do all in his power to realise.

Allahabad, Feb. 20.

It is expected that the South African Commission of Enquiry into the matters connected with Indians in the Union will reassemble on the 23rd instant and be able to finish their report early in March. Thereafter it will have to be considered by the Union Government.

Posts and Telegraphs,

(FROM THE ENGLISHMAN'S OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

Delhi, Feb. 21.

Information has been received that the scheme for the amalgamation of the Post Office and Telegraph Department has been sanctioned by the Secretary of State. This scheme has been prepared on the lines of the experimental amalgamation under trial in Bombay and Central Circles since 1912, which involves a complete separation of the engineering and traffic duties. The Director-General of Posts and Telegraphs will be assisted at headquarters by a Chief Engineer and a Deputy Director-General for telegraph traffic. All traffic work, throughout the country will be transferred to the control of the Postmasters-General. For engineering purposes India, excluding Burma, will be divided into three administrative charges, controlled by Directors of Telegraph Engineering, who will be responsible for all technical and engineering work. In Burma the Post Office and Telegraph Department will be placed under the control of a Postmaster-General, who will be a senior Telegraph Officer. The scheme involves a considerable reduction in the sanctioned number of superior Engineering appointments in the Telegraph Department. Adequate measures have, however, been taken to safeguard the interests of all officers now in the service. An offer of special pensions will be made to a certain number of these, but the scheme will not involve any compulsory retirements. A new branch called the Superior Traffic Branch, comprising forty appointments on liberal rates of pay will be created and it will be recruited mainly from the subordinate staff as the existing surplus of superior officers is reduced. One-fourth of the superior engineering appointments made in future will also be open to the subordinate staff. The scheme will be introduced from the 1st April next, or as soon after as possible. Full details will be published later.

Press Act.

London, Feb. 24.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Morrell asked questions with reference to the right of appeal to civil courts, under the Press Act and quoted the Chief Justice of Bengal as saying that the task imposed on the applicant to courts who must show that his pamphlet did not contain words falling within the all-comprehensive provisions of the Act was almost a hopeless one. Mr. Roberts said that Mr. Morrell was extending to all actions taken under the Act certain remarks regarding the action taken under section 12. Lord Crewe, after careful consideration of the recent debate in the Viceroy's Council held that the powers of appeal provided by the Act might suffice to supply a remedy against an arbitrary administration of the Act. Mr. Morrell asked whether Lord Crewe would direct further enquiry into the forfeiture of the Lahore daily paper Zemindar.

Mr. Roberts replied that Lord Crewe had seen the articles which had led to the forfeiture of the paper. The Editor was entitled to appeal to the High Court. Lord Crewe would await the result of any such action before considering the matter further.

South Africa.

Cape Town, Feb. 23.

The Rev. Mr. Andrews, in a letter to the "Cape Times" on the eve of his departure, warmly acknowledges the generosity with which he has been treated in South Africa. He expresses the opinion that the atmosphere with regard to the Indian question has wonderfully improved since the beginning of the year. He says that Mr. Gandhi's chivalrous attitude during the January strike and General Smuts' great consideration at a time of overwhelming pressure, brought about a very conciliatory and reasonable spirit, which was needed. Mr. Andrews suggests that a minor measure of relief might be introduced in Parliament during the present session. An indicating that if outstanding questions were arranged the settlement would be final, he states that the moment that a settlement has been reached Mr. Gandhi will depart for India. The main points are the £8 tax, with regard to which Mr. Andrews anticipates no difficulty, and the marriage question, in connection with which he says that they have still sufficient faith in the omniscience of lawyers to be certain that they will find a phrase to meet the situation. The only rock ahead is on the side of the Mohamedans. "Let there be no compulsion in religion," is one of the most admirable precepts of the Koran, Mr. Andrews points out. If the Union Government legalises and registers one marriage, and one only, there will be no objection made, but if the State goes beyond and attacks, or appears to attack the Mohamedan religion itself, there will be endless trouble and endless misunderstanding.

The Indian Commission resumed the hearing of the evidence to-day.

The President of the Cape British Indian Union complained about the Immigration Department interpreters and accused them of extortion. He further expressed the opinion that Parliament should legalise polygamy, stating that only about seven per cent. of the Indians had more than one wife.

Three-Pound Tax.

Capetown, Feb. 24.

Before the commission to enquire into the grievances of Indians to-day, Mr. Meyler, member of the Assembly, and Senators Churchill, Winter, and Johnstone gave evidence in connection with the Three-Pound Tax. Mr. Meyler and Mr. Churchill favoured the repeal of the tax, but Mr. Winter and Mr. Johnstone its retention.

Cost of Delhi.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

London, Feb. 23.

In the House of Commons in reply to Sir Charles Hunter, Mr. Charles Roberts, the new Under-Secretary for India, said that according to the estimates of engineers and architects which the Government of India was now examining, the outlay on all Government buildings in Delhi would amount to £2,800,000.

Delhi, Feb. 24.

With reference to the statement made in the House of Commons regarding the cost of new Delhi by Mr. Charles Roberts, no information is available here regarding the Government of India buildings which the estimate of £2,800,000 is supposed to cover.

Apparently the orders have been given that no information of any kind is to be given to the public, as all the authorities concerned with the construction of New Delhi practically decline to answer any queries, and questioners are referred to the recent answer given to a question in the Legislative Council by Sir Robert Carlyle.

March of the "Guides."

Delhi, Feb. 23.

In consequence of two serious raids recently committed by Bunerwals in British territory, the first on 4th January at Balagardhi and the second on 6th January at Chena, near Rastam, in which altogether eight British subjects were murdered, it was decided to move the Malakand moveable column to-day over the Malandri Pass into Bunar, with a view to rounding up two of the villages most concerned, viz., Nawa Kili and Langi Khan Banda, a distance of a few miles from the frontier and taking hostages and moveable property as security for the due settlement of these cases. At 8.15 this morning the Malandri Pass was occupied by the Guides after slight opposition. The troops had a tiring night march and the country beyond was enveloped in mist when they reached the top. The troops succeeded in taking the villages and in securing a number of prisoners. No casualties have been reported on our side and the column is on its way back.

Our London Letter.

London, 6th Feb. 1914.

"THE PROBLEM OF ASIATIC TURKEY."

This month's number of the Contemporary Review contains a very interesting article on the above subject by Mr. M. Philips Price, which is not only characterised by perfect reasonableness of attitude, but is equally saturated with a degree of impartiality which is seldom witnessed in most of the communications on this and kindred subjects, which have been rather frequently appearing in the numerous monthlies, quarterlies, and other periodicals of late. It is a curious fact that writers, who usually deal with the Near East, the Middle East and, as a matter of fact, the Oriental questions in general, are broadly speaking, either so heavily steeped in their hatred and prejudice for the Orientals or, on the contrary, are so excessively sympathetic towards the peoples of the East that, on carefully perusing their articles, one cannot sometimes help feeling that their authors have unconsciously been carried away by their sentiments, one way or the other, occasionally even at the risk of sacrificing deep conviction and honest opinion. For the ordinary reader, in such cases, nothing will be more difficult than to succeed in arriving at a reasonable decision.

It is therefore, with particular pleasure that those who are in any way interested in the question of Asiatic Turkey will welcome

Mr. Philips Price's article on the subject. The authoritative personality of the writer and the breadth of view which so forcibly tinges his remarks, added to which is an extraordinary amount of local knowledge and absolute fairness, will undoubtedly proceed far in dispelling the deep-rooted ideas, which are held in certain quarters as regards the so-called Armenian question, with which Mr. Price deals in his article with such lucidity and impartiality.

A more clear statement of facts concerning the re-occupation of the sacred city of Adrianople has never been made before. That step was absolutely imperative for the very existence of European Turkey, and whether it was in accordance with or against the terms of the Treaty of London, had to be taken under the circumstances, and so no reasonable critic could find faults with the Turks for having taken the right step at the right moment. We need not here enter into the vexed question whether the Turks are the only people in modern times, who have not fully observed the terms of a Treaty!

Mr. Price's words on the Armenian aspect of the question are full of significance and should be read carefully. He goes fully into the various modes and methods in which the Armenians are rendering themselves a 'general nuisance' to the authorities.

The writer quotes a happy little instance in which he found the Armenians and Turks assembled under a common roof—this happened on every Sunday—for religious purposes, when perfect harmony and good-will prevailed between the followers of Christianity and Islam, and goes on thus: "All of us, whether Christian or Mohamedan, were worshipping at the same shrine, and whatever may be said against Islam, this incident is enough to prove that there is no other religion which shows more tolerance for the rights and customs of other faiths." Incidentally, what a magnificent and generous tribute to the tolerance of Islam is so truly embodied in these simple yet charming words of Mr. Philips Price!

"Such," the writer goes on, "is the paradox of Eastern life. But no one who visits Lesser Armenia can say that the Armenians are crushed under the heel of a tyrannous Turk. In Zeitun at least, it is the other way." The writer recommends as a remedial measure the employment of European advisers, from the neutral States, to help the Turkish authorities in the solution of this problem, which alone would, according to him, render the administration of this part of the Turkish Empire successful. But he is emphatic on the question of "retention" of Turkish control over Armenia, for the sole benefit of the Armenians themselves, if not for any other reason. With that view it is difficult for any fair-minded person to disagree.

"LIFE IN THE HAREM."

Your lady-readers may perhaps be interested to know that, under the above heading, a series of articles, from the pen of an English woman, Grace Ellison, have recently appeared in the Daily Telegraph, which has been giving an unusual prominence to the communications. It is satisfactory to note that on the whole the tone of the articles has been friendly and the writer has certainly rendered a useful service to her Turkish sisters by removing the deplorable impressions which unfortunately exist in Europe concerning the "harem" and Moslem women. Grace Ellison has been in close touch with some of the best families in Turkey, with whom she is on terms of intimate friendship, and so she can speak with an authority seldom possessed by the thousand and one European women, who have in the past attempted to write on this important subject from "personal experience."

"The Turkish woman," says Grace Ellison, "does not often open the doors of her home to the foreigner, not for lack of any friendly feeling towards her, but because the foreigner has lost her confidence, the foreigner has made fun of her, and, above all, the foreigner 'pities' her. But when the Turkish woman opens her door to the foreigner, she opens her big, generous heart too. Always and always, however intimate may be their conversations, the honoured guest stands on a pedestal, and the generous hostess is at her feet, longing only for an opportunity of showing courtesy and kindness. In no other land have I met such a lavish hospitality—hospitality even that makes one feel a little uncomfortable, especially when one realizes how little one has done to deserve it. The courtesy also is almost overwhelming. Every time I go in and out of the room the assembled company, men and women, stand, and every time coffee, cigarettes and sweets are brought by the slaves for the guests, my hostess rises to serve me herself. It is the custom, too, for the master of the house to pay all the visitors' bills. That I should have proposed to stamp my own letters hurt my friends more than anything I could have said or done. I feel almost guilty when I accept all and give nothing in return, and always I have before me the haunting fear of the terrible disappointment my friend will have when she visits my country, for our hospitality cannot be compared in any way to this."

The writer goes on "But cleanliness, as every one knows, is godliness itself in the Moslem religion."

The Minister of the Interior, Talaat Bey, a man of surprising energy with a clear understanding of men and things, a real God-send to this country in its present state, encourages any work for the advancement of women, and he is paying particular attention to their education. The dawn is coming slowly; but it will come if the Turkish woman really wishes it and works always with that aim before her—the uplifting of her sex.

Every time coffee is served—and coffee is offered to every visitor—I take a cup, it gives me a better chance of studying the curious scene in which I am playing a part, and the more I look, the more beautiful it seems to me, and it makes me almost sad to think I cannot meet with this spirit of democracy in any other land. But the most beautiful part of it all is the absolute 'naturalness' of the situation. The rich woman has not the patronising attitude of the Western woman towards her humble sisters, the poor woman has not the cringing gratitude of the West for favours received; each knows her part, each is fulfilling her destiny, each is content with her lot."

WESTERN MISCONCEPTIONS.

Grace Ellison's own words, in her noble attempt to remove the sad misconceptions prevailing in Europe as regards Turkey and the Turks, are precise and full of significance. "I do not swear" she writes, "by everything Turkish, much as I love the Turks. They have their faults; which nation has not its faults? But as a woman, who has led the life of a Turkish woman, surely I am privileged to point out to the reader the most beautiful features of this life as I see them. We have been unjust to Turkey; we have for so long condemned the Turkish subjects with the cruel despotisms of the Hamidian regime; we have for so long now condemned wholesale everything Turkish, and the novel-writers of the day describe a Turkey which certainly does not exist to-day. . . . And the word 'harem'!

When will Europe understand the meaning of that unfortunate word? An Arabic word, meaning "sacred" or "forbidden," it is used to describe those rooms in a Turkish house exclusively reserved for the women. Imagine for a moment a Konak (Turkish palace, a large Turkish country-house), situated on a hill, and with a magnificent view over the sea of Marmora and its picturesque islands. The wooden gates are always open, the beggars enter at leisure and loiter in the carriage-drive, and walk along the garden-paths, and sit under the trees and eat the fruit; so that unless you notice you have entered a gate you would imagine yourself still on the road. To the ordinary tourist this garden would seem a mass of ruins, a waste heap, a place most shamefully neglected. But the connoisseur knows at once the priceless treasures this garden contains, relics of Byzantine fountains, caves, cornerstones, for which Western museums would give a fortune. There are two entrances to this Turkish house. One leads into the selamlık, and the other leading into the harem is at the side. In the selamlık or men's quarters, there are reception rooms, a dining-room and bed-rooms for the unmarried male relations living here. A door in the selamlık leads into a big saloon, and a door also from the harem leads into this same big saloon. It is here that European guests are received, having entered by the door of the selamlık, and this is all they see of a Turkish house; it is here they must find all the material for their romances of Turkish life. Occasionally through the open door they catch a glimpse of some of the ladies of the house, who pass by the door, and who strictly keep their hair veiled. They see, perhaps, the slaves in their picturesque costumes, and immediately the thought of "polygamy" enters their minds; all these ladies must be the wives of the Pasha.

Polygamy does not exist nowadays in Turkey, or at least it is very exceptional. Even the members of the Imperial Family content themselves with one wife. The Turkish woman is exceedingly proud, and insists that her honour be respected, and personally I know few would put up with the "polygamy" which women of the Latin races are obliged to accept. The Turk, as a rule, is a good husband and father; perhaps it is that he sees in his wife a charm the European does not possess. . . . All these reforms she concludes "are going on in what Europe considers an almost bankrupt State. Education, new roads, industries, a new navy, everything is needed; but Turkey will pull herself together if only she has confidence in herself."

"ASIATIC IMMIGRATION IN THE UNITED STATES."

A Bill to prohibit Asiatics from settling down in the United States of America, according to Renter, has been rejected in the House of Representatives at Washington. Though the object of the Bill was obviously to arrest the growth of the Japanese colony on the Pacific coast of America, the main plea put forth by the Government as warranting its rejection was the consideration that, bearing in mind the fact that Great Britain, who is about to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the Treaty of Ghent, which has given a century of Peace to her and America, had millions of Asiatics under her rule; it would not be a friendly act on the part of the Americans were they to introduce and pass legislation forbidding Asiatic immigration into American territory. It is, no doubt, a cruel irony of fate that, at the present moment, hundreds of loyal Indian subjects of His Majesty are being treated with open antagonism, if not with actual brutality in certain parts of the Empire itself. The situation is indeed extraordinary and requires the highest statesmanship for its definite and permanent solution.

TETE À TETE

A VERY grave situation has come to exist in the Lahore Medical College which is causing serious public anxiety in the Punjab and calls for immediate intervention on the part of the local Government. Practically the entire body of the College students decided some days ago not to attend their classes as long as certain complaints of theirs remained unheard, and after submitting their complaints in writing to the Principal they carried their decision into effect. We received a copy of the students' representation at the time, but we preferred to wait and see the things settling themselves amicably without being drummed and shouted abroad. When the alumni of a public institution find themselves at cross-purposes with their teachers, one's natural wish is to leave the things alone lest by keeping up a running fire of excited comment at a distance one might only injure where one meant to serve. We regret, however, that it is no longer possible in the public interest to ignore the serious impasse that has been reached in the affairs of the College mainly, it would seem, through the stiff and unbending attitude of the Principal. Several days have passed since the students ceased to attend their lectures. They have made some earnest attempts to settle the matters and return to their studies, but they seem to have failed. Public anxiety has, in the meantime, been growing and signs of excitement are manifesting themselves in the Lahore student world. A big public meeting recently held in Lahore showed in an unmistakable manner what gravity is generally attached to the situation. Yet the Principal has proceeded with supreme nonchalance to tell the students that their names have been struck off the College rolls and for readmission they will have to apply individually to him presumably bearing in mind his earlier reminder not unlike a threat that each one of them will have "his case considered on its merits." And all this, we may presume, has been done in the name of discipline. We need not say that we know the great value of a regulated educational regime even if it is a little austere on occasions. The maintenance of authority and strict control over students is a postulate that has seldom been questioned in India. But unfortunately we have been accustomed in this country to hear the cry of discipline mostly in cases where common tact and sympathy have been conspicuous by their absence.

We must, however, see what it is that drove the students into a course that can be justified only in rare circumstances. We have before us the representation submitted by them to their Principal, and if half of what they complain of is true, their case is indeed deserving of sympathy. They say, in brief, that the treatment accorded to them by the Principal himself and several members of his staff is such as would be intolerable to any person not wholly devoid of self-respect. They have invariably to face brusque and contemptuous manners. They have even to put up with vulgar epithets and abuse, "as if the students were the vilest worms and not respectable youngmen of high University education." The treatment accorded to them by the head of the institution has, they say, lowered them in the eyes of the clerks, the nursing staff and even the menials of the hospital. The only thing they want in this connection is that "we should at least be shown the same consideration as the students of the Arts Colleges are shown by their principals and professors." Then, again, they complain of various disabilities they have to bear in the prosecution of their professional studies, which are both serious and manifold. They complain also that the number of scholarships has been reduced and that the system of taking bonds amounts in actual practice to a mere "hindrance against prosecution of higher studies abroad." There are still further difficulties that are placed in the way of those who wish to go to England for higher studies.

The Students' Grievances.

training. The students proceed to say, however, that "we might have perhaps still put up with the disadvantages from which we have so long been suffering, but the climax was reached on Wednesday last. As the proceedings of the London Hospital students were unfair and unwarranted as condemning the whole race of Indian students and as we feared that their example might be followed by other institutions, we approached you with a request to preside at a meeting we proposed to hold in order to protest against the resolutions of the English students of the London Hospital. . . . We were grieved to learn, however, that you refused to entertain the application and help us in the matter, but added to our chagrin by endorsing the opinions of the London Hospital students and in addition insulting us by condemning our own character, making remarks about our behaviour towards the nursing staff, which we beg to say were quite unjustified." This, as the students say, was the last straw that broke the camel's back. They decided at last in a body to stay away from the college intimating that "we will be only too glad to return to the college when we are kindly given distinct assurance that our grievances will be redressed and no punishment of any sort will be inflicted on any one of us for our staying out of the college." The Principal returned to this representation a curt reply saying that each student's case would be judged on its merit and fixing a date for the unconditional return of the students to their duties after which no roll-calls would be taken.

Now it is obvious that the students alleged inconsiderate and harsh treatment at the hands of the Principal himself. They also urged a number of other complaints of a decidedly serious character.

And they asked for nothing beyond a "distinct assurance" that their grievances would be properly dealt with. The proper course for the Principal was to give the assurance and let an independent inquiry be made into the complaints of the students. The allegations about ill-treatment are serious enough in all conscience, and if they could be shown to be groundless the students should have been punished as they deserved. We know what is the usual fate of such grievances when those against whom complaints are made themselves sit in judgment. We can well understand why the students held back. When the date fixed for their return to the College was over, the Principal issued another notice based on the decisions of the College Council, that "the students have severed their connection with the College by their own action" and that they shall be re-admitted only if a fresh application is made by each individual in person not later than the 1st of March. He further stated that the students had made allegations of ill-treatment against the professors and the Principal which shall have to be proved or denied. So there the matter rests. We wonder why the local Government has not yet intervened to save the situation from becoming still more scandalous and grave. It is essential to hold a prompt, thorough and impartial inquiry into the matter and to allow the students in the meantime to go back to their studies. Their time has been wasted enough already. If their grievances are found to be baseless and there action frivolous and unjustifiable, let them by all means bear the consequences. But it is not in all fairness for the Principal of the College to determine whether the students' complaints are just and their action a measure of extreme necessity. Frankly, we have not been impressed with the manner in which the Principal has so far handled the situation. The Indian student is not an unmitigated young barbarian who would kick at the traces for sheer love of revolt. He is by nature docile and patient and has not yet shed his traditional reverence for his teacher even in this irreverent age. The Principal of the Lahore Medical College is reported to have said to the representative of a local paper that he had remarked to the students' representatives "that there was a good deal of truth in what had been said in the report of the meeting of the London Hospital students, although the language used was diabolical and possibly a misinterpretation or a misrepresentation of what actually took place." Perhaps it would not be wholly unprofitable to ask the Principal to reveal the measure of "truth" he sees in the resolution of the students of the London Hospital. It may prove a new illumination to those who have been told with such engaging frankness what the London Hospital students think of them. Rumour hath it that the anonymous author of "Sri Ram, the Revolutionist" and the Times reporter at the last Indian National Congress session at Karachi are one and the same person who has the further glory of being the preceptor of India's youths. What a remarkable combination we have in this instance of a friend, philosopher and guide. Such combinations are not very rare. Unfortunately they burst on our intelligence only when we have to lament with the poet :

من از یگانگان مرگم نه نام * که با من مرگم کرد آن آشنا کرد

(Do not shed tears on account of strangers; all that has been done to me has been done by that one who knows me.)

The immediate cause of the trouble at the Lahore Medical College is still more serious in some respects than the situation to which it was given rise. As it has already been stated, the students wanted to hold a meeting of protest against a resolution passed at a meeting of the English students of the London Hospital, and asked their Principal to preside at the meeting. The principal, however, refused and added to his refusal certain obiter dicta which the students considered to be insulting and altogether unjustified. The arguments advanced in support of their solution are reported to be as follows :—(1) That it is detrimental to the proper government and discipline of India that youngmen who are by no means regarded as equals by whites in that country should come to England and be treated as such and that it is stated on reliable authority that these students on their return to their native land become discontented and often seditious by reason of this fact; (2) that as an inferior and subject race they have not the rights of Englishmen; (3) that medical study can be pursued excellently in India and at less cost; (4) that Indian students are undesirable as a whole, do least work, and are frequently sent back to India in disgrace for having got some poor innocent English girl into trouble; (5) that these students benefit little by their stay in England, adopting the white man's vices without his virtues." It is further stated that the meeting at which the resolutions were passed was presided over by the Head of the London Hospital who sympathised with and supported the English students' demands to impose stringent restrictions on the admission of Indian students into the Hospital. There were several speakers who opposed the resolution, but it was carried with a large majority. We need not set about to examine the contemptible aspersions cast on the characters of Indians as a whole. We are sure all fair-minded Englishmen view such exhibition of petty insolence with disgust. It must, however, be noted that the spirit of racial hatred and intolerance of which the Indians have been made helpless victims in some of the British colonies, is beginning to be manifest in strange forms in the heart of the Empire. The virus has been exported from abroad. The microbe that is the transmitting agency is not always of the colonial type. We are told that a former member of the Indian Medical Service was one of the prominent speakers who urged the exclusion of Indians from the London Hospitals. The fact is significant and should carry its own lesson. As regards the English students who have so shamelessly traduced Indian character, the least that can be expected is that they would be debarred from competing for the Indian Medical Service. India and the Empire would both be better served if all avenues are shut on the men to fatten on the substance of the people they have abused.

We have received the following very interesting letter from Mr. Frank Hugh O'Donnell of O'Donnell for publication. The writer is a distinguished politician and journalist, having been a Member of Parliament for ten years and bring at present the Foreign Editor of the Tory weekly, The Outlook, which has so splendidly championed the righteous sense of Turkey during her recent troubles and which equally splendidly championed the righteous cause of Indian Mussalmans in the Cawnpore Mosque Case. Mr. O'Donnell's is indeed a unique personality. He is a Catholic and an Irishman, but is the Foreign Editor of a Tory paper and has distinguished himself as a valiant champion of "Clean Government" in the recent controversies about the American Marconi Shares and the purchase of silver by the India Office through the firm of the Montaguos. During the stay of Messrs. Wazir Hasan and Mohamed Ali he contributed several articles on Indian affairs to the New Witness edited by Mr. Cecil Chesterton, the brother of the famous "G. K. C.", which is the organ of the "Clean Government" movement. In particular Mr. O'Donnell wrote on "The Colour Line: the Negation of God", a subject on which he addressed a meeting also held at Essex Hall under the Chairmanship of Mr. G. K. Chesterton. We value greatly the first contribution of Mr. O'Donnell to The Comrade and trust it will not be the last. We write a discussion on the subject by our readers and reserve our comments for the present. Mr. O'Donnell writes as follows :—Dear Sir,—

"I have read with great interest recent publications of the Indian Press, including in the first place, your well-informed and able newspaper. Many English friends of mine regretted that Mr. Mahomed Ali and Mr. Syed Wazir Hasan were obliged to quit England so soon; as their clear, eloquent, and very instructive lectures and speeches were of great assistance towards the better understanding of the Indian questions of the day. When the Moslem delegates were in England, they brought home to the minds of many Englishmen the danger to universal liberty which must arise from lawless outbreaks of tyranny as have been exercised by the South African Government towards the Indian settlers in Natal and the Transvaal. Englishmen can now reflect upon the brutality with "which native Englishmen have been treated within the last few days by the same South African Government, without the slightest regard to any principle of the Constitution or any tradition of English liberty. When Indian settlers were exposed to every brutality of lawless force, few Englishmen expected that it would so soon be the turn of free natives of England to be treated as outlaws like the settlers from India themselves. It is in this manner that license for tyranny in one instance soon becomes a general disregard of human right and liberty. I have often regretted that the Nations and Princes of India have not established long ago a general office and mansion in London for the permanent representation of All-Indian interests in the British Capital. Something after the manner in which Canada and Australia possess their central offices and their Agents-General for the representation and protection of Australian and Canadian interests, so those native Indian interests which are so deeply concerned with questions of commerce, education, public reform and other concerns of general importance, would have much to gain in possessing a permanent centre of business and patriotism in London as well. A large and well-planned house, with Indian reading rooms, with commercial offices representing the Indian Native Chambers of Commerce, with an office for educational information for the benefit of Indians resident in England, with two or three halls for social, literary and scientific meetings, would be an immense assistance both to Indian gentlemen of distinction, and to British friends of India desirous of a centre of Indian information close at hand. A joint contribution to the support of what might be called 'The Indian Empire House', on the part of the Princes, Nobles, Chambers of Commerce and general public of India, would be a matter of very small expense, that would be hardly noticeable when spread over so great an area; and it would be conducive both to the dignity of India and to the better knowledge and understanding of the just requirements of India among intelligent and enlightened Englishmen. It would bring the public opinion of India in contact with England, and it would enable Indian visitors and residents to acquire a better knowledge of British civilisation and progress. With renewed expressions of the great interest derived from the leaders of Indian opinion whom I have recently had the pleasure to meet, and with especial recognition of the valuable Indian newspapers and Reviews, I remain, Yours faithfully, F. Hugh O'Donnell of O'Donnell."

distinct social atmosphere which comes indelibly and imperceptibly to mould purpose and desire after a certain stage of social development has been reached. India can never be democratic as long as she does not come socially into line with Western Europe. When that time comes she will naturally breathe what is called the democratic spirit, i. e., she will have certain social values and needs, and organise her social energy in certain ways peculiar to her stage of evolution. As a system of government democracy is said to be blundering, slow and inefficient, and logically the most perfect instrument for the coercion of minorities. But it is conveniently forgotten that democracy, like the socialism of the greatest thinkers of to-day, postulates a certain degree of trained intelligence and moral culture, certain social habits and ways of thought, which are the fruits of education and freedom to make "earnest" experiments in pursuit of social "causes." In Europe itself democracy is yet on its trial, for the simple reason that the education of the masses has not yet reached a sufficiently high level. How far it is just or relevant to confound the nascent social purposes of a people still on the lower stages of social efficiency with the errors of the imperfect democracy of Europe we need not pause to consider. Mr. Justice Beaman seems to think as if some kindly Fate intervenes perpetually to save mankind from ever attaining perfect democracy, for it would, in his opinion, be a condition of perfect tyranny. Perhaps the fate of social experiments in Greece and Rome and elsewhere in a remote period of human history haunts his imagination. The simple fact is that democracy in the real sense of the term has never existed before. Universal suffrage and equal political status among individuals are mere devices that have often been adopted in the past, in spite of the absence of true democracy. Behind these devices lay a mass of social inequalities, conventions and customs which were as formidable as any "cracy" that rouses the scorn of Justice Beaman in modern times. Equality may be a chimera, but the equality of opportunity is something worth having and not a hopeless quest. It is this condition of things that true democracy promotes, and in fact it is this feature of the modern social experiments which sets them far above all kindred efforts in the past and may ultimately lead to the solution of the terrible riddles that have puzzled the ingenuity of man since the dawn of history. As Justice Beaman says, it is useless to dogmatise—either one way or the other. Enthusiasms, ideals, "causes" may be illusions after all. We would have only to admit in that case that God has chosen thus to fulfil his purposes on earth.

We published in our last the discourse of Mr. Justice Beaman on

"Seed Capsules of thought."

"Opportunities of Life" which was delivered before a gathering of the Bombay Students' Brotherhood. To many of his hearers it must have proved a novel treat. The lecturer avoided the stock banalities of the stump preacher on manners and morals which are frequently inflicted on hapless assemblies of Indian youths. He dived straight into the life-purpose and boldly challenged some of the ideals, enthusiasms and stand-points which carry a great popular appeal in these days. As he said, he hinted at rather profound things, trying to sow "seed capsules of thought." There was nothing intrinsically new or original in what he said. His distrust of earnestness, of sentimental zeal, of humanitarianism and of democracy is of a piece with the general doubts and misgivings which handicap the modern sceptic in his outlook on life in Europe. They have, however, been seldom stated with such directness and emphasis before an audience of young Indian students. If the object of Mr. Justice Beaman was to impress on his hearers the need, particularly in the early stage of intellectual development, to keep an open mind, to cultivate the spirit of free inquiry and to save their young enthusiasm from the snare of cheap formulas and wily catchwords of the crowd, he could not have chosen a better text for the occasion. But the examples with which he sought to enforce his views are not relevant to the condition of things in India. The intellectual scepticism and social heresies of Europe have grown in a peculiar intellectual climate. They are the products of a society that has passed through many a stage of evolution yet untraversed by the people of this country. Humanitarianism with its solemn creeds and symbols, democracy and its weapons, public "enthusiasms" and public "causes" were born under the stress of a peculiar social energy; and if those of Europe who dwell in "finer regions of thought" have discovered that, like everything else that is human, the enthusiasms and devices of the 19th century Europe are not perfect, the discovery has no very great relevance in its bearing on things in India. That humanitarianism is an absurd thing in logic and, according to European experience, can sometimes mean a foolish waste of effort and that democracy may easily lend itself to social injustice and abuse, have little value even as a warning in a place where humanitarianism of the secular type and democracy of some sort have yet to come. And Mr. Justice Beaman perhaps forgets that democracy is neither an institution nor a popular political device. It means a

The story of Snehatala Devi's pathetic end has naturally aroused great pity and horror among social reformers in Bengal and it is possible the woe of a young life flinging itself as a burnt offering at the altar of custom may ultimately scar the social conscience of the Bengali community. The demand for extortionate dowries made by the parents of eligible boys has grown into a tyrannous usage, and murmurs of disapproval were fast becoming audible amongst a section of the educated Bengalis. Snehatala's tragic death has revealed in a flashlight how far this pernicious custom has become a terrible social evil. Her father was not rich enough to provide the customary dowry. He tried to borrow without success, and when all other means failed he decided in the last resort to raise the necessary sum by mortgaging his house. When the girl became aware of her father's troubles and the decision to which he had been driven on her account, she was stung with grief and resolved to quietly end her own life in order to save her father from the odium and humiliation of such a course. She carried out her resolve in the stillness of night and with a terrible, all-consuming earnestness that is the soul of all moving tragedy. If the flames that devoured this young, hapless, devoted thing, because the symbol of a mightier conflagration and set the consciences of the people ablaze, her sacrifice would not be in vain. Nothing can be more fatuous at this time than the petty controversy that is going on in some papers as to whether Snehatala's deed was heroic. The deed may have in it elements of a grave spiritual struggle which ultimately convinced a young, passionate and brave heart that the path of duty lay through self-destruction. Or it may be the result of morbid, brooding of a fragile spirit over difficulties that later were spurning darkly around her. In any case it is tragic enough to rouse pity of and turn in a whole community and set it to seriously examine the plague-spots in its social system. If the demand for extortionate dowries has sprung up because the supply of educated young men is not adequate, the only reasonable way of adjusting the equilibrium is to stop the practice of marrying girls before they are well grown in years. The revision to child-marriage suggested by some orthodox Bengali Hindus as the best way to escape existing evils is a counsel of despair.

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

VII.

We have dealt in our last two articles on the subject of the Press Act with the discussion in the Viceroy's Council on the question of the statement of grounds in the orders of forfeiture, and we have shown how the Executive in India has practically flouted the highest judicial tribunal in this country in a matter which is entirely within the province of the judiciary. Let us now turn to the second part of the Hon. Mr. Bannerjee's resolution in which he prayed that "section 22 of the Act be so modified as to definitely empower the High Court to set aside an order of forfeiture not made in conformity with the provisions of sections 4, 6, 9, 11 and 12 of the Act."

It will be remembered that although the Special Bench of the Calcutta High Court held in our Pamphlet Case that a mandatory condition of a valid order of a forfeiture under section 12, namely the statement of grounds, had not been fulfilled, the Court felt itself to be impotent before the bar of all jurisdiction under section 22 of the Act except that of the High Court on a single point of fact. The Chief Justice had said in his judgment that—

The Notification therefore appears to me to be defective in a material particular and but for section 22 of the Act it would (in my opinion) be our duty to hold that there had been no legal forfeiture. . . . The result is that though I hold the Notification does not comply with the provisions of the Act, still we are (in my opinion) barred from questioning the legality of the forfeiture it purports to declare.

It is not difficult to see that this interpretation of the Act is bound to have far-reaching results. It does not merely refer to a particular mandatory condition, much less to a particular case. If the jurisdiction of the only competent court under the Act is so restricted, then every mandatory condition in the Act loses all significance and value. The Hon. Mr. Das in the course of the debate in the Legislative Council very rightly said :

Sir, I have always understood that the mandatory conditions of an Act, especially when the conditions are conditions precedent to any action, or to any measure, or to any procedure, are a sine qua non to the validity and legality of what follows. But here we have a case where the mandatory conditions have been differently interpreted. It is admitted that there are conditions of a mandatory character, and yet it is contended that the High Court's power to pronounce on the legality of the forfeiture, by reason of the failure to observe the mandatory conditions of the Act, is barred. If they are to be at all mandatory conditions, certainly they must be tested by those rules and canons of interpretation which have always been held to be applicable to mandatory conditions.

The speaker asked Government to consider the effect that its novel interpretation of the force of mandatory conditions would have in other cases. For instance, sections 4, 6, 9 and 11 make it a mandatory condition of a valid order of forfeiture that, (1) the Local Government shall give notice of the forfeiture in writing to the keeper of the offending press or the publisher of the offending newspaper, and that, (2) it shall state or describe the words, signs or visible representations which in its opinion are of the nature described in section 4 and section (1). If a Local Government fails to observe these mandatory conditions and merely confiscates the security deposited together with the printing-press concerned, the person adversely affected by such action can have no redress of his grievances. As it is, he is not very much the wiser for a "description" of the offending words, signs etc., and it may be that even the formality of a written notice with such a "description" may some day be dispensed with. As the Act stands, what is there to prevent it?

Let us now see what the Executive had to say on this question. The Hon. the Advocate-General who had unsuccessfully contended four months previously in the Calcutta High Court that a similar condition was not mandatory but only directory, preserved a discreet silence. No other Hon. Member spoke on the side of Government, except the Hon. the Home Member, and all that he had to say on this subject is contained in the following significant pronouncement :—

The only issue that it was intended should be submitted to judicial decision, and that only to a Special Bench of the High Court, was the question whether the words, illustrations etc., which formed the subject of forfeiture, fell within the aim of section 4 of the Act or not. . . . It is quite clear that there never was any intention to give any Special Bench of the High Court any other power except to decide Aye or No, whether the words, etc., complained of did, or did not come within the description contained in the clauses and sub-clauses of section 4. Very naturally, the Executive Government will always desire to comply with the forms and prescriptions of the law as to the procedure to be followed; but the vital issue in this case—in all these cases—is whether the document concerned was, or was not, open to the construction placed on it which made its forfeiture proper, whether that writing did, or did not, fall within the terms of section 4 of the Bill. That is the vital issue—vital to public interests and vital to private interests. If a technical error, and as I said, any irregularity of that kind would be unintentional on the part of the Government, if such irregularity were to come in and if that error in the form of the Notification were to vitiate the action taken, then the most revolutionary pamphlet might have a free circulation while the error was being discussed and rectified.

That is to say, all mandatory conditions are merely "technical" matters, and such "technical errors" as their non-observance are vital neither to public nor to private interests. Local Governments should be trusted not to commit them; but, all the same, if they do commit them in fact, it does not matter a straw. No Court in the world can intervene, and no redress is possible. After this pronouncement what can we do but echo the words of the Hon. Sir Ibrahim Rahmitoola who said : "I think the Council is indebted to the Hon. the Home Member for having clearly explained that though so much was made of the 'safeguards, in actual practice the safeguards are nil.' In the word of the speaker, the Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock's speech "completely disposes of the question of safeguards."

If that is so, may we ask why so much fuss was made about the pledges of the then Law Member? Why need Government have discussed at so much length and with so much elaboration whether the so-called safeguard of stating or describing "the offending words, or articles or pictures or engravings or whatever it is upon which the Local Government bases its orders" could, or could not be extended to section 12? In either case it was ineffective, for although Mr. S. P. Sinha was emphatic enough in declaring that "it is of no use to attempt to convince us that it is a very drastic measure, because we have put in all kinds of safeguards," Sir Reginald Craddock tells us that his predecessor and Mr. Sinha's colleague, the Hon. Sir Herbert Risley, had clearly intimated "that there never was any intention to give any special Bench of the High Court any power to declare a forfeiture null and void on the ground that this pledge was ignored." We confess we have never seen casuistry carried to such lengths by a responsible member of the Government of India. When the non-official members remind Government of its own solemn pledge, they are equally solemnly assured that the pledge referred to quite a different matter; but when they ask that whatever the subject on which the pledge was given, it should be made compulsory on Government to redeem that pledge, they are told that there never was any intention of making it legally binding on Government. Are we to understand that this was another "Amichand's Treaty" devised by a "slim" Secretariat? We are fully convinced, and we know what we talk about, and say this with a full sense of our responsibility, that not all the seditious writings in all the seditious newspapers in the world can bring Government into so much hatred or contempt as the least suspicion in the people's mind, justified by any declaration of Government, that it plays fast and loose with its pledges to the people. In 1878 Government had frankly enough asked for and obtained the necessary legislative sanction for executive action designed to suppress seditious writings in the Vernacular Press of India. It wanted no reference to the judiciary and said so. In 1910, too, it had a large enough official majority to pass any kind of Press Bill that it felt disposed to enact into law. Instead of avoiding judicial reference, the Government of the day boasted of "all kinds of safe-guards" which it had provided in its Bill. Does it, then, lie in the mouth of the Government to-day to say in one and the same breath that those safeguards were very limited in their application and that even as they are in practice they are of no value.

It is all very well to talk of the intentions of Government. But when we are told openly enough that even the best of intentions on the part of a printer or publisher do not make him immune from the rigours of the Press Act, what consolation can it be to him to believe that the so-called "technical errors" of Government are unintentional. That brings no grist to the mill, and for all we know the good intentions of Local Governments may serve for gridirons in roasting an equally well-intentioned Press. The Hon. Mr. Vijayraghavarachariar said in the course of the Council debate : "Is it plain that there was a defect or is it plain that there was not a defect? It seems to me that the trend of the argument is this. Apparently there was a defect, but as it suits us we wish to have it. That I understand to be the upshot of the argument in opposition to the resolution." We ask, is Government content to leave the question at that? Not a single Notification declaring a forfeiture has exhibited the least effective improvement consequent upon the declaration of the Hon. the Advocate-General in our Pamphlet Case that in that case the Notification was "loosely worded" and "couldn't have been drawn up by a lawyer," and the Chief Justice's apt retort that "surely, you can't confiscate people's property on loosely worded notifications." In the case of Al-Hilal of Calcutta even the date of the issue declared to have been forfeited happened to be one on which that weekly journal was not, and could not have been, published. In the case of the Hamdard's translation of the Macedonia Pamphlet, three issues out of a total of eighteen were left out.

in the declaration of forfeiture in spite of our having supplied a full list of the "guilty" issues along with all copies thereof when the District Magistrate had gone one better than the Government of the Province of Delhi. That shows the care and diligence with which Government make their declarations of forfeiture and in which we must place our trust for the due observance of necessary and proper procedure. The Pioneer, that sturdy champion of Nadir Shahi procedure, laughed only the other day at the shifts to which local Governments were put in drawing up Notifications as a lawyer, say, the Hon. the Advocate-General of Bengal, would have drawn them up—not "loosely worded" but as tight, we presume, as a wedding knot. And yet not one could have satisfied the Courts as being in conformity with the provisions of the Press Act. So much for the unintentional "technical errors" of Local Governments. As for the excuse that if such "technical errors" could vitiate the action taken, "then the most revolutionary pamphlet might have a free circulation while the error was being discussed and rectified." Can Government supply many instances of such prompt action as they would like themselves to be credited with? The Macedonia Pamphlet reached India last April and was reproduced by us in May. The declaration of forfeiture by the Government of India did not come till the middle of July, and our reprint was not forfeited for another month. Similarly, the Zamindar Press was confiscated nearly two months after the publication of three articles which constitute the subject matter on which the order of forfeiture has been based. These are not rare instances but typical of the "prompt" action of Government. And if these are all the arguments that can be offered in defence of Government's attitude, we fear Government may appear to be altogether bankrupt in every thing save "good intentions."

Member after member rose from his place in the Council Chamber on the 9th January to press for the amendment of the Act, and the still small voice of the Hon. Malik Umar Hayat Khan Tiwana's dissent which alone seems to have reached England, only served to emphasize the unanimity of non-official opinion. One member in particular, the Hon. Mr. Qamrul Huda, supplied in his short speech the key-note of non-official protest and prayer. Referring to the assurance of the late Sir Herbert Risley to which we have referred more than once in previous issues, he said: "This sacred assurance and promise of complete check was endorsed and supported by the Hon. Law member of the time. We believed in, and relied fully and completely on, the words of the responsible officers of the Crown. But when the first appeal under the Act goes to the High Court of Calcutta, we, to our amazement and disappointment are told that 'the complete check' promised to us and provided in the Act are words without meaning. . . . The Resolution we are discussing is nothing but a request to Government to rectify its unintentional error in an Act which was passed in a hurry and under peculiar circumstances. Sir, pray do not give any one ground to think that the Government can err but it does not possess courage enough to mend that error. Let it not come into the minds of the people that the Government in its assurances and promises plays upon words. Sir, we cannot for a moment suppose that the Government ever says anything to the people it does not mean. . . . It was expected of the Government to come forward ere long with a Bill to amend the Press Act of 1910. Sir, it was a matter of honour for the Government!" Nothing could be more clearly indicative of popular feeling than this quiet but forcible appeal of one of the most sedate and quiet Members of a quiet and sedate Council. And yet the response of the Government of India was what we have seen.

Now comes the response of the Home Government. Reuter tells us that in answer to Mr. Morrell's question with reference to Sir Lawrence Jenkin's judgment, Mr. Roberts, the new Under Secretary of State for India, said that "Mr. Morrell was extending to all action taken under the Act, certain remarks regarding action taken under section 12. Lord Crewe, after careful consideration of the recent debate in the Viceroy's Council, held that the powers of appeal provided by the Act might suffice to supply a remedy against the arbitrary administration of the Act." This is, indeed, most hopeful, for evidently there is at the present moment neither a copy of the Press Act in the India Office nor of the judgment of the learned Chief Justice of Bengal, and equally evidently the Secretary of State for India requires, if not as many readings of "the recent debate in the Viceroy Council" as the Home Rule Bill of his Government has had, at least one more to recognise that the debate here justifies no such conclusions as he has drawn. The task imposed on the applicant to the Courts, who must show that the publication in question did not contain "words falling within the all-comprehensive provisions of the Act" was declared by Sir Lawrence Jenkins to be "almost hopeless," because of section 4 sub-section (1) as the very next sentence, and, in fact, the whole judgment clearly indicates,

And if the new Under Secretary has a copy of the Press Act handy, he will find that section 4 sub-section (1) runs through every section empowering Government to declare a forfeiture and not merely through section 12. As for the Secretary of State, it is obviously not for us to question his Lordship's competence for the high office he holds. But we venture to question his ability to reverse the judgment of the High Court of Calcutta. That only the Privy Council can do. But we believe his Lordship harboured no such intention but has been confused by the report of the debate here, for we have shown amply enough that the points at issue were befogged and the two Government Members never attempted to face the situation created by the judicial pronouncements of great value and importance embodied in the judgments in our case. May we not hope that when Mr. Roberts understands the case better and is convinced by a perusal of the Press Act and the Calcutta judgment that it was not Mr. Morrell who was extending to all action taken under the Act the Chief Justice's remarks in our case, but that the Act itself made them applicable, and that the Chief Justice himself applied them, that he would announce in Parliament on the next occasion that he refers to this crude and cruel Act that "the Order of Release" has already gone forth. Evidently Lord Crewe is not quite sure that the Act does suffice to "supply a remedy against the arbitrary administration of the Act." He only held that it might. Well, we think we know better, for in our own case it hasn't. And we live in hopes that his Lordship's present absence of certainty would soon be replaced by the presence of the fullest conviction that the Act supplies no remedy against its arbitrary administration.

Education of Mussalmans.

The Sixth Quinquennial Review of the progress of education in India, which has just been published by the Education Department, is an industrious survey covering a wide range and brings together a mass of facts and figures which afford a useful and interesting study. The chapters dealing with the evolution of the State policy and the general lines and scope of educational advance are interesting in particular and must naturally engage the utmost public attention. We reserve the consideration of these vital matters for another occasion. For the present we would only note at some length the facts, inferences and conclusions set forth in the chapter on Moslem education, especially in view of the fact that we have devoted several articles for some weeks past to emphasising the importance of the subject as the chief factor in the general problem of Moslem advancement. It is essential that the Moslem standpoint in regard to communal education should be tested in the light of the official survey, just as it is necessary to examine official policy and measures with reference to the real needs of the community.

In considering the attitude of the Mussalmans towards modern education it is necessary to bear in mind the general position and distinctive features of the community. The Mussalmans of British India, as is pointed out in the Review, comprise 22.7 per cent. of the total population. They form a large and important minority differing from the rest of the people in religion, tradition, ideals, manners, and the language of their sacred and classical literature. It is rightly held, therefore, that their needs require special measures and the account of their progress demands separate treatment. The earlier attitude of the Mussalmans towards Western education was one of distrust if not of actual hostility. The traditions of their past political power and social influence were still fresh in their minds, and they retained intact a marked individuality in thought, manners and outlook which they had acquired in the atmosphere of a powerful and independent culture. The spread of the ideals embodied in the arts and sciences of the West was, in its earlier stages, a source of great anxiety and alarm to the Mussalmans. They felt as if an irresistible moral and intellectual avalanche was imminent which would sweep away all ancient landmarks and wipe out the symbols of their communal individuality. Time, however, proved a soothing tonic. The earlier distrust began to wear away as experience grew apace. It began to be realised that no community could afford to shew modern education in the new conditions of existence and that the Western culture was neither a thorough-going iconoclast, nor of so insular a character as to be utterly inadapted to the needs of the various communities in India. As this perception dawned and the pressure of circumstances increased, the early Moslem indifference and dislike towards Western education began to give way. The rapid change of feeling has become manifest to a remarkable degree in recent years. The demand for education has grown up enormously; new ideals have taken the place of the old; and active efforts are being organised on a vast scale to bring the community educationally into line with the most progressive races in India.

The problem that now faces the Mussalmans is, as has been truly said, "the maintenance of religious observance and discipline amid the disintegrating influences of higher secular education."

The educational progress of the Mussalmans during the quinquennium (1907-12) is worth noting. The number of Mussalmans under instruction in all classes of institutions in 1912 was 1,551,151 against 1,172,371 in 1907. This increase represents nearly 32.3 per cent. on the previous figure against 25.8 per cent. in the case of pupils of all classes in India. The advance represented by these figures is appreciable and shows that the Mussalmans are becoming increasingly alive to their educational needs. The percentage of Mussalmans at school to the total of pupils of all creeds at school now just exceeds the proportion of the Moslem population to the whole population; the latter is 22.7 per cent., the former is 22.9 per cent. In some localities the percentage of Moslem pupils at school considerably exceeds the percentage of Hindus; thus, in the United Provinces, 18.4 per cent. of the Mussalmans of a school-going age are under instruction, and 9.3 per cent. of the Hindus. Of the total number of Mussalmans under instruction in all kinds of institutions, 1,387,954 are boys and 213,197 are girls. The figure relating to girls represents an increase of over 75 per cent. upon the number of girls in 1907. But while the Mussalmans now fully hold their own in educational institutions regarded as a whole, their proportion in secondary and higher education is still below their numerical strength in the population. But before we set forth this deficiency in actual figures, enumerate the causes and consider remedial measures, it is desirable to show the net actual increase of Mussalman pupils in the various classes of public institutions during the past five years. In the arts colleges the number of Moslem pupils has increased by 97.3 per cent.; in professional colleges by 41.0 per cent.; in secondary schools by 89.1 per cent.; in middle vernacular schools by 6.7 per cent.; in primary schools by 29.9 per cent.; and in special schools by 315.3 per cent. It will be noticed that, while the increase among those in primary school pupils has been comparatively small, the increase in arts colleges and in secondary schools represents not far from a doubling of the pupils, while that in special schools has more than trebled. In professional colleges (save those for the study of law) there has been no decided increase—indeed, there has in some cases been retrogression. Among special schools those for training as teachers and those for technical and industrial instruction exhibit increases of Moslem pupils in the one case from 1,102 to 2,104, and in the other from 1,488 to 2,520; but the great advance in the numbers enrolled in special schools as a whole in reality represents enhanced numbers in madrassas and the transfer of maktabs, etc., to this class of institution. It is obvious that the growth of Moslem education as a whole has not been in the direction of numbers alone. A far larger proportion of pupils now seek higher forms of instruction than was the case five years ago.

But a comparative study of the statistics of the past five years relating to the progress of Indian education as a whole shows that the proportion of Moslem pupils in secondary schools and arts colleges is still considerably below their relative strength in the population. The percentage of Moslem pupils to the total number of pupils of all creeds in various classes of public institutions is as follows:—In the arts colleges the percentage is 10.4; in professional colleges it is 10.0; in secondary schools, 19.0; in middle vernacular schools, 17.0; in primary schools, 20.5; and in special schools, 66.2. The leeway to be made up in secondary and collegiate education seems particularly great when we bear in mind that the Moslem population of British India is 22.7 per cent. of the total population. The general position of the Mussalmans in all branches of public instruction is not uniform throughout the country. It varies with the conditions obtaining in different provinces. It would thus be observed that according to the census figures of 1911 the percentage of Mussalmans to the total population in Madras, Bombay, Bengal, United Provinces, Punjab, Burma, Eastern Bengal and Assam, Central Provinces and Berar, Coorg and North West Frontier Province is 6.6, 18.1, 17.1, 14.1, 54.8, 5.5, 58.5, 3.7, 7.5, and 92.8 respectively, while the percentage of Moslem pupils to the total of pupils of all classes in public institutions in these provinces is 9.0, 16.6, 17.4, 15.2, 38.2, 3.6, 52.0, 9.3, 3.2 and 63.1 respectively. In Madras, Bengal, the United Provinces, Burma and the Central Provinces, the proportion to the number at school exceeds the proportion to the total population. The advance in the two Bengals has been appreciable, while the Punjab and the North-West Frontier Province show marked backwardness.

The causes responsible for the relatively inferior position of the Mussalmans in the educational progress of the country are not far to seek. The Moslem educational activity is only of recent growth. The early attitude of indifference and distrust shown by the community has had a cumulative effect on the proportionate growth of education among the various communities. The start made by the Mussalmans at a comparatively later hour requires a much more accelerated pace if they are to cover the distance that divides them from the other racess and creeds. Then, the Moslem community has special religious and social needs which can be met only by special measures. It is also comparatively poor. Then, again, over large areas the Mussalmans are included mainly in the cultivating classes who only proceed to secondary schools in exceptional cases. It is plain therefore, that the problem of Moslem education will have to be solved according to the varying conditions of the different localities. The measures to be adopted in each case will have to be evolved after a careful inquiry into local conditions; and we may mention in this connection that we are awaiting with keen interest the results of the provincial inquiries based on the Circular of the Government of India on Moslem education. It may, however, be observed as a matter of general application that an effective increase in Moslem teachers and educational inspectors should be made irrespective of local circumstances. As special measures suited to special provinces, scholarships will have to be increased, exemptions of fees granted in larger numbers, rural schools will have to be opened and school curricula will have to be devised in accordance with the linguistic and other requirements of Moslem pupils. All these questions have been touched upon in the Quinquennium Review with special reference to the existing facts, but little mention has been made of the steps that the Government intends to take with a view to remove the obstacles lying in the path of Moslem education, and no effort has been made to indicate the directions in which Government encouragement and support would seem to be desirable. Perhaps these omissions are due to the fact that the Government of India has already emphasized in general terms its own point of view by issuing a special circular on the subject and is, like the Mussalmans themselves, awaiting the formulation of definite measures by local Governments.

Government help and encouragement is most certainly indispensable in the interests of Moslem education, but the real problem would only be solved when the Mussalmans themselves are allowed to organise the higher education of the community according to its peculiar needs. In other words the creation of the Moslem University is the first and most urgent step that shall have to be taken without delay if the Moslem educational advance is to be assured. We dealt with the University question in our last mainly from the Moslem standpoint and recapitulated the circumstances which have delayed the scheme from coming to fruition. It would, however, be obviously unfair if we only blamed the Government for what is mainly the result of Moslem inaction particularly since July 1912. As a matter of fact the Government of India is not in any way responsible for "the final decisions" which emanated directly from Whitehall. Those decisions were naturally communicated to the President of the Moslem University Constitution Committee the moment they were received from the Secretary of State for India. They were considered by the constitution Committee at its last meeting in Lucknow in July 1912 and a reply was sent to the Hon. Member for Education that, while these decisions conflicted in some aspects with the principles on which the Committee had based its task, it had no power to accept them, for its mandate was derived from the Moslem University Foundation Committee and it was naturally limited to the framing of a suitable Constitution for the Moslem University. Nothing has since then passed on the subject between the Government and those responsible for the creation of the Moslem University. It rested wholly with the Mussalmans to take early steps with a view to convince the Government or the Secretary of State of the reasonableness and justice of their views. But they did nothing of the kind. The only thing so far achieved is that the Foundation Committee has declared the Secretary of State's decisions to be unacceptable in the best interests of the Moslem community. It was in August 1913 that a resolution was unanimously adopted at the Foundation Committee meeting at Aligarh to organise a strong, representative Moslem deputation to negotiate with the Government, to state and explain the Moslem point of view and to ascertain the views of the former with a view to final settlement. But no effort has yet been made to carry out the resolution. There has been a great waste of time already, and we trust the proposed deputation will soon be organised and proceed to business. We are confident the Government will consider with sympathy all the points that the deputation has been authorised to urge. The Moslem University scheme does not owe its origin to a spirit of adventure nor has it been trumpeted abroad as something desirable for pure communal glory. It embodies the supreme educational need of the community, and the longer it is delayed, the greater would be the general harm to Moslem education. The responsibility of Moslem leaders is heavy in the matter. The question is hanging fire simply through their indifference, weak-kneed pusillanimity or procrastination. If they do not bestir themselves even now, they would have the finger of scorn pointed at them. It would be absurd to blame Government now if the University scheme is indefinitely delayed. It would mainly be another direct consequence of the masterly inactivity of the communal wiseacres and guides.

Snehalata's Martyrdom

Her Letter to her Father.

The Bengales publishes the following free translation of a letter reported to have been written by Snehalata Devi to her father before her tragic death:—

"Most Honoured Father,—I cannot bear to think of your mortgaging the house for the sake of my marriage. You shan't do it. You will have no necessity to do it. For, ere the sun shines again to-morrow morning, the troubled spirit of your inauspiciously-born daughter will have winged its flight to where beyond these voices there is peace.

"You have lavished your affection upon me. You have let this tender tendril of love entwine your manly breast. I have been happy in the love of my doting parents, beyond the dreams of Princesses. Am I then to requite all this wealth of love by making myself the cause of the whole family being turned out into the streets and you, my loving father, doomed to life-long penury and misery?

"Day before yesterday, late in the afternoon, when you returned home, lonesome and weary, after having been out the whole day since the break of dawn. I saw your face, saw the world of anguish and despair which was depicted on it and heard with my own ears those fatal words—"all is lost." That face has never ceased to haunt me since. Those words are still ringing in my ears. And I heard the rest of that heart-breaking story, how the big mortgage, which you were so sanguine of your ability to put through and which was to furnish the money required for my marriage, had almost at the last moment been cancelled and how the only way out of the difficulty was to raise the money by a mortgage upon the house.

"Father, I can't bear that idea. What is marriage to me, except as a means of lifting the weight of anxiety on my account, which lies so heavy on your breast? What social obloquy have you not already endured because I am still unmarried? What heroic efforts have you not already made to find a suitable match for me and with what ill success? No, the hall of my ancestors will not be trodden by the feet of strangers nor resound with unfamiliar voices. Not you, adored father, but I am to be the sacrifice.

"Father, I have heard that many noble-hearted and educated young men volunteered for philanthropic work for the relief of the sufferers from the Burdwan floods. God bless their kindly hearts, so full of compassion for their suffering fellow-beings. I have also heard that many young men have taken a vow not to buy bideshi articles. Only the other day I heard how bands of noble minded youths had gone from door to door to raise funds for the relief of some people in far away South Africa. But is there no one among them to feel for their own people.

"Last night I dreamt a dream, father, which made me take my vow. To the enthralling strains of a music unheard before, and amid a blaze of light as never was on land or sea, I saw the Divine Mother Durga, with benignant smile, beckoning me to the abode of the blest, up above, and then I thought of you father, of the ever sorrow-laden face of my beloved mother and of the dear little ones who have done so much to brighten our home. And then I resolved to save you all and made a sign to the Divine Mother that I would not delay obeying her merciful call.

"After I am gone, father, I know you will shed tears over my ashes. I shall be gone—but the house will be saved. Since then I have been pondering on the best way of ending my worldly pilgrimage—Fire, Water or Poison. I have preferred the first and may the conflagration I shall kindle set the whole country on fire.

"And now, dear father, farewell. The hour of sacrifice is come. All nature is slumbering peacefully and ere long I am going to fall into that sleep which knows no waking. A strange and sweet sensation overpowers me. Up above, in my new home, at the lotus feet of the Divine Mother and lying within the light of uncreated rays, as I used to lie upon your loving breast, I have only to wait a little while till you and mother come!—Your ill-fated daughter, SNEHALATA."

The Lahore Medical College Strike.

The following application was submitted to the Principal.

To—THE PRINCIPAL, Medical College, Lahore.

SIR,—We, the students of your College respectfully beg to submit that we have been labouring under a number of grievances in the Medical College, which we beg to lay before you in the following few lines:—

1. The first and the foremost grievance from which we suffer is the treatment accorded to us by yourself and some other members of the teaching staff. The Indian student has never been found lacking in due respect to his teachers and the students of your College have never failed in their duty towards their professors. There is moreover a standing regulation in the College to the effect,

"that every student shall salute the professors and the teachers by raising the right hand to the forehead." This regulation is strictly obeyed though the professors, with some noble exceptions, do not show us the common courtesy of acknowledging our salutes. The students of your College have never deviated from the path of duty and have always shown the greatest respect to their teachers. Still, however, the members of the staff have had nothing but the greatest contempt for the students. It is an ordinary thing for them to address us by such insulting names, as bloody fools, donkeys, asses, devils, and slaves, as if the students were the vilest worms and not respectable youngmen of high University education. We have borne these insults as best as we could, but the treatment has now become intolerable and has compelled us to make a practical protest against it.

The treatment accorded to us by the Head of the Institution has lowered us in the eyes of the clerks, nursing staff and even the menials of the Hospital. We are not desirous of any special concessions at your hands, all that we want is, that we should at least be shown the same consideration as the students of the Arts Colleges are shown by their Principals and Professors.

2. Our second grievance is with respect to the disabilities from which we are suffering in the prosecution of our professional studies, so far as the practical work is concerned. Although the practical Examinations are becoming stiffer and stiffer, our opportunities of doing practical work are growing rarer every day. We are neither allowed sufficient use of the surgical apparatus, instruments, models, etc., nor given a fair opportunity to watch surgical operations. There is in fact a strong impression growing up that the staff does not like the idea of Indians attaining any efficiency in the Surgical work.

3. Contrary to the practice in other Colleges the students of the Medical College are not allowed to avail of the Library in the College, as no student is allowed to take out any book for home study on payment of any security whatsoever.

4. The students are always unreservedly suspected of forcing their attention upon the nurses. "The students should on no account talk to the nurses" is the standing order and although every one of us tries honestly to obey this order not only in letter, but in spirit too, yet there are almost daily uncharitable and unwarranted remarks cast against us. Should a student prefer any complaint against a nurse, it is dismissed summarily and the student is never believed whereas immediate action is taken on any report against the students by any nurse. The contemptuous treatment of the nurses therefore towards the students never finds any redress.

5. The number and amount of scholarships has been reduced this year although the number of classes will really increase after two years.

6. The system of taking bonds for merit scholarship is peculiar to Medical College alone. A bond does not entitle the executor to Government service after completion of the College course, but is only used as hinderances against prosecution of higher studies abroad.

7. We also beg to draw your kind attention to the fact that great difficulties are put in the way of students proceeding to England for the prosecution of studies there. Exorbitant fees are charged before certificates in the various subjects are issued. It is after tiring the patience of the applicant that the necessary certificates are granted. The students intending to proceed abroad are discouraged and thus cold water is thrown on their just and noble aspirations.

8. We might have perhaps still put up with the disadvantages from which we have been so long suffering, but the climax was reached on Wednesday last. As the proceedings of the London Hospital students were unfair and unwarranted as condemning the whole race of Indian students and as we feared that their example might not be followed by other Institutions, we approached you with the request to preside at a meeting we proposed to hold in order to protest against the resolutions of the English students of the London Hospital. This, as you would see, Sir, was the best course that we could take. We were grieved to learn, however, that you refused to entertain the application and help us in the matter but added to our chagrin by endorsing the opinions of the London Hospital students and in addition insulting us by condemning our own character, making remarks about our behaviour towards the Nursing staff which we beg to say were quite unjustified.

Smarting as we were under the numerous grievances some of which have been referred to above and were represented to you from time to time directly or indirectly, the unsympathetic treatment we met at your hands was the last straw that broke the camel's back. We did not think it consistent with our sense of honour and self-respect to continue attending the College unless these remarks were withdrawn and our grievances redressed. We ceased to attend the College with the idea that it was impossible to represent the matter to you while staying in the College, as you refused to consider any such applications. We have detailed these grievances for your kind sympathetic and best consideration and we will be only too glad to return to the College when we are kindly given an assurance that our grievances will be redressed and no punishment of any sort will be inflicted on any one of us for our staying out of the College. Waiting for a favourable and an early decision.

We beg to remain,
Sir,
Your most obedient pupils,
Students of the Lahore Medical College.

Dated the 13th February, 1914.

The Lapse of Mr. Lovat Fraser.

In Tory circles it goes almost without saying that General Botha is the hero of the hour, just as Lord Morley was in 1909. Mr. Lovat Fraser, who rhapsodises on the theme of "Strong Men and Measures" to the extent of a column in Saturday's Daily Mail, is so completely carried away by his enthusiasm that he declares it to be "the real truth" that "the English are not inherently a law-abiding race."

When we see that South Africa has produced one great, clear-headed, determined man who stands for peace and good government and social stability at any risk, we are ready to say he is right without much regard for the lawyers who wag their heads in dismay.

Lord Kitchener, it would appear, is another of the same kidney: although, sad to say, he is "intellectually, not among our greatest men." But his "great merit" is proclaimed to be that "he sometimes cares little about the means he employs so long as he attains his purpose."

He knows something about deportations, for he had a share in the dramatic episode when a dozen prominent agitators in Bengal were suddenly seized one fine morning. Bengal was calmed in an instant, but one recalls the stories of Lord Kitchener's anger when, some months later, the agitators were incontinently released at the bidding of a nervous Cabinet.

Bengal was not "calmed" in any way by the deportations, as Mr. Fraser would have us believe: but what does that matter? Lord Kitchener is admittedly without scruple; and so he is being pushed as a suitable Viceroy for India by Mr. Fraser and his friends. No wonder the "Nation" finds the danger of this epidemic of deportation to lie in the fact that it indicates a relapse into the habit of appealing to force the moment that respect for ordinary liberties becomes in the least degree inconvenient to the governing classes.

For, let it be noted, it never strikes the Lovat Fraser type of critic that peers and privy councillors in Ulster and Unionist politicians in England are inciting the application of exactly the same weapons to themselves. On the contrary, says Mr. Fraser, "had the Liberals a great leader, he would have the courage to tell Mr. Redmond at this perilous juncture that he could not keep his promises, and would take the consequences." That is to say, perfidy is permissible where the interests of a small and privileged coterie are deemed to be endangered: but swift and arbitrary punishment must fall upon men who "create unrest among wage-earners"—which is the main charge formulated against the South African strike leaders in the Indemnity Bill.

Mr. Lovat Fraser concludes his article on a note which must have filled his idol, Lord Curzon, with all the indignation of outraged vanity.

Here in England, with sick longing, we still await the appearance of a man, one who will lead the nation onward, a modern adaptation of Pitt. The present Government is only tolerated because, on the whole, it has some sort of policy, whereas the Opposition is split into secret factions and seems to have no policy at all. Nowhere is the lack of a great and commanding and overwhelming personality more visible just now than in the ranks of the Opposition. With one great man to lead them, the Unionists could sweep the country to-day. Both political parties recognise that the hour is ripe for a Unionist triumph, and only the man is lacking.

"Only the man is lacking." We can imagine the astonishment with which Lord Curzon read these words. He must want to deal with this treacherous panegyrist of his on the lines once adopted by Mr. William Hunter. Readers of Mr. Skrine's biography will remember the passage, which occurs in a letter to Lady Hunter.

I had to smash a nameless individual about his lying letters and telegrams: I did it quickly but pitilessly—a single blow, but one which made him the public scorn of the whole of India, and left the steel quivering in his heart: I hope it will stop his wicked mendacity for a time.

Mr. Lovat Fraser takes good care not to be "nameless": but surely that is all the more reason why he should mingle discretion with his candour.—India.

Journalism as a Career for Indian Youths.

Mr. Blair's Lecture at University Institute.

Mr. A. J. Fraser Blair of the Statesman delivered a lecture on "Journalism as a career for Indian Youths" at the University Institute, Calcutta, on Tuesday evening. Mr. Justice A. Chaudhuri presided.

In introducing the speaker, the President said that Mr. Blair was an eminent journalist. For some years he had been connected with some of the biggest journals in Calcutta. He was connected at the present time with one of the biggest newspapers in India.

Mr. Blair said that when he was invited to address them on the subject of journalism as a profession for young Indians, he at once thought of the advice to those about to be married "Don't." When he dwelt upon all the draw-backs of journalistic career he did not want to impress on them that he was against taking it up. It was possible that that might be the effect of the remarks he was going to address to them. But they would acquit him of such deliberate intention.

Before entering upon the question of how far journalism was a career for young Indians he would consider journalism as a profession from a general point of view. He would first consider its relation to the civilisation of the world. Newspapers existed, because they served a very useful work. The main function of a newspaper was to keep the people in touch with the events of the day, to break down the limitation of time and space which hedge in every individual and to widen their experience. A regular reader of a daily newspaper is kept acquainted with the leading events not only of his own country but of all countries in the world. Newspapers constituted a great influence. They broadened the outlook and led to unify the races.

The speaker then dwelt at some length on the influence which newspapers had exercised in the international politics of Europe and in removing race hatred. There were, he said, of course other causes at work. But most influential among them had been the newspaper Press. That was a great task to have accomplished.

If there was any aspiring journalist there he would bear in mind that good newspapers were those which were truthful and bad newspapers which could not be relied upon, no matter how well written the articles might be or how distinguished names were associated with them. If newspapers were unscrupulous their value was nil. They were not newspapers, whatever else they might be. It must be admitted that the function of a newspaper was also to influence public opinion by reasonable comments upon the leading events of the day. The greater the weight of their comments the greater were their influence. The function of newspapers were thus divided into two parts—the news service which served the purpose of keeping the reader in touch with the events of the world and then the comments and criticisms of events. The first was generally admitted to be by far the more important. One could not imagine a daily newspaper without comments and a good newspaper was one whose comments were always reliable and whose views were always correct. But newspapers, as every other human invention, had their draw-backs. They sometimes destroyed the sanctity of private life. In India they had not done that to any great extent. In England and in America, especially in the latter country they constituted a veritable bog-beast. In the United States that practice had no limit. Perhaps the President would be able to tell them if there was any law of libel in that country. If there was any it was never called into exercise. It was one of his greatest pleasure, said Mr. Blair, to find that the Press in India was conducted with a certain amount of decency and restraint. Might the Press in India live long to maintain that honourable tradition. Another draw-back about daily journalism was that the editors were compelled to give their views on even an hour's notice on any subject under the sun. With regard to many questions no man could do justice without investigation. But how much investigation was an editor able to undertake when the paper was going to the press—when he was expected to say something about the leading topic of the day? Even with regard to some of his own articles when he came across them casually and read them, he experienced a feeling unlike that experienced by Dean Swift when he read his Gulliver's Travels. He said, "Great God, what genius I was in writing that book!" A journalist was not even adroit enough to conceal his ignorance. Newspapers exercised a great influence in moulding the thought of the readers, consciously or unconsciously. When a journalist went wrong, he also led others astray. Whether the draw-backs of newspapers outweighed their advantages, the fact remained that it was one of those things necessary for civilised mankind. If it was an evil, it was a necessary evil and was likely to remain one for a good many years to come.

Coming to the second question, namely how far journalism opened a career for Indian youths, Mr. Blair said that the Indian possessed a remarkable aptitude for journalism. He took to it as he took to law. Mr. Blair came across a good many Indian journalists of every creed and he could unhesitatingly say that he did not come across one whom he did not admire. Even the lowest among them displayed a power of observation of a high order. While some among them were worthy of respect of the best exponents of Europe. The father of Indian journalism was, he took it, Raja Ram Mohan Roy whose writings were as inspiring at the present time as when they were written, three-quarters of a century ago, then although Keshar Chandra Sen, was not a journalist in the ordinary sense of the term many of his writings displayed the signs which marked the writings of practised newspaper writers. Then coming to latter days they had Shambhuchandra Mukerjee of the Reis and Rayet and Kristo Das Pal of the Hinda Patriot. Mr. Blair doubted whether among the many able writers that Bengal had produced there ever was any man who had a greater command of English than Shambhu Chandra Mukerjee. He had a command of the English language to which not many Englishmen could lay claim. Kristo Das Pal was above all other things a man of stubborn spirit. A manly spirit breathed through his writings which gave them all their charm. Coming nearer to our own time they had Mr. Malabari of Bombay and Mr. Shisir Kumar Ghose, two distinguished journalists who had recently passed away. Coming still further down we had still living and active journalists—Mr. Surendranath Banerjea and Babu Motilal Ghose. It could, of course, be said of Mr. Banerjea that he was more of an orator than a journalist. He had often heard it said that some of Mr. Banerjea's articles were unspoken orations. Moti Babu was more of a journalist and his simple sense of humour was inimitable. Coming to younger class of journalists there was Mr. Mahomed Ali who seemed to combine the qualities of both Mr. Banerjea and Mr. Motilal Ghose. Each of these gentlemen, however, was unique in a way and the fact suggested enormous possibility of Indian journalism. The speaker would hesitate to advise any young man to embark upon the sea of journalism in which there were under currents and hidden rocks for young mariners. The first advice which he would give to the would-be Indian journalist was to be honest. That was a difficult task in most walks of life, especially in journalism. Friends will press a journalist to put back something which ought to appear, or ask him to put in something which ought to be left out. Then, in order to fill so much space in a limited time, a journalist sometimes wrote things which he did not mean. They must resist that temptation. It was better not to write anything which the writer did not mean. The journalist was called upon to exercise the function of a critic. They could not be too careful to see that their criticism was as constructive as possible. To indulge in destructive criticisms was one of the boons of public life in this country. It could not be said that in the writings of Mr. Surendranath Banerjea or Babu Motilal Ghose there was much of constructive criticism. The speaker did not say that no result came out of their criticism. The Patrika hammered at the question of water-supply until Government took up the matter in hand. The Bengalce kept on agitating over the Partition of Bengal until, according to the Government of India, it managed to persuade the Government to believe that the Bengalees would never be satisfied until the Partition was annulled. For the most part, were the criticisms to which the Patrika subjected Government helpful. Did they make any allowance for the difficulty of administration? The speaker was afraid the answer must be "hardly ever." He did not say that Government did not deserve all criticism it got. It deserved perhaps a great deal more. But the man who is a statesman as well as a journalist would try to look at a public question not from the point of view of a critic alone but he must look at it from the point of view as to how far it was expedient for him to criticise. A certain amount of criticism was good for every body including the critic himself. But criticism without offering any hint what was to be done was bad for the critic for Government and also for the people. It was bad for the critic because fault-finding became a habit with him. It was bad for Government because it placed an inferior picture of men and things before Government. It was bad for the people because they obtained one-sided view of things. What is the impression that those editors left upon the minds of the readers? Surely they were that India was poor because of British Government. The European Magistrate was hard upon the Indians when Indians and Europeans were concerned; trade and commerce were practically monopolised by Europeans leaving for Indians nothing but clerkships and jute-growing. That was the impression one could not help carrying. Was that the case? They knew very well that things were not so bad. No one was more aware of the shortcomings of the Government than he was. But it was better than no Government at all. He ventured to say that it was great deal better than what any other foreign Government was likely to be. So long India remained under foreign rule it would not pay her to exchange any other rule for British rule. Those criticisms only made the task of Government more difficult than it need be.

Mr. Blair in passing referred to Snehelata's suicide. How profoundly he said he was moved by the tragic story of the Hindu girl's suicide. He earnestly wished success in the campaign they opened against the evil of extortionate marriage dowry.

Returning to the subject-matter of the lecture Mr. Blair said, "Let your criticisms be constructive whenever possible. Don't merely say this is wrong; but show how it can be put aright with friendly disposition towards Government and towards every body else. Government like individuals are more easily led than driven."

Proceeding the speaker said that it was difficult to establish a reputation for trustworthiness. When one lost it one realised its supreme value. He would say to the aspiring journalist never to get into the habit of doing just what he was to do. They should not do their duty with their eyes fixed on the clock. They must make their paper their first consideration. He asked them to be keen and self-sacrificing.

In conclusion he said to those who were meditating to take up journalism as their profession or those who had already taken the plunge that it rested on them to uphold the tradition of the profession in future. Their admirers—among whom Mr. Blair included himself as he had been an admirer of Bengalee journalists for many years—would watch their efforts with keen interest and applaud your success with heartiest good-will.

Rai Radhacharan Pal Bahadur in addressing the meeting referred to the work of the late Babus Kashinath Ghose, Kishori Chand Mitra, Harish Chandra Mukerjee, Girish Chandra Ghose and Shisir Kumar Ghose in the field of journalism.

Referring to the lecturer's observation that criticisms in Indian Press were not in many instances of a constructive character, the Rai Bahadur said that it must not be forgotten that they laboured under great disadvantages. How often, he asked, they were placed in a position to offer constructive criticisms? That state of things was due to want of reciprocity between the rulers and the ruled which notwithstanding the progressive age was wanting at the present time. At a time when there was no council and other representative institutions as at present editors of newspapers who were inclined to offer criticism were helped by Government in offering such criticism. He remembered when the Press Commission was established. The first Commissioner he remembered was Sir Robert Lethbridge who interpreted the motive and intention of Government to the Press. But at present the Press was in the dark as regards the intention of Government about the measures intended to be enunciated or the objects which led to such enunciation. The Rai Bahadur did not know what led Government to abolish that institution. Although that institution was abolished certain members of the press had the privilege of close association with members of Government and, therefore, were in a position to know the motive and intention of Government and were thus in a position to offer constructive criticism. But at present, notwithstanding councils and representative institutions they were further off from Government. That was the disadvantage under which the Indian press laboured. The Anglo-Indian Press was situated in a different position.

Whatever might be the motive of the criticisms in the Press it should not be said or thought of that they wished a change of masters. They fully appreciated the benefits of British rule. What they learnt to love and what they wanted were the rights of citizenship of the British Empire. They wanted to enjoy the same privileges as other subjects of the Empire. He hoped that their motive should not be misunderstood.

Babu Janan Chandra Rai B. L. in an eloquent speech thanked Mr. Blair for his most interesting lecture.

Mr. Justice Chaudhuri said that the newspaper in India had great possibilities. It was a great power both for good and for evil. That depended on the conductors of newspapers. Mr. Chaudhuri had great faith in their youngmen. He found writings by Indian youngmen which would do credit to any man engaged in journalism in any country. They had great facility of expression—he might almost say a fatal facility of expression. They were blessed with an imagination that helped them and led them to write articles in newspapers which they ought never to have written. The life of a journalist was a strenuous life. He was to write, as they heard from Mr. Blair, on any subject that came before him. That required a great strain. Mr. Blair would bear him out when he said that in England journalists worked for 18 hours a day and that for years to acquire some position as a journalist in England. It was very difficult to acquire a good knowledge of the English language. There was a great scope for them in journalism in the vernacular. Their newspapers should not extend their vision beyond the possible horizon. Mr. Chaudhuri asked them to conduct themselves in a manner which befitted the society to which they belonged. If they could do that they would have done a great deal. They must live according to the circumstances in which they were placed and according to their environments. If they began to do that that would be a great step forward. Having regard to the number of newspapers in the country one was amazed to think that there was no institution in the country where young journalists could get some help or some books of reference and acquire some knowledge of journalism.

One monthly journal published the sensational news that a youngman fell in love with a young lady at Darjeeling while skating and motoring up and down at Darjeeling. They all knew that there could be no skating or motoring up and down at Darjeeling, there might be love-making. That might be a bit of romance but a news of that kind degraded everybody connected with the journal. In taking up journalism as a career they had to equip themselves with the actual knowledge of things to be able to write truly. What Mr. Blair had asked them to do is to be able to think truly and write truly.

With a vote of thanks to the chair and the lecturer proposed by Mr. R. D. Mehta the meeting came to a close.

Warm Girls.

BY JAMES DOUGLAS.

B-R-R-R ! Excuse me ; I can't help doing it. B-R-r-r ! I am thinking of the weather we are having in London this week. It is real Shackleton weather. I am a fresh air man, as a rule. Every morning, W. P., I take my duty walk in Rotten Row. ("W.P." means "weather permitting.") But just now the weather does not permit me to watch the merry little Amazons cantering on their merry little horses beside their merry little men. I really do not know how Achilles contrives to keep up his circulation in the east wind.

B-R-R-R ! How Nelson keeps warm on his monument without Lady Hamilton I cannot imagine. Some of these days his sword will fall from his frost-bitten fingers. I think the nation ought to send up to him a fur coat and a hot-water bottle. The poor, dear lions might also be supplied with cosy red flannel waistcoats. As for the Griffin of Temple Bar, she ought at least to have a muff, and Boadicea deserves a pair of fur-lined gloves. Fancy driving all day and all night at this time of year !

THERE is only one thought that comforts my shivering heart as I wander about the refrigerator of London. The girls are warm. Do not ask me why or how. The girls of London take no notice of the weather. They go about as if they had never heard of pneumonia, or bronchitis, or laryngitis, or tuberculosis, or phthisis, or cata-r-r-h. Sometimes I rub my eyes and wonder whether I have suddenly gone mad when I behold the girls of London breasting the blizz of the blizzard and the freeze of the freezing-point with one yard of frock round their waist and three yards of fur round their elbows. They might at least wear an evening gown when the climate is fit for nothing but Emperor penguins and Esquimaux.

My teeth chatter when I see the snowy throats of these cold-proof coquettes leaping out of their furs and simply asking for inflammation of the lungs. If I were to lay bare my chest to the breezes of the Serpentine and the Round Point I should not live ten minutes ; but these fearless maidens lower their neck-line faster than the thermometer. At present it is at least eighty below zero, and a further drop is anticipated. It is enough to make the mercury strike and the Clerk of the Weather cut his throat. The provoking thing is that the darlings will wear their furs for decoration instead of warmth. I know that there is a legend which declares that there were two holes in the Ark and that Noah stopped one with a dog's nose and the other with a woman's elbow. But surely the girls of London ought to cover more than their elbows !

WHEN I remonstrate with them, they assure me that they are quite warm ; and, unfortunately, I cannot contradict them. They ought to know best, and certainly they present all the appearance of warmth, for the furs are there or thereabouts, although they are not taking any. I suppose they wear them for publication and not necessarily as a guarantee of good faith. A girl with furs on the horizon may seem to be rockless, but so long as the furs are within call she means you to understand that she can be warm whenever she chooses. When is a fur not a fur ? When it is a furbelow.

One thing puzzles me. Why have men less hardihood than women ? Why is the blood of the Nut colder than the blood of the Flapper ? Every Nut who is seen abroad just now wears a sauge scarf round his dainty neck. No Nut ventures to be a chestnut in the open air. It is not strange that the stronger sex should be forced to muffle itself to the chin, while the weaker sex defiantly unmuffles itself to the—well, let us call it the collar-bone ? Is it possible that women are warmer than men ?

I THINK Sir Ernest Shackleton ought to reconsider his plans in the light of the revelations being made this winter. Why should men be allowed to monopolise Polar exploration, when it is evident that women are far more suitable for ice-work ? I advise him to lead an expedition of London girls to the South Pole. They would not notice the cold. Probably they would travel lighter the nearer they got to the Pole. They are wearing less in Bond Street in January than they wore in July, and they are still moulting. It is a case of the colder the fewer. Their stockings, for instance, are growing thin by degrees and beautifully less. Two skirts are hardly equal to half a pair of trousers.

I AM told that the latest stockings are made of invisible enamel blown through a glass tube. The enamel is made of liquid air. If you fan it gently it vanishes in a cloud of vapour. There is a rumour, that the new spring frocks are to be made of liquid air dyed in fast colours to reduce the diaphany. What will happen when they fade heaven only knows. Mrs. Grundy may see through them. B-R-r-r !—London Opinion.

The Ottoman Association.

LORD Lamington, who returned from the Continent specially for this purpose, presided at a meeting of the Ottoman Association, held on the 21st January, at 22, Albemarle Street.

Although the Ottoman Association has been only recently founded, it has already a strong and representative executive committee, composed of Lord Lamington, Lord Bury, Lord Brooke, the Hon. Aubrey Herbert, M.P., the Hon. Walter Guinness, M.P., Lieut.-General Sir Reginald Pole-Carew, M.P., Mr. George Lloyd, M.P., Mr. Harold Cox, General Sir John Brabazon, Major A. Paget, the Hon. Montagu Parker, Dr. M. Gaster, Rev. Dr. H. G. Rosedale, Mr. L. Wills, Mr. O. Wills, Mr. H. Seppings Wright, Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall, Mr. G. Raffalovitch, Dr. A. Pollen, Mr. E. Pennington, and others while Mr. E. N. Bennett and Mr. W. H. Seeds are the hon. secretaries.

The objects of the Ottoman Association are :—(1) To study the needs and conditions of the Ottoman Empire. (2) To help in maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. (3) To promote a cordial understanding between Great Britain and Turkey.

The following resolutions, proposed by the Hon. Walter Guinness M.P., and seconded by the Rev. Dr. H. G. Rosedale, were unanimously adopted :—

"That this meeting views with great concern the proposal brought forward by the British Government that the islands of Chios and Mytilene should become Greek, and is of opinion that such a solution, is likely to be followed by political disturbances in Western Anatolia.

"That this meeting regrets the failure of the British Government to accede to the requests of the Porte for help in its sincere efforts to reform the administration of the Asiatic provinces."

The association has decided to start an energetic campaign to enlighten public opinion on the true state of affairs in the Near East, and to emphasize the political, strategical, and commercial importance to the British Empire of maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

Memorial to Sir E. Grey.

On behalf of the Ottoman Association Lord Lamington, Sir Thomas Barclay, Mr. Harold Cox, Mr. Aubrey Herbert, M.P., Mr. Walter Guinness, M.P., and Mr. E. N. Bennet have addressed to Sir Edward Grey a memorial upon the subjects of : (1) the Eastern Anatolian vilayets and (2) the islands of Samothrace, Lemnos, Chios, and Mytilene. Regarding the first subject the memorial says :—

"It appears to be the case that the Armenian and Chaldean Christians are generally desirous to remain within the Ottoman Empire provided that in addition to the full religious liberty already enjoyed they are guaranteed sound civil administration and real security against violence and ill-usage at the hands of the Kurds. It seems to be equally clear that deliberate efforts are being made by foreign agents to foment civil discord in Eastern Anatolia and frustrate the sincere endeavours of the present Ottoman Government to establish a just and orderly administration in the Armenian provinces. Under these circumstances we regret that His Majesty's Government has not seen fit to accede to the Turkish proposal that a number of able and experienced Englishmen equipped with adequate powers should be employed by the Porte for the purpose of restoring and maintaining order in the disturbed vilayets. . . . By acceding to Turkey's urgent and reasonable request we should not only evince our goodwill to the Ottoman nation but secure the grateful approval of millions of our Moslem fellow-subjects in India and other portions of the Empire."

With reference to the second point, the memorial suggests that Sir Edward Grey should press Italy to evacuate the islands that she has held since the war with Turkey. It directs attention to the opinion expressed by the best naval and military experts (including the association understands, Admiral Limpus, whose services have been placed at the disposal of the Porte by the British Government), that the cession to Greece of the islands of Lemnos, Samothrace, Chios, and Mytilene would be fatal to the security of the Dardanelles, the port of Smyrna, and the adjacent mainland. The association believes that the loss of these islands, after the previous surrender of Ottoman territory in Europe and Africa, would produce a bitter feeling of exasperation in the Turkish nation which may compel the Turkish Government, sooner or later, to re-open hostilities with Greece, while, even if war is avoided, Chios and Mytilene may well be made the base of Hellenic propaganda on the mainland on the lines of the former activities of the Greek bands in Macedonia.

Islam.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Near East.

Dear Sir,—The Ottoman Association proposes to resist encroachments upon the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. This is only an act of justice and a moral obligation, as all Powers who profess to be honest, and not thieves and brigands, would scorn to attempt to appropriate that which is not their own; but it is astonishing what pretences for robbery they can advance, like the wolf in the case of the lamb, when themselves the dishonest aggressors.

This Association also desires to emphasize the strategical and commercial importance of the Ottoman Empire to Britain. There is no question regarding the necessity of this proposition, as the intrigues of the present day are so far reaching and malevolent that at any moment, if not rendered impossible of fruition, they might develop into something that would change the whole aspect of Europe, even with the disappearance of one or other of the Great Powers, such an intrigue and secret alliance having already been proved to be a fact.

Finally, the Association proposes to establish the most cordial understanding between Turks and Britons on all points, and such an understanding is commendable, morally, politically, and from mercantile points of view.

In all this there is no element of violent propaganda; an alliance is a friendly relation, and should any violence ensue, that would be because some Power with less honest motives objected to it, as being a bar to its dishonesty. The violence would only arise from that source, which would certainly get in return the full allowance of its deserts. It is simply desired to keep a watchful eye, so as to be able to counter-act a mischievous use of the Press for scattering broadcast anti-Turkish views and abusive narratives, wholly fictitious, with the deliberate purpose of ruining Turkey and British interests, the centre of the "army of which" absolutely rests upon Turkey, at least in the Eastern hemisphere. On the whole, we think we can deal efficiently with any adversaries of Anglo-Turkish interests in the British Press. Their malignant aspersions and the purpose of them can be easily rendered ridiculous in the eyes of the British public, but a little more effort will have to be exerted to dispose of similar antagonism in the Continental Press, and to obtain a clear insight into its origin and ultimate purpose. However, there is one way of rendering such intrigues entirely abortive. It is all very well to watch the stable door lest the horse shall be stolen; a watch, however careful may, from some cause or other, momentarily fail, and it is much better to lock the door, with a lock that cannot be picked, and watch as well. The only way to do this is to form an alliance with Turkey, as close as it can possibly be made, fully securing the best interests of both England and Turkey. No other Power has a right to object to this, and none have the power to offer Turkey such good terms of mutual interests, owing to the vast numbers of Mohammedans, who look upon Turkey as both fatherland and centre of their religion, but still are British subjects. Unfriendliness with her is both a weakness and danger to Britain; but bonds of friendship, esteem, and business interests bring the strength of both to a maximum.

We declare for an alliance with Islam. "the principle of obedience to the Divine will," one which does not seem to concern or influence politicians in any way; but we can have no principle a tenth part so good before us for observance, and we can form no alliance to be compared with one that includes that principle.

Insight House, Ingleton, near Kirkby Lonsdale.

ROBERT R. M. BALDERSTONE,
Ottoman Association.

Russia and Armenia.

"THE Armenian Question," a pamphlet just published by Captain Dixon-Johnson, may be commended to the attention of all thinking people who desire a happy issue for Turkey out of her difficulties in Asia Minor.

Captain Dixon-Johnson commences his booklet with the quotation in extenso of Sir Charles Wilson's figures with regard to the population of Asia Minor. They show that the Armenians are barely more than one-seventh of the population; and that the Armenians are in a majority in only nine out of the one hundred and fifty-nine Kazas or sub-districts into which Turkey-in-Asia is divided. "Armenian emigration to Adana and Trebizond is due," says the writer, "to Russia's future aspirations, and it was owing to her grasp of the situation that Turkey requested the British Government to lend her officials to aid in the re-organisation of the provinces of Asia Minor."

"The reformed Government of Turkey desires to fulfil her part of the Constantinople Convention by re-organising the administration of her Asiatic Provinces with the help of British officials and looks to Great Britain for the help she is entitled to expect; and so long as Great Britain remains in Cyprus she is bound by the Convention to undertake the onerous obligation of a defensive alliance with Turkey if Russia should attempt to extend her annexations beyond the present frontiers which the present negotiations will assign." (Letter of Lord Salisbury to M. Waddington, July 7, 1878.)

Russia, continues Captain Dixon-Johnson, is said to have objected to the right of Turkey to select European officials for employment in Kurdistan to carry out the necessary reforms, and suggests as a counter proposal:—

"A scheme of international control which would practically abolish the sovereignty of Turkey in her own dominions and which, as an insult to their national prestige, would be most distasteful to the great majority of the inhabitants and would probably lead to their giving vent to their wrath by persecuting the small minority, whom they would naturally consider responsible."

The writer cites four reasons which he avers actuate Russia in objecting to European officials—namely, that British officials would curtail Russia's facilities for smuggling arms into Kurdistan and for introducing agents-procureurs, that the country would be in touch with the Press of Europe, "and the British officials on the spot would fearlessly report the true facts," that the Provinces would become prosperous and Turkey herself would be stronger; and, finally, that "the excuse for intervention would then cease to exist."

The suggested international control is, he continues, proposed by Russia in the hope that either Turkey will refuse point-blank, and her possible subsequent consent will afford time to promote trouble, and thus create an excuse for invasion, or that her (Russia's) claim as the neighbouring State will enable her to predominate on the Commission for the appointment of the officials, and thus, by a round-about way, give her a pretext for intervention.

The following passage speaks eloquently of the reason of the disturbed conditions of Turkey-in-Asia:—

"Until 1877-78 the Armenian's relations with his Kurdish neighbours were not unfriendly; raids by the latter were non-political and non-sectarian, Moslem and Christian suffered equally. Then until the death of Alexander II there followed a period of active propaganda by Russian Consuls; these agents founded schools, encouraged the Armenian language and inculcated the belief in a future Armenian kingdom under Russian protection, a State in which the minute and despised minority were to lord it over the proud Moslem. Incensed and suspicious, the Kurd no longer regarded the Armenian merely as a beast to be fattened and periodically bled. Indifference turned to hatred, and worse followed when, encouraged by the success of the murderous bands in Bulgaria, revolutionary committees were formed in Tiflis and various European capitals whence bands of Nihilists, financed by blackmail levied on the rich Armenian bankers and traders in Europe and America, were sent into these unhappy districts of Asia to stir up strife and bloodshed."

Captain Dixon-Johnson shows how the Armenian has awakened to the benefit of Russian promises, and how Turkey has always recognised the capacity of loyal Armenians by appointing them to high office, and will not forget the courageous conduct of the Armenians during the past war. Russia fears a settlement, and is therefore entirely working against the Turks, and it is Great Britain's duty to accede "to the urgent Turkish request for support and for administrators." Vital reasons are adduced for British action—namely, that the strategic effect of Russia's advance into Asiatic Turkey would be a menace to our interest in the Persian Gulf and to the Indian Empire, while a strong Turkey "might well deter Russia from making a hostile movement through Persia against the Indian frontier."

The Problem of Asiatic Turkey.

A STUDENT of Eastern politics, whether he has traced its history at home or whether he has watched the course of events upon the spot, is often apt to become a partisan of one or other of the many sects and factions, whose mutual antipathies create the "Eastern question." I am painfully aware of an unconscious tendency on my own part to fall into this error, and to sympathize with this nationality or that creed because I imagine I can detect therein some quality which appeals to my ingrained sentiment or emotion within me. This is doubtless one of the failings of human nature. But before going further I beg the reader to believe that in spite of this unconscious tendency, which we all have, I have attempted in this article to see all sides, and to form a judgment, which, even if he does not agree with, he will recognise as sincere.

Last autumn, for the third time in four years, I set out on another journey in search of knowledge about Oriental politics, and with the object of touring the Ottoman Empire from Thrace to Armenia. The Balkans had just been swept by a desolating war; Bulgaria was crushed; Albania born; the Concert of Europe was but a name without prestige south of the Danube. Turkey, once humbled, was now returning to her own through victories won by others, straining eagerly to divert attention from her Asiatic disorders by a further dose of "Balkan narcotic." Such was the position when I reached Constantinople last October to begin a journey into Eastern Thrace.

First of all, it interested me to know what was the effect on Turkey of the re-occupation of Adrianople and the surrounding country, and how far this new move would prejudice her regeneration in Asia Minor. In Constantinople I heard the point of view of the civil official, in Adrianople I heard the point of view of the military, and in bazars and street-corners I heard the views of Turkish public opinion, as far as this is at present articulate. All opinions, including those of many impartial foreign observers, agreed that the position of Turkey under the Treaty of London would have been one which scarcely left room for the exercise of her independence. It was pointed out to me that the Midia-Enos line laid down by the Powers was strategically indefensible. An arbitrary line drawn without regard for physical conditions across a featureless downland, it would have enabled a Bulgarian force on the Ergene at any moment to cut the communications between Chatalja and Dardanelles. The absence of any means of breaking invasion from the north-west and of securing co-operation between the military forces at these two points would make the capital strategically indefensible. Whatever we may think of the method of Turkey's move last August, it is only fair to remember that by that action she exalted herself from a position which practically meant dependence on the will of neighbouring states. I cannot speak with knowledge of military affairs, but the impression that I gathered from various quarters led me to believe that the re-occupation of Eastern Thrace would impose no extra burden upon Turkish Finance. The problem of the defence of that frontier may quite conceivably be solved, not by fortifications at Kirk Kilisse and Dimotika, but by a re-organisation of the methods of mobilisation which affects the Ottoman Empire as a whole.

After a few weeks in Thrace, I crossed the Straits and travelled down the Anatolian railway through the heart of Asia Minor. Here in the vilayets of Konia and Angora the true home of the Turk is to be found. Here live those kind, hospitable, lazy, and long-suffering sons of Osman, who for centuries have borne the burden of empire in order to gratify the greed of tyrants in Stambul. The Turk of Anatolia is the backbone of the Empire, and there he can be seen, living like a highlander in the forested valleys of the Taurus, or on the high plateau of Central Anatolia, cultivating his patches of wheat and maize, and living at peace with his neighbour. His early life on the highland plateau has bred in him a physique fully equal to that of the Cossack, and upon him has fallen the whole burden of military service, which he has borne so uncomplainingly. But in this twentieth century there is at last some sign of material progress, for while other parts of the Empire are distracted by massacres, brigand raids and wars, in Anatolia at least the sword has given place to the plough, and European methods and western education are making slow but sure headway. The great medium of western civilization is Germany whose influence is, I am persuaded, in every way beneficial. By the railways and irrigation works, which her companies and banks are carrying out in co-operation with the Turkish Government, by the building of roads and the establishment of schools, she is, without prejudicing the development of the Ottoman national ideal, introducing European methods into a state of society now worn out and effete. In south-east Anatolia on the plains of Cilicia, western ideas have made even greater headway than on the Anatolian plateau. Here is a large Armenian population in the towns, and the Armenian question has been considerably to the fore of recent years. Unlike Anatolia, which in recent years has never known a massacre, the Cilician plains only a few years ago were the scene of one of the worst holocausts which have ever taken place in Turkey. This was all the more remarkable in view of the growth of western influence, which had undoubtedly got a good footing in those parts even at that time. The massacre at Adana only serves to illustrate the fact that such occurrences as these never take place in Turkey without a direct inspiration from above. But in view of the great crisis through which the Empire was passing at that particular moment, and in view of the peculiarly dangerous form of agitation which had sprung up at the time among the Armenians, a collision, of some sort was hardly surprising. I think it would be safe to say that the advent of the Bagdad railway to the Cilician plains, accompanied by the rush of modern improvements and European methods, will prevent any artificially-organised reprisals between Mohammedan and Christian in future.

As soon as I left the zone of German influence, I at once observed a change to a more primitive state of society. Indeed, it would not be too much to say that if some of the influence which Germany is now exercising in Anatolia and Cilicia were introduced into the Armenian vilayets, we should go a long way towards solving the Armenian problem. Desirous of visiting some of this more primitive country, I made up a small caravan last November at Adana, and tracked into the highlands of Lesser Armenia. The northern parts of the vilayets of Aleppo and Adana contain a large Armenian population, severed from their brethren in the north-eastern vilayets, and forming part of the ancient kingdom of Lesser Armenia, which was known in history as the ally of the Byzantine Emperors. At the present day the Christian population here is confined to the secluded mountain valleys of the Anti-Taurus Range. Thither they have been driven in times past, while the Mohammedan descendants of Seljuk and Saracen inhabit the plains to the north and south. Lesser Armenia is a striking example of the principle that humanity becomes what its environment makes it, for here we find a semi-independent race of highlanders, with six centuries of freedom behind them, not cringing and whining like the Armenians of the Asiatic coast town, but vying with the Caucasian for bravery, and with the Kurd for rascality. During the few weeks that I was in Lesser Armenia, I visited Sis, Hadjin, and Zeitun, the last two places being noted as out-law retreats for the whole countryside. Situated at the head of rocky gorges, these towns consist of mud houses, literally piled, like packs of cards, up the precipitous mountain slopes, and even against cliffs, for protection from enemies in the valleys below. At Zeitun I found a large colony of out laws and brigands, headed by a bishop who had a closer acquaintance with military lore than with principles of theology. A state of warfare existed on all week days between the inhabitants of Zeitun, headed by its bishop and four so-called noblemen, against the Turkish garrison of fort lower down the valley. Raids and forays were frequent on the rocks above the town, one of which I witnessed one evening from the verandah of the bishop's house, between a Turkish out post and a gang of out-laws. The Armenians of Zeitun were up in arms against anything which savoured of central government control. Nothing would persuade them to pay their taxes, or send a soldier to serve in the Turkish Army, while, of course, any caravan of Turkish goods or a flock of sheep passing from one town to the other, was in their eyes a lawful object for plunder. In fact, here is a country unsubdued by Turkey in the heart of her Empire, living in a tribal state, and one can hardly wonder at the Young Turks taking some steps to bring these primitive tribesmen to law and order. But, as usual, their methods have been clumsy and stupid. One of their methods is to find out the Armenian villages lower down the valley, where the Zeitun brigands and out-laws come, and to put pressure upon these innocent peasants in order to make them betray their brethren. As a result, the latter have to a large extent joined the out laws, and the position is made infinitely worse. There is thus a state of guerrilla warfare continually going on in and around Zeitun, with a truce every Sunday. I witnessed the comedy of Oriental warfare one Sunday morning last November, when I attended mass in the ancient Gregorian church on the rock at Zeitun. The Bishop officiated in full robes, and as I reached the church who should I find at the entrance but the Turkish commander of the soldiers with whom the Zeitunlis were at war on week days, accompanied by the "mufti" or Mohammedan chaplain of the Ottoman forces. I shall not readily forget the sight of that gaunt, bare church, perched upon the cliff, half-fortress like, battered by storm and siege for many a century. Within its walls stood the rude Christian altar with its screen of lattice, behind which went forth the ancient Gregorian chants in shrill, weird Eastern strains, while the incense enveloped the body of the little church in its fragrant haze. It was a display of Oriental Christianity, with all its pomp and mystery. And there, crowded in the nave, were the rude picturesque Armenian highlanders, armed to the teeth with knives and rifles, and standing beside me the representative of the Turkish Government, commander of the forces, with whom these highlanders were at war on week days. All of us, whether Christian or Mohammedan, were worshipping at the same shrine, and whatever may be said against Islam, this incident is enough to prove that there is no other religion which shows more tolerance for the rights and customs of other faiths. After the service, the Bishop, the Turkish officials, and myself, all retired to the vestry, where a spread of rice, mutton, and grease was served with wine and cognac. Speeches of a semi-political nature were accompanied by uproarious toasts, and finally the Bishop became very merry, and the Turkish Governor required the assistance of a gendarme to get him out of the room!

Such is the paradox of Eastern life. But no one who visits Lesser Armenia can say that the Armenians are crushed under the heel of a tyrannous Turk. In Zeitun at least, it is the other way. In the country of the Geok Su river, the principal brigand bands are all Armenian. In fact, I found just the same state of affairs here as I found further east, in Greater Armenia, when I visited it last year. The only difference is that here Zeitunli Armenians, and to a certain extent Circassians, are the disturbing element, while in Greater Armenia that function is usurped by the Kurds. Gradually the Turks are penetrating both these districts, and indeed, considerable progress has been made in the last ten years in building roads, and in establishing gendarmic posts in these highlands. An Armenian missionary, whom I met at Marash, and who had lived forty years on the borders of this country, told me that he had himself witnessed during that time a great improvement in the social state of the population. Raids on villages by robber bands are less frequent, as compared with former times, the power of the tribal chiefs is less, and gradually the Turkish Government is asserting its control.

Leaving the Armenian highlands, I reached the Syrian plains, and here I crossed the social dividing line north of which the population consists of Turks and Armenians, and south of which the Arabs commence, and form the bulk of the population up to the edge of the Arabian Desert. This line runs from Aintab to Urfa and Diabekr. The Arab-speaking population of the surrounding plains have little in common, either historically, racially, or politically, with the Turk of Asia Minor. The present-day descendants of Seljuk and Saracen have each other but little. The Arab despises the Turk, because he has sharper wit and keener intelligence. Partisans of the Arabs, however, forget that their one great failing is their lack of coherence and of constructive ability, of which the Turk, with all his faults, has some small amount. The Turk is able to govern the Arab because he can conceive a plan and carry it out with a stolid perseverance unknown to the Arab. The result of this difference in character, due I think partly to race and partly to environment, has caused the Arab question recently to become acute, and has threatened to disturb the stability of the Ottoman Empire in a part hitherto regarded as invulnerable. In Damascus and Aleppo I met several members of the Arab party, and from them I gathered the nature of the demands which they are making upon the Turkish Government. The chief points of their programme are: recognition of Arabic as an official language for Government offices and Law Courts; the increase of schools in which Arabic is the medium of instruction; the restriction of the native liability for military service to the Syrian vilayets. The principle of all these proposals has been admitted by the Turks, and at present the first two have been carried out, but the settlement of the third is still pending. Thus the Arab and Syrian problem in the south-east of the Ottoman Empire differs from the Armenian problem in the north-east in at least one respect. While the former can only be solved by tactful concessions based on Home Rule for local nationalities, the latter requires a policy of consolidation of the power of the central government, so as to control a still primitive Nomad and highland population. The former problem requires the exercise of a little common sense in Istanbul, but the latter cannot be solved without the application of European assistance to the central Turkish authority. In Armenia an adequate nucleus of European officials must be introduced into the local administration and the gendarmerie, and must be accompanied also by the construction of roads and railways along the principal trade routes. There are two ways of accomplishing this. Firstly, the eastern vilayets may be separated from the rest of Asia Minor and put under direct international control, with Russia as the agent of the Powers. This, of course, as the history of Russia in Central Asia shows, would be tantamount to Russian annexation. On the other hand, I can testify from what I saw when I was in the Caucasus and Turkestan in 1911, that those parts of Central Asia which had been definitely annexed by Russia have benefited to a certain extent by the comparatively orderly and peaceful rule which she has brought in her train. But I also did not fail to see that this result is obtained at the expense of local nationalism, and is in direct antagonism to the spread of the Mohamedan idea, and of anything that makes for the regeneration of the east on the lines of native culture. Russia absorbs every race she comes in contact with, and while her expansion has been materially beneficial up to a point, so far as it has gone, nevertheless there is no reason why she should be allowed to acquire the hegemony of Asia and to overwhelm the Moslem nationalities of the east, who are struggling to regenerate themselves, in a wilderness of crude Slavism. It is true that the Caucasus has recently been blessed with a humane and progressive viceroy, but it is not a decade since the confiscation of the Armenian church properties, the massacre of Baku, and the terror of the Galitsia régime. Anyone who knows Russian politics is aware of the constant danger of reactionary upheavals, and of the peculiarly unstable state of that country internally. Moreover, the history of Russia's Finish and Polish policy is not calculated to inspire confidence in the minds of Russian Armenians. From the conversations I had with Armenian ecclesiastical dignitaries in Turkey last autumn, and also with certain members of the "Dashnakstion," I am strongly under the impression that Turkish Armenians would infinitely prefer to remain under Turkish rule, provided that they can secure benefits of law and order in the remoter parts of Asia Minor, where at present they are at the mercy of Khurdish tribes. They realise, in fact, that under Turkish rule their religious freedom and autonomy are recognised by the capitulations, and that there is infinitely more chance of the development of their national culture than under the Russifying policy of the St. Petersburg Government. Why, therefore, should such drastic measures as a Russian protectorate for Armenia be adopted when the process of civilising the eastern vilayets of Turkey is going on steadily, if slowly, under Turkish rule at the present time, albeit under conditions of peculiar difficulty? As I have shown, the independent witness of American missionaries is on the side of Turkey, and after all it is only six years since the Empire has been rid of the corrupt rule of the single tyrant. Now, because a group of enthusiastic, if inexperienced, Jews and Turks have grasped power in Istanbul, and have failed to convert the whole of Asia Minor in six years into a Paradise, is that any reason for allowing Armenia to be crushed under the heel of the Cossack? It is merely exchanging one tyrant for another, without having even attempted to reform the first. When I was in North-West Persia last year, I saw the working of Russian diplomacy at Baku and Kotur, where Khurdish chieftains were being bribed by Russian agents to keep up a state of disorder along the Turko-Persian frontier in order to embarrass the local Persian governors and Turkish Kaimakams. A fuller account of my observations was contributed to the Contemporary Review for April, 1913. I would ask, therefore, has Turkey had a fair chance? It is well known that nothing would assist Armenian reform more than the construction of railways and roads; but a treaty between Turkey and Russia prevents the former from constructing any railways in the Armenian vilayet without Russia's permission. Thus Russia, while unctuously pretending to favour Armenian reform, at the same time withholds one of the chief methods of effecting it. Moreover, the recent action of Russia, in preventing British officers from being used to reform the gendarmerie in Armenia, indicates that Russia is interested in Armenia, not in order to reform it, but to make it a stepping-stone for further advance southwards. Mr. Noel Buxton, whose opinions on this subject I cannot share, in his article in the Nineteenth Century for December, appears to maintain that the north-eastern vilayets of Asia Minor could be annexed to the Caucasus without any effect on the political situation in the middle east. He tries to prove at one point that "the boundary of true Armenia is the 'highland, with its borders in the lofty hills north of the Diabekr,'" and argues that she could quite well annex the country north of this point without affecting the other parts of the Ottoman Empire. As one who has traversed a part of the territory in question, let me say that to my knowledge no such natural boundary exists. North-east Asia Minor, like the rest of the central Asian plateau, is traversed by disjointed mountain ranges, cut off at various points so that no definite physical boundary over a large area of the country can be traced. Thus the mountains north of Diabekr are not contiguous with the end of the Anti-Taurus on the west, nor do they form an impenetrable wall to anyone journeying south, since the Euphrates cuts a gap right through them. In fact, the saying of Moltke, who knew that country half a century ago, is full of meaning: "The power that holds Erzerum can control the lower reaches of the Euphrates." Moreover, the whole history of Asia Minor shows that a political power in its eastern provinces must sooner or later permeate the whole of the continent, for the physical conditions are such that access east and west is even easier than access north and south. If Russia advances beyond the Araxes, she will be able to dominate Mesopotamia on the south, and Anatolia on the west. The apologists of Russia in this country fail to realise that an Anti-Turk campaign is merely assisting Russia to convert that country into another Azerbaijan, and to re-enact the tragedy of north-west Persia on the plateau of the Upper Euphrates.

What, then, is the alternative scheme? The most common-sense policy, and the one which seems to be in process of adoption by the Powers at the present moment, is to assist Turkey to reform the north-eastern vilayets by supplying her with the means of carrying out reform. The re-organisation of the gendarmerie and of the finances under European officials would be accompanied by the appointment of European Inspectors-General to act in co-operation with the Turkish Governors-General. In the event of disagreement between these two heads, the matter at issue would be referred to the Sublime Porte, and the Powers, if united, would be able to bring diplomatic pressure to bear in the settlement of any such dispute. The Porte is believed to be willing to agree to these conditions, which do not infringe the sovereignty of the Empire, but at the same time introduce the elements of reform. The chief difficulty here is the question of the nationality of the European officials. Russia objects to any foreign officials in Armenia who are not sub-ervient to her "high policy" and ulterior designs. If England backs Russian diplomacy and becomes a party to an unofficial "triple entente," she will have to sacrifice not only the idea of a reformed Ottoman Empire, but also her duty to the Armenians, to say nothing of her own prestige as an eastern Power. To my mind, the best solution would be found by introducing officials from the neutral States of Europe. The Swedish gendarmes and the Belgian Customs officials in Persia have shown what can be done under most trying circumstances by subjects of neutral nationalities. Moreover, the Dutch in the East Indies have given distinct proof of ability to govern Orientals. In this way, therefore, and by the construction of roads and railways in the east of Asia Minor, the Armenian problem can be solved, and then it will be seen to be only a part of the general problem of consolidating the central authority in the eastern provinces of the Ottoman Empire. I maintain that this can be done without infringing the sovereignty of the Sultan, and without giving the already over-gorged Russian Bear yet another slice of the juicy East. History must once again repeat itself, and another wave of western civilisation must sweep across the continent from the Bosphorus to the Euphrates. Asia Minor has had many of such waves before, Aryan, Hittite, Greek, Parthian, Roman, Arab, Seljuk, and Osmanli; all these represent successive waves of civilisations, which have surged to and fro across this highway between east and west. But the new wave of the twentieth century, coming from the west, will, we hope, not be accompanied by those violent political commotions military invasions, and social upheavals, which have characterised the race movements of history, but will rather prove to be a peaceful penetration, which under the influence of western science and industry will herald a new era. What Peter the Great did for Russia in the eighteenth century, when he introduced Germans to reform his Government, can also be done for Turkey in the twentieth century. Previous attempts to introduce foreign officials into Turkey have failed because of the lack of sympathy between Turk and European. Mutual hostility, based on religion, has created a barrier which up to now has been unsurmountable. But the days are at hand when Europe will realise that Islam and Christianity, so far from being enemies, are but different aspects of the same great fundamental truth. The awakening of Islam from the lethargy of centuries will thus be stimulated by its contact with a sympathetic Europe, and will have its first-fruits in the material progress of the continent of Asia Minor, one of the fairest lands of the Ottoman Empire.—M. PHILIPS PRICE in The Contemporary Review.

Indians in South Africa.

LORD AMPHILL addressed the members of the United Empire Club on January 28 on the Indian problem in South Africa.

THE SPEECH.

The question, he said, was one of vital importance to the Empire, and not one of a mere strike for the abolition of a £3 poll-tax in Natal. The real origin of the controversy was to be found in the year 1858, when the memorable proclamation of Queen Victoria to the people of India established for them the Charter of their rights and their liberties. The Indians of South Africa were not agitating for votes or for equal political rights with the white inhabitants of South Africa, but were only asking for that which had been actually promised to them, not only by the British Government, but by successive Governments of South Africa. If British subjects were ill-treated in a foreign country we should demand that their wrongs were righted, and would enforce that demand with Dreadnoughts and troops, and we should certainly prevent one of our own partners from doing irreparable damage to the Imperial concern. It had been urged that the solution was to be found in deporting the Indians and helping them to colonise elsewhere, but the Indians in South Africa did not want to go, and they had every right to stay there. They had more right than some of the cosmopolitan riff-raff who received an undue welcome there. The Colony of Natal would have been impossible without Indian labour in the fields and in the mines.

With regard to the present situation, after 12 years of persistent appeal, patient endurance of suffering, passive resistance, heroic self-sacrifice and repeated disappointed hopes, an arrangement was made between the Union Government and Mr. Gandhi, the high-minded leader of the Indian community, and if the Union Government had faithfully carried out their part of the agreement the trouble would have been at an end, but they did not do so. It was agreed (1) that legislation should be passed in the following session repealing the obnoxious Act of 1907; (2) that there should be no racial bar in any future legislation; (3) that existing rights should be maintained; (4) that there should be an amnesty for passive resistors. The promised legislation was not passed till last year, and then it did not fulfil the two essential conditions of the compact—removal of the racial bar and maintenance of existing rights.

The Immigrants' Regulation Act, moreover, prejudiced the rights of Indians and brought about a new grievance in failing to recognise the validity of marriage between Hindus and Mohamedans. The poll tax was always oppressive, and it was promised that it should be repealed. That tax was required simply as an instrument wherewith to drive back the coolies into indenture. He reminded them of the public spirit displayed by the Indians when they refrained from taking part in the strike which took place on the Rand some time ago. They were not, he said, contenting for material advantages, but for a high ideal—the honour of their race. The position at the present moment was that a modus vivendi was being maintained, pending enquiry into the origin of the disturbance, and all we could do now was to wait patiently for the report of the Commission in the hope that it would lead to a fair solution of the problem. There had been scandalous mismanagement of this question during the past 14 years, which had led to widespread indignation throughout the length and breadth of India. If there were much delay in the settlement of the question there might well be a dangerous agitation in India which would be fraught with the gravest peril. The South Africans were a virile race and had a virile way of managing affairs, as we had seen during the past few days. (Loud applause.) What they wanted was straight talk from the Imperial Government. The people of this country had not the faintest idea what this question meant to them, nor how completely it was within their right that it should be settled with justice, and immediately.

India, from every point of view, was worth more to us than South Africa, and if it were a choice between offending India and offending South Africa, there could be no shadow of doubt which alternative should be chosen; but there was no need to offend either, if wiser and fairer counsels at last prevailed. The real enemies of the Indians in South Africa were not, for the most part, Englishmen or Boers, but the cosmopolitan class of aliens of whom he had some knowledge even in the heart of this great metropolis—people who repaid the protection and excessive hospitality they enjoyed under the British flag by bringing discredit upon the British name. It only required a little statesmanship to bring about a just settlement of this vital problem of Empire.

THE DISCUSSION.

According to the Manchester Guardian, this speech placed the members of the United Empire Club in somewhat of a dilemma, for, while they were asked by Lord Amptill to protest against the treatment of British Indians by the South African Government, they were warmly in sympathy, as they testified by their applause, with the "virile" action of the same Government in regard to Europeans during the last few days. The only logical way out of the difficulty was to commend the action of the Government in the case of the British Indians, and this was the course which most of the speakers took, rather to the discomfiture of Lord Amptill.

Lord Amptill introduced the subject as one of vital importance to the Empire, and complained of its neglect by the Press. As a nation we had not yet learnt to think imperially. "It does not pay," he said; "Imperial business does not attract votes." It was said we were unable to fulfil pledges because South Africa was a self-governing dominion. That, he held, was an unsound and cowardly excuse. There was no law of any dominion which could be enacted without the consent of the Crown, and in the new constitution a right in matters of this kind had been specially reserved. If British subjects in any part of the world were ill-treated, should we say we had no power to interfere?

It had been proposed by Mr. Richard Jebb that a solution was to be found by deporting the Indians of South Africa to some tropical territory and starting them in colonisation with an Imperial grant. ("Hear, hear," remarked a member). "If you favour that," replied Lord Amptill, "you should advocate the same solution of the Irish difficulty. (Laughter.) Why not deport Ulstermen to New Zealand or to Botany Bay? It is quite true some such way of cutting the Gordian knot has been advocated in the case of the suffragettes. The difficulties in the way of deporting Ulstermen and suffragettes are precisely the same which are in the way of deporting Indians from South Africa. The Indians of South Africa do not want to go, and they have every right to stay. South Africa is their home. They have more right to be there than the somewhat cosmopolitan riff-raff who receive an undue and excessive welcome in South Africa." ("Oh.")

In the course of discussion, Mr. Richard Jebb maintained that the ultimate aim of the Indians was social and political equality, and that the South Africans had a perfect right to prevent further immigration and to prevent those already there encroaching on the field open to white labour. Did the defenders of the British Indians proposed to send an army to fight the 80,000 burghers who so lately gathered to protect the railways? There was no solution except persuading the bulk of those Indians to leave the country.

Other speakers urged that regard must be paid to the views of the South Africans themselves.

Fevers and Feverish Colds.

The quick and sure action of

Kephaldol

in reducing high temperatures to normal, gives to this great natural remedy an altogether priceless value in the treatment of all kinds of fevers and feverish colds.

Sold in two sizes, 1/12 and 2/9, by all Chemists and Stores throughout India.

Kephaldol relieves the burning in the head, allays pain, soothes the nerves, and brings that sweet rest which means a speedy restoration of health. For Colds, Influenza, Catarrh, and similar complaints, Kephaldol is unequalled. A tablet or two of Kephaldol taken at the first indication of trouble will unfailingly arrest its development and restore health.

Kephaldol is widely used in medical practice. It leaves no after depression or bad effects on the heart or ears, as Quinine and all similar preparations do. It can be taken regularly without losing its effects. NEVER BE WITHOUT KEPHALDOL. ITS CONSTANT USE GUARANTEES YOUR HEALTH.

Kephaldol may be obtained in two sizes, from all Chemists and Stores throughout India. In case of difficulty in procuring locally, write to us, and a tube, large or small, will be sent at Rs. 2-4 or Re. 1 respectively on receipt of a money order, or per V. P. P.

Complete directions in English and Vernacular languages are supplied with each Package.

KEPHALDOL, Ltd.,

15, Elphinstone Circle,
BOMBAY.

WANTED.

An English-knowing Mohamedan experienced Head Clerk for the Office of the All-India Muslim League from 1st April. Only those who know accounts, type-writing and short-hand need apply with testimonials to the undersigned. Salary Rs. 50--70 per mensem.

An experienced Mohamedan typist for the said Office from 1st April. One acquainted with short-hand is preferred. Salary Rs. 25--30.

Mohammad Yusuf Khan,
Assistant Secretary,
All-India Muslim League, Lucknow.

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HERKE, CONSTANTINOPLE.

Turkish Fezes made in Turkey

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpaks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

Benarsi Mansions, Delhi.

11-5-14
Sole-Agents for India
for Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople

EVER SINCE INVITED.

"LEUCODERMA" Specific is the only cure for WHITE LEPROSY". Numerous testimonials from all parts of India. For particulars apply—

B. N. DIXIT, 69, Shanwar, Poona.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes : "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (18s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parchez necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

Our increasing output bears witness to the ever-growing demand for our products for Cricket, Tennis, Hockey and all games. Sportsmen realize that "the Perfecta" quality is unequalled. Graceful in design, they are lightly yet strongly made, giving pleasure to every user.

At the same time we make other qualities—to suit every pocket and can surely please you. Many hundreds of Clubs and thousands of individual players are using our goods to-day.

Why not send for a Catalogue now and join in their satisfaction.

Uberoi LIMITED,
SIALKOT

(Formerly Ganda Singh Oberoi & Co.)

The Delhi Academy of Architecture. BENARSI MANSIONS, CHANDNI CHOWK.

For imparting up-to-date training in Architecture and Building Construction on Western lines.

Apply to—
THE PRINCIPAL.

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper, Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

NOTICE.BENGAL VETERINARY COLLEGE.

Candidates for admission into the Bengal Veterinary College should be present at the College at Belgachia, Calcutta, with necessary certificates in original, as required in the rules at 11 A.M. on 15th April 1914. Rules will be supplied free on application.

A. SMITH, Major,
Principal, Bengal Veterinary College.

Don't shout but ring.
The Standard Electric Bell sets, mounted on polished stand. 20 yds. wire and 6 months battery ... Rs. 7-8
65 yds. 1 year Rs. 11-0
Clarion Bell Set Rs. 5-0

EAST-WEST CO.

Chandni Chowk,
DELHI

I beg to inform my patrons and public in general that owing to increase of my Business I have removed to larger Premises No. 17, Chowringhee, Grand Hotel Arcade. The Sight-Testing Room is now fitted up with Dark Room and all the latest Instruments. And Dr. F.I.O., F.S.M.C., D.B.O.A., (London) and late Assistant Central Ophthalmic Hospital, London and Freeman of the City of London attends daily.

N. LAZARUS,
Ophthalmic Opticians, Grand Hotel Arcade,
CALCUTTA.

For Stationery write to—

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

Make Hosiery at Home & Earn More Money.

As much as Rs. 60
per mensem can be earned regularly by making hosiery for us.

No experience is necessary. Men, Women,
Boys and Girls, all can make themselves earning units in their family. No lengthy tuition—No Premiums—
No monthly Fees to pay—Just the small price of a DURBAR
AUTO-KNITTER and you become a worker and wage earner at once.

Another Million Workers WANTED

We have at present millions of workers, all over the world, all busy—very busy, supplying us with socks, stockings, etc., but they are not sufficient. We cannot meet the great demand for hosiery made on our DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS—We want a MILLION MORE—We WANT YOU. Write for full particulars TO-DAY.

Read what a worker says:—

DEAR SIR,—I beg to inform you that I have sent you two paid parcels, one on the 14th instant and the other to-day, containing half a dozen pair of Gent's Socks each and request that you will be kind enough to return me the quantity of wool consumed in them and pay my usual wages at an early date. Thanks very much for the nice little machine you sent me, and it runs so smoothly that I can be able to knit daily half-a-dozen pairs of Gent's Socks and when speeds comes a few more pairs can easily be knitted. Wishing you every success.

Puri, 16th August 1918.

I am, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,
(Sd.) MRS. N. PEDDING.

Genz. Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS, 11-2 Lindsay Street,
Department No. 36, CALCUTTA.

RULING BY MACHINE

LEDGERS AND CASH BOOKS SUPPLIED

BINDING UNDERTAKEN

DIE STAMPING NEATLY DONE

MONOGRAMS ENGRAVED

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED

TRIAL ORDER SOLICITED.

THE COMRADE PRESS, DELHI.

THE

“JEUNE TURC”

An Ottoman Daily Journal.

Address:—CONSTANTINOPLE, PLACE DU TAXIM No. 8.

The Jeune Turc is the organ of the modern life of New Turkey.

The Jeune Turc gives the most exact and early information about the Political, Economical and Social life of the Ottoman Empire and of the Balkan States.

The Jeune Turc publishes Political, Literary and Economical articles on all questions connected with the New East and teems with humorous literature palpitating with Political life.

Whoever wants to keep himself well informed about whatever passes in Turkey and the Balkan States ought to subscribe

FOR THE

“JEUNE TURC”

A paper, having the greatest circulation in the East.

Subscription for Foreign Countries:

For a year Rs. 24/- For 6 months Rs. 15/- & for 3 months Rs. 7/6

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 7. Single Copy
No. 10. Annas 4. Delhi: Saturday, March 7, 1914. Annual Subscription
Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page.		Page
WEEK	... 189	THE INDIAN PRESS ACT, 1910	... 198
OUR LONDON LETTER	... 190	INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA	... 198
TESTS & TESTS—		BOOKS AND READERS	... 200
Our Supporters.	... 192	THE ENCYCLOPAEDIC MIND	... 200
The Late Earl of Minto	... 192	THE LIMITS OF GOVERNMENT
The Agra Medical School	... 193	BY CONSENT	... 201
Mosques and Burial Grounds...	193	MILITANCY: THE MORAL	... 202
A hot tomb	... 194	THE GIFFORD LECTURES—
The Financial Boycott of		The Mathematical Calculus	... 203
Turkey	... 194	On Mill	... 203
IMMEDIATE ARTICLE—		Guiding Beliefs	... 204
The Press Act—VIII	... 194	LEG MUFFS	... 205
The Financial Statement	... 196	ADVERTISEMENTS	... 206—208

The Week.

Epirus Ferment.

The autonomists in Epirus propose to declare a republic so soon as the provisional Government, which is being organised, is complete.

London, Feb. 28.

Valona, Mar. 2.

Mr. Zographos, formerly Greek Governor-General in Epirus, has been elected the head of the autonomous Government of northern Epirus and has telegraphed to the International Commission in Albania, saying that in accordance with the resolutions adopted by Argyrocastro a few days ago, the Epirotes will never recognise an Albanian Sovereign and that even if Greece withdraws her troops, the Epirotes will place every obstacle in the way of any Albanian gendarmerie sent to occupy the territory.

Athens, Mar. 3.

The Greeks have handed over Korytza to the Albanian authorities. An official communique states that there is much unrest at Delvine and Argyrocastro. The Government, while instructing the local authorities not to recognise Mr. Zographos, who has just been elected head of the autonomous Government in Epirus, advises them not to take coercive measures against him as his presence is the guarantee of patriotism and moderation. The Government has given orders to the authorities to prevent the emigration of the population. The flag of autonomy has been raised at Santi Quaranta where the Greek authorities are helpless. Delvine is surrounded by insurgents.

Athens, Mar. 3.

Despite all military measures, 3,000 insurgents assembled outside Delvine.

M. Zographos proclaimed the autonomy of Epirus declaring that the Epirotes were prepared to die in the defence of their liberties, and concluded by calling for cheers for King Constantine. Greek soldiers participated in the demonstration.

London, Mar. 3.

The situation in Epirus somewhat resembles the state of affairs in Ulster. The self-proclaimed autonomous Government refuses to be annexed to Albania, and relies upon Greek troops refusing to enforce the annexation upon their compatriots, and even deserting to help them.

Albania.

Vienna, Feb. 28.

The Emperor Francis Joseph to-day received Essad Pasha's Albanian deputation in special audience. His Majesty hoped that the Altanians were now united. The future of Albania would then be assured.

The deputation afterwards lunched with Court Berchtold.

London, Mar. 5.

Prince William of Wied and his consort embark at Trieste to-day for Durazzo. They will be escorted by an international fleet. The difficulties awaiting the new Sovereign are evidenced by the spread of the Epirote revolt and the outbreak of inter tribal fighting among Albanians.

Cetinje: A telegram also reports that the Mohamedans of Skutari have decided not to send a deputation to greet the Prince.

Persia.

London, Feb. 25.

In the House of Commons, in reply to Mr. Morrell, Sir Edward Grey declared that according to the latest information the Russian troops in Northern Persia numbered 14,200, showing a reduction of 3,800 since July 8th last year. Orders had also been issued for the withdrawal of the bulk of the troop from Kazvin.

Replying to a question from Colonel Yate, Sir Edward Grey said that there was no reason to believe that the Persian Government would not readily admit the claim for prolongation of the option concerning the Mohammerah-Khoramabad Railway surveys of which had been delayed by disturbances in Luristan.

London, Feb. 27.

In the course of the discussion in the House of Commons yesterday on the supplementary Estimates for the Treasury, reference was made to the advances to Persia from the Treasury. Several Opposition members criticised the procedure. Mr. Montagu said that a sum of fifty thousand sterling would be reimbursed out of the Foreign Office Vote, and that no inconvenience had been caused by the measure adopted.

London, Mar. 3.

In the House of Commons, Colonel Yate raised the question of Kerman and Persian-Baluchistan and asked whether, if the Bandar-Abbas-Kerman Road was unsafe, Sir Edward Grey would consider the advisability of lending a few British and Mohamedan officers to form a force of Persian levies to protect the road.

Sir Edward Grey:—The new Governor-General, Bakhtiari Khan is proceeding to Kerman, and it is expected that he will preserve order. Therefore I am not contemplating taking the suggested steps.

Teheran, Mar. 3.

Fighting continues at Kazerun. Two Swedish Captains, Killander from Shiraz, and Lunberg from Bushire, have entered the town with reinforcements.

London, Mar. 5.

Bushire: The gendarmerie has re-occupied Kazerun and it is reported that the tribesmen are fleeing.

Teheran: Nasridiwan and his men have been driven out of Kazerun by the gendarmes.

The Persian Legation declares that Ohlson has not been killed, but that he has gone to Shiraz.

The Estimates for Foreign and Colonial Service include £220,000 for the Persian loan.

H. H. the Begum of Bhopal.

Aligarh, Mar. 1.

Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal has been pleased to make a grant of twenty-five thousand rupees for the building of the central offices of the All-India Mohamedan Educational Conference at Aligarh.

Aligarh, Mar. 3.

Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal left here for Delhi by motor yesterday. Her son, Prince Major Hameedullah, invited her as the Captain of the College Cricket Team to an "At Home." She made a permanent grant of two hundred rupees monthly towards the Cricket Club of the College.

Her Highness performed a number of ceremonies in connection with the female education movement and laid the foundation-stone of the new Zenana Boarding House to be named after her the Sultana Boarding House.

An address was presented to Her Highness on this occasion. In replying, she laid great stress on equally looking to both the wheels of the communal cart. She then declared open another boarding house in connection with the Mohamedan Girls' School lately established. Her Highness the Begum of Janjira and a large number of Mussalman ladies from Lahore, Moradabad, Lucknow, Allahabad, Hyderabad, Delhi, Karachi and other places, also some European ladies of the station attended the ceremony, after which the ladies assembled in their Zenana Conference presided over by Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal and held in the newly opened Zenana School. It was resolved that the Conference be held annually. The other resolutions passed dealt with social reform and the constitution of the Conference. Her Highness then visited the science laboratory of the College, and bestowed Khalats on Maulana Haqqi and Qazi Jalaluddin, Professors of the College.

Delhi Estimate.

London, Mar. 3.

In the House of Commons to-day, Sir J. D. Rees inquired respecting the estimated total cost of the move of the capital to Delhi.

Mr. Roberts replied that there would probably be some excess over the original estimate of four million, but how much, could not be said at present. The Government of India was closely scrutinizing the engineers and architects' proposals with a view to effecting all possible economies.

Our London Letter.

London, 13th Feb, 1914.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

The State opening of the new Parliamentary Session and the all-absorbing Ulster debate, which has followed the Speech from the Throne, have eclipsed all other matters during this week. The unusual course adopted by the Opposition in forthwith moving an Official Amendment to the Address on the Irish question has naturally deprived the House of Commons of the opportunity for engaging into a general discussion, during the debate on the Address, and thus matters of Imperial interest in other parts of the Empire have been necessarily ignored so far. However, now that the Ulster problem has been for the time being set aside, as far as the Commons debate on the above Amendment is concerned, it is hoped that the subsequent course of debate in the House will lead to an interesting discussion on matters affecting the British dominions beyond the Seas as well as the numerous important problems in foreign affairs, which are at present in a rather unsettled condition.

The King's Speech has been singularly devoid of Indian interest. Apart from a brief reference to the regrettable failure of the rains in the peninsula last autumn, no mention is made of anything else, though it was fully expected that the Speech would at least touch upon the Indian question in South Africa, which is undoubtedly one of the gravest problems that has ever presented itself to the British Government. The House of Commons, however, will soon be able to discuss this Imperial question, as Mr. MacCallum Scott's Amendment, which "regrets that no mention is made of any amelioration of the position of British Subjects of Indian origin in South Africa," is coming before the House in a day or two. No doubt the debate on this Amendment will be followed with intense anxiety by all those who are fully aware of the importance of the subject to the Empire as a whole.

LONDON SCHOOL OF ORIENTAL LANGUAGES.

It is satisfactory to note that good progress is being made with the project for establishing a School of Oriental Languages in London. The Government have intimated that they will approve of the incorporation of the School in the University of London after the passing of an Act in substantial accordance with the recommendations of Lord Haldane's University Commission; and, pending such legislation, the School is to be established under Royal Charter. According to the "Times," the draft charter has been already approved by the Privy Council and communicated to the various bodies to whom it is proposed to give representation on the governing Council. It is hoped that contracts will be settled in April and that the work will be completed early next year. The Government have undertaken the financial responsibility for the structural adaptation of the buildings, now belonging to the London Institution in Finsbury Circus, which are to be repaired and extensively altered to meet the necessary requirements. It is estimated by the Committee, of which Lord Cromer is Chairman, that the annual cost will be £14,000. The Government grant will be £4,000 and that of the India Office from Indian revenues £1,250. An appeal is to be made for an endowment fund and for annual grants and subscriptions.

This School will certainly provide an institution here, which has been a long-felt want. Curiously, though England's interests in the East are enormous, she has been sadly neglecting to place suitable facilities before the large number of Englishmen, who are serving, or about to serve, in India and other parts of the East, for acquiring an adequate knowledge of the Oriental languages. In Germany and France, however, the case is quite different, as Berlin and Paris can already boast of excellent Schools, where Oriental languages are taught by efficient teachers.

The scheme has the best wishes of all those who have the true interests of the British Empire in India at heart. Efficient knowledge of Oriental languages, particularly those spoken in India, on the part of British officials cannot but lead to that desirable degree of mutual understanding and promote that harmony and concord between the Indian and the Englishman, which are so essential for the successful administration of that great Dependency of the Empire.

CAMBRIDGE: APPOINTMENT OF ORIENTAL TEACHERS.

The Foreign Service Students Committee have appointed the following gentlemen as University teachers:—Shaykh Ahmad Abdul Khayr-ud-Din in Arabic; Husayn Kazim Zade in Persian; and Ali Riza Bey in Turkish.

INTEGRITY OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE.

A meeting under the auspices of the Ottoman Association was held in Cannon Street Hotel on the 11th inst. with the object of arousing public interest in the importance of maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. Sir Thomas Barclay, who was in the chair, moved the first resolution opposing the interference of the Powers in the internal affairs of Turkey, and declared that from the outset of the Balkan crisis, even from the beginning of the Turco-Italian War, business in the city of London had been placed at a standstill. Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall read a letter from a Turkish business man, who complained that Turkey was in the hands of a gang of shady and unscrupulous foreign speculators. The motion, which was seconded by Sir J. D. Rees, M. P. and supported by Mr. T. Harper and Mr. Darvaz, was carried unanimously.

Mr. Harold Cox moved "That this meeting regrets that the recent policy of Great Britain has the appearance of having been persistently directed against the Turkish Empire." He admired Sir Edward Grey as a man and a speaker, but could not admire his foreign policy, which had been marked by a long series of blunders and disasters. The whole policy of Great Britain, since Sir Edward Grey went to the Foreign Office, had been marked by deliberate subservience to Russia, and the intention appeared to be to keep Turkey weak to be ready to be swallowed by Russia. Sir Edward Grey was unable to move hand or foot until he received his instructions from St. Petersburg. A similar policy had been followed in regard to Tibet and Persia. There had been a complete departure from the traditional policy of this country.

The Hon. Walter Guinness, M. P., seconded the resolution, which was supported by Professor E. G. Browne and passed unanimously.

The meeting has made a profound and sympathetic impression in the City.

SIR EDWARD GREY AND TURKEY.

The Ottoman Association has forwarded to Sir Edward Grey a memorandum on the situation in Eastern Anatolia and the Aegean Islands, maintaining that attempts were being made to "frustrate the sincere endeavours of the Ottoman Government to establish a just and orderly administration in the Armenian provinces."

To this Sir Eyre Crowe writes on behalf of Sir Edward Grey: "I am directed to inform you that Sir Edward Grey has under his consideration the memorial of the Ottoman Association. I am to state that he is in full accord with their desire to see peace and good government in the Turkish Empire, and that the considerations urged by your Association have been duly weighed by His Majesty's Government in the efforts they are making, in conjunction with other Powers, to secure a permanent and satisfactory settlement of the questions still outstanding in the Near East."

PERSIAN PROBLEMS.

The Times publishes a long conversation which its Tehran correspondent has had this week with M. Korostovetz, the Russian Minister in the Persian capital. According to The Times, M. Korostovetz, though somewhat reticent in the expression of his views, has impressed its representative with his sincere desire to deal with Persia and the Persian problem in a sympathetic and enlightened spirit.

His Excellency, according to the report, has said that both he and the Viceroy of the Caucasus, with whom he had spoken at Tiflis, thoroughly approved of the policy of the withdrawal of Russian troops now in Persia. The withdrawal, which had already begun, would be continued in the spring. There were, however, many Persians who feared a recrudescence of unrest in Azerbaijan Province.

In response to a suggestion that the Swedish Gendarmerie organization should be extended to fill the void, the Minister replied that the Russians would naturally prefer the Cossack Brigade to be entrusted with the task of preserving order in the Russian sphere, though he was well aware that the question of an increase in the numbers of the Russian officers in Northern Persia was a delicate one. He added that it was the policy of his Government to maintain the Anglo-Russian Convention, to support the Constitution, and as much as possible to smooth away all difficulties.

In regard to the question of the Azerbaijan elections and of the support alleged to be given by Russia to Shuja-ed-Dowleh, His Excellency said that the Russian Consuls in Azerbaijan had been instructed not to interfere with the course of the elections. He thought it unlikely that any question of a revision of the Anglo-Russian Agreement would arise out of the situation in Azerbaijan.

M. Korostovetz expressed scepticism with regard to the immediate realization of the scheme of a Trans-Persian Railway, though he was in favour of the more practical project of a railway from Astara or Julfa to Teheran. Progressive schemes were, in any case, well able to take care of themselves without pushing. He further expressed himself in favour of a loan to be made as soon as possible, as he thought that the country could not go on much longer without money. He was also concerned to place the Russian Bank, which for some time past had not been in a flourishing condition, on a firmer and more business-like footing.

Though the above statement of M. Korostovetz is on the whole reassuring, our past experiences of Russian diplomacy do not unfortunately render us very hopeful as to the future of Persia. We shall wait and see.

THE LONDON INDIAN ASSOCIATION.

The Executive of this Association have decided to give informal dinners periodically, at which the members may meet one another, with a view to promote social intercourse between them. The scheme is a happy one and is certain to meet with the hearty approval of the general body of members.

The first dinner, under the new scheme, was held last Saturday and was largely attended. Subsequently those present were entertained to a very interesting programme of music and singing. The intervals provided ample opportunity for social intercourse and the most cheerful and pleasant feelings prevailed during the evening. Judging by the success of the 'opening night', there is every reason to look forward with no little interest to the subsequent periodical dinners, the most happy feature of which will be their purely informal character. The Committee of the I. I. A. are to be heartily congratulated on the step they have thus taken.

AN EGYPTIAN "BLUE."

The most interesting person in last Saturday's 'Varsity Soccer match at Queen's Club was an Egyptian undergraduate, H. Hegazi, who played for Cambridge, the winning team. He is, I believe, the first Egyptian to get a Blue, and though he is only in his first year at the University, his name is quite familiar in the sporting circles, as he has already established a reputation on the Football-ground. Hegazi plays forward and is an excellent shot. The Light Blues were looking to him more than any one else to win the match for them, and though he certainly did not do full credit to himself on that occasion—and it must be remembered that the weather was not ideal by any means—he undoubtedly proved himself a pillar of strength to his side. Hegazi plays in very light soft kid boots, without toe-caps, which give him a remarkable control of the ball: he gets the "feel" of it. The Young Egyptian is most popular with the crowd whenever he appears on the field, and the London Press has lately been full of his praise. Hegazi's future career will be followed with very great interest by every lover of the game.

WOMAN IN TURKEY.

A leading article, under this heading, appeared in the Daily Telegraph this week. The communication, which is based on the series of articles, which Miss Grace Ellison has lately contributed to the columns of this journal, dwells upon the various aspects of the Turkish woman, who, it must be at once admitted, is very favourably treated and dealt with in this article. It is highly encouraging to notice that after all the true virtues and the real worth of the Turkish woman have been driven home to the Westerners with such force and emphasis, and no little credit is due, as I have said in my letter of last week, to the efforts of Miss Ellison, who has thus rendered a great service to her Oriental sisters. Turkish women will no doubt remember her with nothing but genuine affection and esteem.

To those who have been closely in touch with the national movement for liberty and freedom in the Turkish Empire, the unique patriotism of the women in Turkey has struck them as the most hopeful sign of Turkish regeneration. A similar spirit has likewise been manifest in Persia among the women, to whose strong sense of patriotism Mr. Morgan Shuster bears ample testimony in his "Strangling of Persia." Nothing can extinguish this fire of patriotism and liberty which has been kindled in the bleeding heart of these women in Turkey and Persia and the torch of light and guidance with which they are determined to proceed on the path of national freedom and national salvation will be in time productive of stupendous results and substantial consequences for the ultimate welfare and prosperity of their countries. It is indeed a magnificent spirit and Turks and Persians have every reason to be immensely proud of their womenfolk.

The Indian woman, and in fact the Oriental woman in any part of Asia, has equally imbibed the same spirit and the same sentiment. The time is fast approaching when the Oriental woman will demand, and rightly demand, her recognition in the affairs of State and that claims for "Votes for Women" will, I am sure, be put forward by the Oriental woman with more dignity and more grace than is done by her zealous sister in these islands.

A new chapter is thus about to open in the national life of the East, which if conducted with care, perseverance and statesmanship will go a long way towards the uplifting of the Orient in general.

IMPORTANT LONDON CONFERENCE.

A Conference, under the auspices of the "Nationalities and Subject Races Committee," of which Mr. L. T. Hobhouse is Chairman, is to be held next week in London to discuss the following subjects:—(1) The Press Laws in India and Egypt, (2) Russia's Influence on British Policy and (3) Indentured Labour within the Empire.

Sir Henry Cotton, K. O. S. I., Mr. J. A. Hobson, and Sir Roger Casement, O. M. G., are the Presidents of the Committee and the following gentlemen are expected to speak at the conference:—Mr. Keir Hardie, M. P., Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, Dr. Mansur Rifat, Mr. W. Tcherkesoff, Dr. H. Rutherford and others.

TETE À TETE

Our readers will remember that it was our invariable custom to take them into our confidence as regards the financial position of The Comrade and we used to supply them in as great detail as possible the data for judging of the progress of our circulation. This was the only method we adopted for advertising The Comrade, for we felt sure that in view of the spirit of camaraderie that existed between us and our readers, they would be the best of our canvassers, and that they would need no other whip or spur to urge them on than the bare facts of our circulation. Like so many other things that have suffered a sea-change since we migrated to Delhi, this procedure also was dropped. The reason is not far to seek. As the poet says,

بنہاں تھا دامِ سخت قریب آنیوں کی
اڑتی نہ پاسے نہی کہ گرفتار م ہوسے

Soon after we had reached Delhi the Balkan War commenced, and with a staff far from complete and in fact not even as large as that which we had at Calcutta we were compelled to deal with the situation arising out of the war and the Fund that we commenced to collect for the relief of its sufferers. The arrangements that we were called upon to make for the sale of Turkish Treasury Bonds took up still more time, and it now appears to us that so much did we look after the finances of others that we crippled our own. The figures of our circulation which we used to furnish to our readers from time to time ceased to be compiled and on going through our books we have now for the first time leisure to realize that the utmost confusion prevailed in our office. We have no doubt many of our readers must have had to put up with a great deal on account of such confusion; but they will be more disposed to show us some indulgence when they are in possession of all the information as regards the losses that we ourselves had to sustain through the unkindness or neglect of some of our readers. We have had a statement prepared of the number of new subscribers enlisted from month to month during 1912 and 1913, and of the number of subscribers whose names were struck off during the same period. An examination of these figures is not without some interest. In the first place, it completely disposes of the theory of some of our kind friends who would have the world believe that we sacrificed the pursuance of an honest policy to the desire to increase our circulation. As it happens, there has been a perceptible falling off in the number of fresh subscribers during the months in which we may be presumed to have reconciled ourselves—to the loss of grace. In the next place, the Balkan War too brought no grist to our mill. If, however, we turn to the figures of names of subscribers struck off we find that just at the first time when Indian Mussalmans were most generous in dealing with the sufferings of their brethren in Turkey or at Calcutta they were most unjust to us. In January, 1913, alone we had to remove no less than 587 names. In August last another 284 had to be struck off, and this followed similar treatment in the case of 188 in the previous June. If we turn to the net increase or decrease we find that in 1912 the net increase ranged between 96 and 170 in the first four months, that in the next two months there was actually a slight decrease owing to the extensive weeding out that went on for some three months, and that gradually the decrease was converted into a progressive increase which practically lasted to the end of the year. The year 1913 commenced with a "Slaughter of Innocents" as we have shown, and no wonder there was the tremendous decrease of 419 in January. In February and March there were net increases of 116 and 78 respectively; but after that decrease continued throughout the year except for two months of modest increases, July and September. In the two years 1912 and 1913 our circulation went up only to the extent of some 400, and if we take into consideration only the year 1913 we find that our circulation has indeed gone down to the extent of very nearly 500. Since our migration to Delhi there has been a net decrease of about 250 instead of the increase which we had so confidently expected. These figures would cause us the greatest disquietude if they were indicative of a decrease of appreciation of the views published by The Comrade. To a certain extent they undoubtedly mark the natural chagrin of the less indulgent readers at our very unfortunate but equally unavoidable delays. But the data which we now propose to supply would convince our readers that the decrease is in the main indicative of the injustice or at least negligence of some of our readers in their dealings with ourselves. In the issue of 8th February, 1913, we published the amount of arrears which had not been paid up by the subscribers whose names we had reluctantly removed from our books as defaulters. It exceeded Rs. 2,700. The arrears during 1913 exceeded Rs. 4,600; and it appears that Rs. 550 are due from subscribers whose names have been removed during the last two months, while nearly Rs. 1,300 are due from subscribers to whom the paper is still being supplied in spite of their default. This represents unpaid dues of more than Rs. 9,000 in two years, and we ask our readers whether it is possible for us to go on much longer at this rate. We can well understand a subscriber finding a newspaper not to his liking and discontinuing to be a subscriber, though we must acknowledge with gratefulness that we have had remarkably few such cases to deal with. But we fail to understand the justice of continuing to receive a newspaper and from time to time expressing admiration of the way in which it was conducted, and yet depriving it of its legitimate dues. This shows some defect of character in our people which cannot assist them in attaining the position at which their gaze is fixed. We intend to send the list of such defaulters to the most enthusiastic among our subscribers in each district with a view to request them to assist us in having these arrears cleared, and such of them as would volunteer to do this work for us would, we need hardly say, deserve our heartiest thanks and save us considerable trouble. To us nine thousand rupees are a fortune, but the few rupees that each individual defaulter owes us must be only a flea-bite to him. We, therefore, trust that each of them would bear this in mind and discharge his liability to a friend and comrade. But that is not all. We find that it is necessary for us to have at least 2000 more subscribers within the next six months to place the finances of The Comrade on a solid footing. This should not prove to be a difficult task. In fact if we had not had to remove the names of defaulters from our lists for petty arrears not paid up chiefly through sheer indolence and unbusiness-like habits, we would not have needed to issue this appeal. Our existence entirely depends on the support of our readers, but we did not trouble them even in our greatest difficulties because there were the greater difficulties of others in which we desired to bespeak their generous assistance. All those difficulties are now happily over, and it is only because we do not feel that there is a deserving person or community whose need is greater than ours that we stretch our hand. We shall now give every week the result of this appeal, and we need hardly add that any other assistance which The Comrade receives from its numerous supporters will be welcome to us. Let our readers only remember that this is no commercial concern, nor the pet of a grandee on whose support it exists, but an organ of public opinion entirely dependent on public encouragement or support. If it languishes for want of such encouragement or support, whatever conclusion would be drawn it would be a conclusion adverse to the interests and reputation of the public on the support of which we have always relied.

The death of Lord Minto has caused widespread and genuine sorrow throughout this country. The period of his Viceroyalty was associated with the opening of a new and fruitful era of political advance in the history of the people under

The Late Earl of Minto.

British Rule. He had succeeded Lord Curzon when the political sky was heavily overcast and there were ugly intimations of storm and thunder above the horizon. His brilliant and masterful predeceasing by his strenuous administration of affairs, left for him a perfect heritage of trouble. Shortly after his assumption of the reins of office the Conservative Party was crushed at the polls and the Liberal Government, borne on the crest of the popular wave, was installed at Westminster. The situation was generally felt to be awkward and embarrassing to a Viceroy of great Conservative traditions like Lord Minto. There were the usual, inevitable prophecies about his impending resignation. It, however, speaks volumes of the strength of character and sense of duty of Lord Minto that he did not shrink from shouldering his burden because a Radical Government came into power at the India Office. An intimate understanding and unity of effort and standpoint was soon evolved between him 7th March.

Minto and Lord Morley, and both addressed themselves in mutual sympathy and co-operation to the task of Indian governance. Indeed, their earnest co-operation furnished another notable example of the great truth that principles may differ but men can agree. As we have said, the situation in India wore at the time a decidedly ugly aspect. The agitation against the Partition of Bengal was growing in fury and heat. Signs of grave unrest were breaking forth in various parts of the country. The bomb made its first appearance as a weapon in political crime, and it was soon realised that a serious anarchical conspiracy was organising itself underground in the soil of Bengal and spreading forth its tentacles in invisible ways to distant provinces. It is not difficult to imagine what might have happened if a man of less courage and resource than Lord Minto had been at the helm of the Indian administration. As it was, the situation was saved by remarkable tact and wisdom and a courage of a high order. Not only the anarchical movement was arrested by the application of drastic measures, but it was shamed into self-rebuke by its being robbed of all pretence at patriotism or moral justification. Lord Minto had the wisdom to perceive the distinction between anarchical crime and legitimate and healthy unrest, and the courage to apply to the latter a measure of liberal political reform in frank sympathy with the growing aspirations of the people. Those who have never been able to reconcile themselves to the Minto-Morley reforms, who in fact would fain use them torn out of the Statute-Book and the country handed over to the sole and tender mercies of the "men on the spot," have a curious fondness for discussing the authorship of the measures. They like to persuade themselves and others to believe that Lord Minto was a well-meaning but a simple-minded Viceroy who easily fell into the wiles of an astute Radical statesman and was gently dragged into doing what he, if left to himself, would have never ventured to do. As an estimate of Lord Minto nothing could be more inaccurate. As a matter of fact, Lord Minto himself claimed publicly on more than one occasion that he took the initiative by formulating a scheme of reform which the urgency of the situation demanded, and we have no reason to doubt its veracity. The form in which the reforms ultimately emerged was of course the result of an earnest and fruitful collaboration with Lord Morley. But this does not mean that Lord Minto was led into a course which he disliked at heart. He was a man of upright and independent character. He was too alive in his sensibilities to become a dupe or be easily gulled. He saw with clear and steady gaze the forces working around him. Serious unrest was growing. Political crimes were becoming dangerous both in character and magnitude. An overwhelming section of the educated classes, who had no sympathy with political murders and anarchism, were nevertheless feeling impatient of the narrow limits within which their political energies were cooped up. All this was borne in with irresistible effect on the inquiring mind of the Viceroy, and he immediately saw the danger of sticking to his guns and refusing to move ahead. He took his courageous decision, which finally laid down the lines of India's political advance and strengthened the foundations of the British Rule. This is the greatest service that any statesman can have the privilege to render to this country and to the Empire. Another service that Lord Minto did to India was his bold recognition of the principle that all political evolution should have a communal basis in a country where religion was the dominant force in the lives of the people. This historic pronouncement was made at Simla in 1906 in response to the famous Moslem Deputation, and the debt of gratitude that the Mussalmans owe to Lord Minto can hardly be overestimated. Lord Minto was a straightforward, chivalrous and generous hearted nobleman whose personal integrity and charm won the hearts alike of the princes and people of India. His death is a great loss to India and the Empire. We join with the entire Indian people in offering our respectful condolences to Lady Minto in her heavy bereavement.

We are glad to note that through the wise and timely intervention of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab the strike of the Lahore Medical College students has come to an end. They have been readmitted in a body to the College, and it has been decided to hold an independent inquiry into their grievances and the whole trouble to which they gave rise. The Lieutenant-Governor's note on the subject refers to "such disciplinary measure in regard to all or any of the students as Government may approve." We trust, however, that after a searching inquiry into the affairs of the College no such measure would be found to be necessary or desirable. The students' attitude has throughout the period of trouble been marked with moderation and restraint, and one may reasonably conclude that they did not decide to embark on an extreme course with a light heart and in a spirit of defiance. We are convinced, however, that Sir Michael O'Dwyer, whose administration of affairs in the Punjab is already growing in popular esteem, will not recommend any measure that may be needlessly harsh. His example may well be followed by the United Provinces Government in dealing with the students of the Medical School, Agra. In some cases the Principal of the Agra School has proceeded to lengths that are hardly just. He has met the students' strike by closing the school for one year. Such heroic remedies are simple enough to adopt, but they invariably cause infinite harm all round, more particularly to the reputation of the responsible authorities for administrative capacity and tact. We need not go at length into the causes of the trouble at the Agra School. They may briefly be summed up under the one general head of harsh and unsympathetic treatment. The complaint in this case is not against the principal himself—the students, in fact, speak of him in terms of sincere respect. But they say that under the existing rules he is absolutely unapproachable, and his assistants, Drs. J. P. Modi and O. M. De, with whom they have to deal directly, are invariably overbearing in their manners and never let the students' grievances reach the Principal. Complaints against Dr. Modi have been frequent, and we can well recall a particular occasion when he pursued rather vindictively a student that had somehow incurred his displeasure. He seems to have acquired considerable influence over the Principal and is considered to enjoy unlimited freedom to have his own way in all matters relating to the instruction, discipline and general welfare of the students. Be that as it may, we trust that the local Government will promptly intervene and remedy the situation. The School should be opened and the students allowed to go back to their studies, and if any disciplinary measures are deemed necessary, they should be devised in the light of the results of an impartial inquiry into their grievances.

Our Calcutta contemporary, the Mussalman, calls attention to a serious situation in connection with a number of mosques and burial grounds in a suburb of Calcutta which are situated on a vast tract of land that has been acquired for the extension of the Kidderpur Docks. The mosques are threatened with demolition and the burial grounds are being swept clear of all vestiges of tombs. Our contemporary thus describes the situation:—"Now, the acquisition of a vast tract of land, for the extension of the Kidderpur Docks, at Sonai, Krishapur, Belpukur and other villages, in the suburbs of Calcutta but within the jurisdiction of the District of the 24-Pargannas, affects some 15 mosques and about 12 burial-grounds. With the exception of 2 or 3 which are likely to be spared, all the mosques are going to be demolished, some of the grave-yards have already been dug up and human bones and skulls have been taken out and exposed to public view, some of the grave-yards have been levelled to the ground, and thus Moslem feeling has already been outraged. Several days ago the demolition of a large mosque at Nashikarpur was undertaken, four of its 6 domes were dismantled, when some Mussalmans interfered and the work of demolition has thus been stopped for the time being. The question has become a serious one and unfortunately the authorities are still lethargic in spite of the repeated representations of the local Mohammedans. So long ago as November 1909, the Mussalman residents of Sonai, Indri, Muchikhola, Krishapur and other villages submitted a memorial to the then Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, stating that the 6000 bighas of land acquired by the Port Commissioners contained mosques and burial-grounds wherein lay entombed the remains of several saints and pious men who were looked upon with much veneration by the Mohammedan public and the extinction of which would be considered as an act of sacrilege, telling very heavily upon the religious susceptibilities of the Mohammedans. While drawing the attention of the Government of Bengal to that memorial we said in our issue of the 19th November, 1909: 'We join the memorialists in their prayer that the mosques and burial-grounds in question may be retained and we trust that the case will receive a most sympathetic consideration at the hands of a level-headed ruler like Sir Edward Baker.' We find our trust was misplaced and our hope has been falsified. The matter has now reached serious proportions, and that under the rule of a Governor, known to be so just and sympathetic. For sometime we are being informed of the acts of sacrilege that are being perpetrated by the Dock authorities. We ourselves went to the spot several weeks ago, saw things with our own eyes and were satisfied that the grievances were quite genuine. Before we took the matter up in the columns of the Mussalman we considered it advisable to write to His Excellency the Governor a demi-official letter and seek redress from him." Accordingly on the 31st January the Editor addressed a letter to His Excellency's Private Secretary setting forth the facts of the matter and requesting His Excellency to intervene and settle it peacefully in view of the serious shock it would otherwise cause to Moslem feelings. The Editor, however, received a "stereotyped reply" from the Private Secretary to H. E. the Governor, informing him that his letter had under His Excellency's orders been transferred to the Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal for disposal, "to whom any further correspondence on the subject should be addressed." Our contemporary proceeds: "We have since waited for a favourable reply from the Chief Secretary but have received no response as yet. As the matter is becoming more and more serious every day and as apparently the authorities are apathetic, we consider it our duty not to be silent over it any longer and at once to voice the feelings and sentiments of our community on the subject. The question is not a local one. It affects the Mussalmans all over India. We lose thus 15 mosques and 12 burial-grounds are involved." We trust, with our contemporary, that the Bengal Government would take immediate steps to inquire into the whole matter and allay public anxiety and alarm. But the crux of the situation, to which the Mussalman has rightly drawn pointed attention, is that the Government of India should move promptly to amend the Land Acquisition Act so as to exclude all places of public worship and burial-grounds from the scope of its operation. The All-India Moslem League unanimously passed a resolution on the subject at its Agra Session, and now it remains for some Mussalman Member of the Imperial Legislative Council to ask a question with a view to ascertain what the Government intends to do in the matter. We need not say how urgent the matter has grown. Its right solution would for ever remove a source of public anxiety and alarm which is responsible for numerous difficulties and embarrassments that the officials have to face in their efforts to maintain public tranquillity.

"EX-CITIZEN" writes to us as follows:—"I must thank you for your kindly publishing my last letter and for your generous remark in reference to myself. May I ask the further indulgence of your allowing this short letter also space in one of your issues. I hear that the 'Zinat-ul-Masajid'—architecturally perhaps the second best mosque in the Delhi town—is now included among the 'ancient monuments' to be looked after by the Government. This is, as it should be, a matter for congratulation both to the Government and the public. It seems to me it would be appropriate now to suggest a fitting recognition of the claims to memory and respect of the founder of the mosque—Princess Zinat-un-Nisa Begam, daughter of Aurangzeb. At her own request she was buried within the mosque, close to another enclosure said to have been the receptacle of sacred relics, probably a similar institution to what you have in the Jami Mosque. The two enclosures do not exist now. Stephen in his book on the archeology of Delhi mentions that the tomb disappeared immediately after the mutiny. It would be a simple matter, I think, and not very expensive either to raise a tomb with an engraved head-stone at the exact spot which can equally easily be located. Asar-us-Sanadid contains a complete record of the head-stone engraving including the verses, evidently her own composition and after the familiar style of those of the lady's aunt, Jahan Ara:

A lost tomb.

مونس مادر لحد فضل خدا تنها پس است
سایه از ابر رحمت قبر پوش ماس است

The work could perhaps be taken in hand as part of the repairs which I think are needed to the mosque. There were evident signs of neglect and decay when I last saw the place not long ago. I have no doubt that the authorities have already taken notice of the condition of the mosque, and that my present suggestion will receive a sympathetic consideration, should it be placed before them in a suitable form. In case there should be more pressing demands on public funds in other directions, I hope permission would be forthcoming for doing the work by private subscriptions. By the way, 'Zah-un-Nisa' in Asar-us-Sanadid is clearly a misprint for 'Zinat-un-Nisa.'

The Constantinople correspondent of the Near East, writing about the financial difficulties of the Turkish Government, says that the financial boycott of Turkey by France, at the instance of Russia, appears to be maintained, with the result that there is an ever-increasing anxiety in this country as regards the future. The process of putting the screw upon Turkey is being carried dangerously far; for the continued inability to pay salaries will inevitably lead to anarchy in Government departments. Heretofore the army has at least been provided with sufficient pay to maintain discipline, and the feeding and supplying of the troops has not failed. The difficulty, however, of finding contractors who will continue to supply the army on credit is becoming daily more marked, and it is obvious that a failure in this respect would lead to military disturbances, the outcome of which it is not difficult to predict. "In Russia or France, or, indeed, any other Power, ready and willing to incur the responsibility of such a collapse of the governing body? Money, like any other commodity, should be an open market, subject to the natural laws of supply and demand, and this conversion of it into a political instrument of oppression does not lack its dangerous features." Every Chancellor in Europe seemed not long ago to be overflowing with solicitude to help Turkey in applying herself to the tasks of peaceful reconstruction in her Asiatic provinces. But the solicitude would appear to have been another diplomatic guise for the greed of concessions. We would like to know if Great Britain has no concern to prevent France from using the neurer's threat simply that Russia may drive her bargain. Is Turkey to have no respite for peaceful development even after the close shooting to which she has had to submit of the Concert and the assurances that her heavy losses should be taken as a price for her future immunity.

The Financial Boycott of Turkey.

The Comrade.

The Press Act.

VIII.

We are afraid we have already taxed the patience of our readers by the close study which we have made in so many successive issues of the Press Act and its many defects brought to light by the judgment of the Calcutta High Court in our Pamphlet Case and the arguments used for and against the amendment of the Act in the course of the debate in the Viceroy's Council. But so long as the Act remains on the Statute Book of India there is no such thing as the liberty of the Press, and although it is not within the power of any of us to repeal or amend the Act, we must do the next best thing we can and convince every fair-minded reader that the Act is an impossible one. To-day we turn to the question of the duration of the Act and discuss whether the Government of to-day has the same conception of its temporary character as the Government of Lord Minto that passed the Press Bill.

It must be noted that when the Press Bill came up for discussion in the Viceroy's Council four years ago more than one amendment was moved by non-official members with a view to limit the duration of the Act. The first was moved by the Hon. Mr. Gokhale who asked that the Act shall remain in force for three years only from the date on which it receives the assent of the Governor-General. This amendment was fully justified by the speech of the Hon. Sir Herbert Risley who piloted the Bill through the Council. In tracing the history of Press legislation and the administration of the penal laws of the land in connection with the Press, the then Home Member pointed out that the Press in India had been free (except during two periods) for seventy-five years, in fact ever since Sir Charles Metcalfe repealed the Licensing Act which was in force up to 1835. The two periods during which the freedom of the Press was interfered with were, first, the period of the Mutiny when the entire Press was under absolute control for one year and no more, and second, the period from 1878 to 1881 when only the Vernacular Press was subject to the control imposed by the Vernacular Press Act of 1878. During the latter period recourse was only once had to the provisions of the Act which was repealed in 1881. Between 1870 and 1907 even the ordinary law was put in motion against the Press only sixteen times. On the 3rd of June, 1907, however, the Government of India issued a Resolution in which they referred to "the recent outbreak of lawlessness in the Panjab and Eastern Bengal" and to the "deliberate efforts made by a number of newspapers, both English and Vernacular, to influence the minds of the people, to encourage ill-will between classes, to promote active hostility to the Government and to disturb the public tranquillity in many different ways." Now we know what these newspapers were, what motives they had for their writings and what lessons they preached. We also know the nature and far-reaching character of the outbreaks of lawlessness in certain parts of the country which had forced upon the attention of the Government of India the efforts made by these papers. These matters are of such recent date that we need not refer to them in detail. But the circumstances of the time would be forcibly brought to one's mind if we refer to the defence of the Newspapers (Incitements to Offences) Act of 1908 by Lord Morley at the Indian Civil Service dinner in London. The Secretary of State for India said on that occasion:

When I am told that an Act of this kind is a restriction on the freedom of the Press, I do not accept it for a moment. It is said, "Oh, these incendiary articles," for they are incendiary and murderous—"are mere froth." Yes they are froth, but they are froth stained with bloodshed. When you have admitted that they deliberately write these articles and publish these newspapers with a view of furthering murderous action, or talk of the freedom of the Press in connection with that is moonshine. We have now got a very Radical House of Commons. So much the better for you. If I were still a Member of the House of Commons, I should not mind for a moment putting down to the House—and I am sure that my colleagues will not mind to say that when you find these articles on the growth of these concerned expressly designed to promote murderous action, and when you find as a fact that murderous action has been done, it is moonshine to talk of the freedom of the Press. There is no use in indulging in heroics. They are not wanted. But an incendiary article is a part and parcel of the murderous act. You may put picric acid in the ink and pen, but as much as in any acid bomb. I have one or two articles here with which I will not trouble you. But when I am told that we should repeal it as one of the chief aims of good government that there may be as much public discussion as possible, I read that statement with proper diffidence, and then I turn to what I had just heard for from India—extracts from the Press. To talk of public discussion in connection with articles of that kind is really pouring poison into the ears of the people.

This was the state of the country when Government was called to devise measures for dealing with the Press. But now then Lord Minto, whose loss India mourns to-day with deep anguish as of a true friend, announced in the Resolution of the 3rd of June, 1907, that "the Governor-General has no desire whatever to restrict the legitimate liberty of the Press to criticise the action of the Government, and he would be most reluctant to curtail the freedom of many well-conducted papers because of the misbehaviour of a few disloyal journals." All that he did on that occasion was to ask Local Governments to institute prosecutions against the disloyal journals under the ordinary law of the land. The result was that up to the end of 1909 forty-seven prosecutions, or almost exactly three times the numbers of prosecutions undertaken in the previous thirty-seven years, were undertaken in pursuance of these orders. As a further precaution the Newspaper (Incitements to Offences) Act was passed in 1908. Although these measures proved ample for the suppression of incitements to murder and like offences, and newspapers of the character to which Lord Morley referred in his defence of the Act of 1908 ceased to exist before the Press Bill came on the legislative anvil, Lord Minto's Government asked for the passage of the latter Bill in 1910. To our mind it was a wholly unnecessary precaution at the time; but Government thought otherwise, and with the help of their official majority carried the day. The Hon. Sir Herbert Stuart, then Home Secretary, based the defence of the Bill on the circumstances then existing. He said that "the counterpart of its provision will be found in an Act passed by so great a Liberal statesman as Mr. Gladstone. As he said in his speech in the House of Commons, 'the question is whether the measure is required by the circumstances, and whether it is adapted to the circumstances.' My Lord, we believe that it is adapted to the circumstances; that it is required by the circumstances no one can doubt for a moment." His chief, Sir Herbert Risle, had in introducing the Bill four days previously described in great detail what those circumstances were. He had said that "every day the Press proclaims, openly or by suggestion or allusion, that the only cure for the ills of India is independence from foreign rule, independence to be won by heroic deeds, self-sacrifice, martyrdom on the part of the young, in any case by some form of violence. Hindu mythology, ancient and modern history and more specially the European literature of revolution are ransacked to furnish examples that justify revolt and proclaim its inevitable success. The methods of guerilla warfare as practiced in Circassia, Spain and South Africa; Mazzini's gospel of political assassination; Kosanth's most violent doctrines; the doings of Russian Nihilists, the murder of Marquis Ito; the dialogue between Arjuna and Krishna in the Gita, a book that is to Hindus what the Imitation of Christ is to emotional Christians—all these are pressed into the service of inflaming impressionable minds."

As we stated in a previous article of the series, on the authority of the late Viceroy himself, circumstances had greatly been altered by the introduction of the Minto-Morley reforms, and, in the words of Lord Minto, we were then "at the commencement of a new political era." Can any one say that there has been since 1910 even for a single day the kind lawlessness which had induced Government to interfere with the freedom of the Press, or that there have been incitements of the character mentioned by Lord Morley and the late Sir Herbert Risle? Where are the incitements to violence, and where the references to eastern mythology and western literature of revolution justifying revolt and proclaiming its inevitable success? Who talks of guerilla warfare as practiced in Circassia, Spain and South Africa and who preaches from the gospel of political assassination according to Mazzini? There are no doubt anarchists working underground, but they neither influence the normal political life of the country nor succeed in securing recruits from among the ordinary citizens through the inducements offered by any section of the public Press as they could do in the troublous times before the reformed Councils were established. Lord Minto had truly gauged the situation when he based his justification for the release of the disobedients immediately on the passage of the Press Bill upon the fact that "the political position has entirely changed, that the political movement of which they were leaders—sedition it was—has degenerated into an anarchical plot, which can no longer be legitimately included as part of the political agitation in which they were so culpably implicated." Lord Minto then said that "we believe that we are no longer confronted by a political movement such as they inaugurated, but are face to face with an anarchical conspiracy for waging war against British and Indian communities alike, and that it will be long before we can exterminate the evil unless those communities agree to work together hand in hand." These words are as true to-day as they were in 1910 when they were uttered. The Press Act does not touch the treason that has been underground, and if in 1910, when recommending the Press Bill, as preventive of treason, the Home Member could cite as the result of the freedom of the Press several attempts at train-robbing, several murders of European and Indian officials and cases of bomb-throwing, including the one at Ahmedabad aimed at the life of the then Viceroy, Lord Minto, the present Home Member will not find it difficult to furnish an equally long and horrible tale of such outrages, including the awful crime of the 23rd December, 1912, when our present Viceroy was so miraculously saved by Providence, though not without most severe injury. The Press Act prevented none of these crimes and the rigour with which it is being administered does not seem to make the least impression on the secret conspirators. As for any good effect that it may be claimed to have produced on the ordinary citizens, the reformed Council had already succeeded in rallying the moderates who could have been induced, if the reforms had long been withheld, to indulge in violent writing and thus court the rigours of the Press Act. If these Councils are to be made to degenerate into ineffective and puerile debating societies that make no impression whatever on the Government and assist in no way in making Government's policy more and more popular, then indeed there is every prospect of a journalistic saturnalia such as India witnessed in the period just preceding the reforms. But if such is not the desire of Government, the raison d'être for the Press Act has ceased to exist and it should not stain the Statute Book a day longer.

The Hon. Mr. Gokhale whose support of the principle of the Press Bill in 1910, although very reluctant, had made such a tremendous difference both to its supporters and opponents, had also based it on the extraordinary situation when the Bill was introduced in the course of his first speech with which the consideration of the Bill in the Council had commenced. He had referred to the hardships and risks involved in the existence of such an enactment, but he had said that "all these risks may be temporarily borne if they help in some measure to free the air of ideas of which I have spoken. Only it is of the utmost importance that they should be temporary, and I therefore most earnestly urge that the operation of this law should be limited to a period of three years only." Mr. Gokhale subsequently moved an amendment designed to make the demand of security an exceptional instead of a universal measure of precaution, but he could not get more than 9 votes against 50 on the side of Government. In Mr. Gokhale's own words, his amendment was "not only defeated, but positively slaughtered," and he used this as an argument to prove that "if after the expiry of three years the general situation in the country requires that similar legislation should again be in force, there would not be the smallest difficulty in the way of the Government passing another Bill like this through the Council as it is constituted." When he moved the amendment limiting the operation of the Bill to three years, instead of a mere 9 Mr. Gokhale secured no less than 16 votes, or practically the votes of all the Indian Members except the nominees of the Punjab Government and a couple of "territorial magnates." Even Hon. Members like Nawab Abdul Majid C. I. E., and Raja Patab Bahadur of Patiala had opposed Government. Mr. Mudholkar who subsequently moved a similar amendment of his own, had said in support of Mr. Gokhale's amendment that "there is no principle which has been more unreservedly admitted and considered more sacred, and which is regarded as more in accord with the British Constitution than the principle of the supremacy of law, and I would beg the Council to see this, that of the clothing of the Executive with extraordinary powers should be confined to the narrowest possible limits and should not go beyond the exigencies of the situation. When these exigencies cease, it would be a fit occasion for the expiry of the Act. It would be not a little difficult to obtain a repeal of the Act. I say, as in the case of the Irish Act, this present Act should expire of itself at the end of three years unless its continuance then is considered necessary by the Governor-General in Council." The Hon. Mr. Baan, who also had a similar amendment standing in his name, gave his support to Mr. Gokhale's amendment and based it on the speeches of Government Members. Replying on behalf of Government Sir Herbert Risle feared he could hold out no hopes that the amendment would be accepted, but it is of the utmost importance to note that he based his rejection on the ground that "we cannot predict with any degree of certainty that that end (getting a Press temperate in tone and honest in intention) will be attained after two or three or even after five years." He added: "The Hon. Mr. Gokhale told us at an earlier stage of the debate that the air was thick with antagonism. How soon will it clear? Can we be certain that it will be cleared within a certain number of years? . . . If the people concerned have themselves applied the remedy that we desire, nothing will be easier than to repeal the Act." From this it is as clear as it can be that, although Government could not at the time accept a definite period as the temporary limits within which the exigencies that had called the Press Act into existence would cease to exist, they did regard it as a temporary measure to be repealed "if the people concerned themselves applied the remedy that we desire." Mr. Dadabhai had very effectively quoted in the debate in 1910 an observation of that unbending Tory journal The Spectator, that "we must always look upon such measures as temporary precautions; India cannot be governed by a series of restrictions "which contain no seed of progress, no possibility of fructification."

Let us now turn to the reply of the Hon. the Home Member of to-day to the argument that the conditions of 1914 are wholly unlike those which called the Press Act into being. He said: "Although the Hon. Mover from time to time and other Hon. Members represent to us, that the tone of the Press has greatly improved, that the general situation has also greatly improved—it is a favourite topic with the Hon. Mover—it seems to me it would be very rash to remove those very things that have secured that improvement. You might as well say to us when after great labour and expense and many sanitary regulations we have improved the health of a town, 'why have this expense and these harassing regulations, why not get rid of them?' What applies to the bodily health of a country may also apply to the mental health of its newspapers."

Now, if this means anything, it means that like "many sanitary regulations" necessary at all times for "the bodily health of a country," the Press Act must be treated as a permanent measure necessary for the maintenance of "the mental health" of its newspapers. We wonder whether we shall be courting merely the mild treatment meted out to newspapers under the Press Act such as the confiscation of their security and the seizure of their entire printing-press, or bringing on our devoted head a few years' deportation, if we refer, "directly or indirectly, whether by inference, suggestion, allusion, metaphor, implication" or the all-comprehensive the "otherwise" that in making such a statement as he did on this occasion the Hon. Sir Reginald Craddock was breaking a pledge given on behalf of Government by his late predecessor, Sir Herbert Risley. Mr. Bevan's thoughtful and admittedly impartial study of Indian Nationalism suggests to us a simile somewhat different from that used by the Hon. the Home Member. The Press Act remaining permanently on the Indian Statute Book will not be the sanitary regulations of Sir Reginald Craddock to insure "bodily health" in the country but the surgeon's steel frame of Mr. Bevan which assists the patient's recovery and thus justifies the temporary restraint it imposes, but which the Hon. the Home Member would prefer to use permanently—as a substitute for natural paralysis. Even Sir Reginald Craddock could not deny that the tone of the Press and the general situation had greatly improved. If any confirmation of this significant silence is needed, the comments of The Pioneer on the "Indian Peril" articles of The Times supply it. The whole thing has fallen flat.

But "the improved tone of the Press" must not be misunderstood. It simply means that even before the Press Act came into force the seditious newspapers had ceased to exist. As for the newspapers that were then in existence, their tone is no better and no worse than before. The papers that came into existence subsequently are naturally better conducted than many of their predecessors that had worked as pioneers of Indian journalism for those that would follow. But for every article proscribed during the last eight months we can produce from the newspaper files of the three and a half years immediately following the enactment of the Press Act fifty articles equally vigorous in their criticism of the Supreme and the Local Governments, and of individual officials subordinate to them, not to mention criticism of His Majesty's Ministers and the policy and civilisation of Christendom and Europe. So long as the Press Act remained a dead letter, it was tolerated; but the moment it was brought into use it proved to be intolerable, and it is a sad commentary on the argument of Sir Reginald Craddock about its salutary effect that when it was treated by Government as a dead letter Government found no occasion to complain of newspaper criticism, but ever since it is being used the necessity for using it still more frequently and for imposing more and more severe penalties under the Act is being proved by the action of Government itself. As for the improvement in the general situation that, as we have repeatedly said, is due not to such hopeless restrictions which, in the words of The Spectator, contain no seed of progress and no possibility of fructification, but to the fruitful reforms of the Minto-Morley régime and the sagacious policy of H. E. Lord Hardinge. Let the reactionaries assert themselves once more and not hundred Press Acts would be able to cope with the gravity of the situation.

We now appeal to His Excellency the Viceroy to take the earliest possible steps to repeal the Act and not delay any longer a consummation so devoutly to be wished merely at the suggestion of some reactionaries who have no sympathy with his ideals and policies and with whose ideals and policies it will be a foul libel to credit him with any sympathy. One thing is certain. This Act will not for ever disgrace the Statute Book of India, and in fact its span of life is now but a short one. It will hardly be considered fair to his successor if His Excellency repeals the Act towards the end of his term of office. And by then the agitation against it would have swollen to a far greater size than it has assumed to-day, so that a repeal would then be claimed, and rightly claimed, as a triumph of the agitator.

Government is now in a position to rob the much-maligned, yet much-encouraged agitator of his triumph, and we shall be happy to be accessories of the Government in such a robbery. But failing that, whether we could reasonably be expected to resist the temptation of triumphing with the agitators, we leave Government to judge.

The Financial Statement.

The Financial Statement for 1914—1915, which was presented by the Hon. Sir William Meyer to the Imperial Legislative Council on Monday last, contains few features worthy of note. It is a prosaic review of the current financial year which has been marked by few abnormal conditions. The appearance of famine conditions in parts of the United Provinces, Central India and Rajputana, due to a partial failure of the rains, and the disturbance of the commercial conditions due to the banking crisis have not materially altered the general financial position. It is plain, however, that the fat years of the prosperity budgets, which it was the good fortune of Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson to produce during his term of office, have for the time being come to an end. Sir William Meyer's task has not been an easy one in view of the transitional period that he has had to face in the first year of his office, and he has acquitted himself with ability. Without imposing any additional burdens he has contrived to budget for 1914—15 for a surplus of £1,280 million. The existing agricultural and trade conditions have led him to estimate on more cautious lines and hence in the present budget dispositions we are naturally warned not to expect "some of those attractive features which have grown customary in recent years." The regret for the absence of "attractive features" will not, we trust, be keenly felt if Sir William Meyer's caution has not been inordinately excessive. For many years past there has been a steady and marked growth in the Indian revenues. Even the revised estimate for the year 1913—14, in which the general prosperity has received a set-back owing to the failure of the September rains and the disturbance of the trade conditions, show a surplus of £1,828 million. In view of this it is not unreasonable to urge that the "attractive features" of the Indian budget estimates should cease to be mere kindly devices to satisfy popular clamour and should become permanent features like other normal heads of expenditure, for which provision has got to be made whether the general conditions are abnormal or otherwise. A Finance Minister has, of course, to see in the first place to making the both ends meet. But it is something quite different to deliberately budget for surpluses which may be sometimes enormous. Such practice does not give any real clue to the general financial position. It certainly leaves out of account the steady and normal expansion of the general revenues, while it tends to perpetuate the habit of introducing, what Sir William Meyer calls, "attractive features" in the budget by doling out uncertain and capricious help in directions in which lie the larger interests and wider needs of the people.

The Finance Member before proceeding to the actual figures for the revised estimate of revenue and expenditure in the current year and the budget estimate for the financial year 1914—15, drew the attention of the Council to the material difference between the special activities of the Government of India and those of the local Governments. The Central Government is exclusively responsible for services such as defence, the railways, the posts and telegraphs, besides the charges which are finally accounted for in England. The local Governments administer the various branches of ordinary civil administration throughout the country. As the Hon. the Finance Member said, it would make for perspicuity of finance if conditions admitted of a complete parallelism in the allocation of revenue. According to existing arrangements, however, there are wholly Imperial heads such as opium, salt and customs, while the local Governments have as wholly Provincial heads the revenues from forests and regulations and in some provinces excise, but the receipts under the remaining important heads are divided in certain proportions fixed by the terms of the Provincial settlements. The distinction between Provincial and Imperial finance, though artificial, is for certain purposes very significant. As Imperial deficit, for instance, may render it necessary to impose fresh taxation, while in the present circumstances a Provincial deficit merely means that the local Governments are drawing upon balances which are made up of special grants from the Imperial revenues for expenditure on special objects, such as education and sanitation.

The aggregate revenue for the year 1913—14 was estimated in the budget at £824 million, but according to the revised estimate it is expected to reach the figure of £844 million. The improvement is due to substantial increases under Customs, Excise, Assessed Taxes, Excise and Forests. There is some falling off in the land revenue and in the gross Railway receipts. Taking the statement as a whole, the Finance Member has no reason to be dissatisfied with the result. The Opium windfalls have of course disappeared. Excluding Opium altogether the aggregate revenues of India in 1912-13 amounted to £81,738,000. The revenues in the current year, excluding Opium, have yielded £82,656,000 in spite of a deficient rainfall and a commercial crisis.

The total expenditure provided for in the Budget (1913-14) was £83,911,000, but in the revised estimate it is reduced to £83,675,000 as a result of an increase of £573,000 under Imperial charges and a decrease of £809,000 under Provincial. The increase in the Imperial expenditure is chiefly due to over-spending under Military Services, while the decrease under Provincial is the result of under-spending under Medical and Education. The Imperial surplus which was estimated in the budget at £1,326,000 becomes £1,328,000, that is, it remains practically unchanged. The Provincial deficit of £741,000 has been met by drawings from balances which were £10,557,000 at the beginning of the year and are expected to stand at £9,816,000 at its close. Of this large closing balance, we are told, £4.8 million roughly represents special grants given by the Government of India for expenditure on education and sanitation and other beneficent local objects.

Turning now to the budget estimate for the year 1914-15, the aggregate revenue for the coming year is placed at £85,038,000, and the aggregate expenditure at £86,962,000, thus showing a deficit of £1,924,000. There would not, however, be any actual deficit to face, for the enhanced Provincial expenditure of £3,209,000 in the budget estimate will be met by drawings from the balances. As a matter of fact, it is hoped to obtain an actual Imperial surplus of £1,280,000 in 1914-15. The Finance Member says that in present circumstances it is desirable to have an unallotted balance of about this amount to assist the Government in their heavy capital commitments. The Revenue estimates under various heads anticipate increases of £145,000 under Opium, £612,000 under Land Revenue, £134,000 under Stamps and £242,000 under Excise, while the receipts under Customs, Mint and Railways are expected to fall off to the extent of £118,000, £155,000 and £190,000 respectively.

The aggregate Imperial and Provincial expenditure for which it is proposed to provide in 1914-15 is, as we have already stated, £86,962,000, or an increase of £3,287,000 above the expenditure of the current year. The increase under the Imperial heads amounts, however, to £690,000 only, the remainder being due in the main only to drawings on the abnormally large balances at present in the possession of local Governments. Budget provisions under principal heads of expenditure are £21,886 million under Military Services, £9,575 million under Interest on Public Debt, £4,183 million under Land Revenue, £5,203 million under Police, £4,000 million under Education and £7,455 million under Civil Works. Expenditure under Opium shows a decline of £412,000. The interest on Public Debt increases every year as new loans are raised, and with the heavy borrowings which the Government of India contemplate in 1914-15 they have to provide for an addition of £262,000 for interest on the Public Debt proper as well as for £214,000 more in connection with that portion of the Secretary of State's borrowing transactions which he effects through the agency of companies working State lines. In Land Revenue expenditure there is an increase of £199,000, under Forest an increase of £172,000, under Police an increase of £337,000, under Education an increase of £758,000, and under Military Services an increase of £481,000.

Some of the main heads of expenditure require a brief examination. It is manifest that about one-fourth of the Indian revenues are absorbed by the expenditure under Military Services. The Military expenditure has been steadily growing from year to year and the latest budget provision represents an advance of £853,000 above the standard adopted in framing the budget last March. The increase is justified mainly on the grounds that the cost of provisioning the army would be greater owing to the higher scales of prices, that new rifles have to be purchased and that the pay of British Service officers will have to be increased in accordance with the concessions recently made in this direction in England. The Finance Member hopes that the reasons for proposing a higher standard of expenditure are "special and temporary" and he gives the assurance that his proposals "do not imply any settling aside of the Army in India Committee's recommendations." These have yet to be considered with great care and "subject to the fundamental consideration that we cannot, for the sake of any immediate money gain, do anything which would weaken our military position." It is, however, equally desirable to bear in mind that reasonable retrenchment in military expenditure is no less weighty consideration, and we do not see what purpose special Committees on military expenditure are intended to serve if "special and temporary reasons" continue to emerge in unbroken succession.

The budget provision for the next year for education is, as we have stated, £4 million. It stands in the approximate ratio of 1 to 21 in respect of the general revenues and of 1 to 5 in respect of the military expenditure of the country. This niggardly proportion can satisfy none of India's well-wishers, especially when one compares it with the proportion of public expenditure on education in other civilised countries. A great advance, it is true, has been effected during the last few years on the conditions existing before Lord Hardinge assumed charge of his office. Since 1910-11 the scale of the expenditure on education has practically doubled. Comparing 1914-15 with 1910-11 it appears that the direct expenditure has risen by £2,406,000. Of this amount £2,315,000 is Provincial and is being financed to the extent of £1,856,000 from special grants given by the Central Government. But, as the Finance Member himself pointed out, the higher figures of expenditure on education and sanitation for the coming year should not be taken as necessarily representing a permanently established standard. The provision for 1914-15 is found to a considerable extent from non-recurring grants which are likely to be rapidly exhausted if the local Governments develop an adequate spending capacity. In analysing the figures it will be seen that the recurring grants given between 1911-12 and 1914-15 amount only to £756,000 for education and £245,000 for sanitation. They no doubt represent a decided advance on the past and a more liberal and progressive policy on the part of the Government. But bearing in mind the magnitude of the country's needs in these directions it is manifest that the pace of advance should be accelerated year after year. Much, however, depends on the energy with which the local Governments address themselves to these tasks. The unspent balances that have accumulated out of the Imperial non-recurring grants for education and sanitation do not give a satisfactory measure of the enthusiasm that seems to inspire the local Governments. We do not see any adequate reason why the Imperial grants should remain unspent. No one can seriously maintain that general demand for education is not growing in the country, or that the local Governments find it difficult to devise suitable and prompt measures for broadening the scope of public instruction in the Provinces. What is really wanted is to infuse into the Education Departments of the local Governments the vigour, the energy, and the enthusiasm of a new and well-directed purpose which should aim at the spread of knowledge and enlightenment in the mass of the people.

As the Hon. the Finance Member pointed out in his statement, there is a large field of Governmental activity outside the revenue account of the current and coming years and the administrative expenditure. Every year heavy capital expenditure is incurred on Railways and Irrigation works, to which the construction of new Delhi has now been added. The Finance Member discussed at length the capital outlay on Railways and, though he enumerated great many difficulties, he nevertheless declared his intention to adhere to the railway programme of £12 million laid down last year by Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson. This is probably the result of the pressure that has been brought to bear on the Secretary of State and the Government of India by those who are materially interested in the extension of railway communications. Irrigation receives a grant of £1½ million for the coming year, and New Delhi £2½ million. These and other items under capital outlay, amounting in all to £18 million, are to be financed in various ways especially by further borrowing to the extent of £9½ million in India and England. There has been much hue and cry in a section of the Calcutta papers about the probable expenditure on the building of New Delhi, much of which has, however, been singularly ignorant and ill tempered. A yearly outlay of £2½ million on the construction of the New Capital of India is not a drain that would disorganise Indian finance or impoverish the general taxpayer. Whether the change of capital was well-advised or not, is now an idle question. None but a few malcontents in Calcutta would now seem to brood over the loss that the city is said to have sustained in prestige and dignity. When the New Capital has got to be built, it is necessary to provide that it should be built well. The scheme should be financed in a way that the finances of the country may not be thrown out of gear. The Government of India seem to be in no particular hurry to raise fine palaces for their winter residence without carefully weighing the cost and considering the ways and means. The Finance Member has said enough to reassure all reasonable critics that the progress of the work would not be unduly hastened, but that it will be steady and all considerations about cost would be fully weighed in the light of the annual financial position of the country.

The Indian Press Act, 1910.

AN APPEAL TO THE BRITISH PUBLIC.

India in its issue of the 13th February publishes the following influentially signed appeal to the British public on the subject of the Indian Press Act of 1910:—

The news which is continually arriving from India of the confiscation of newspapers and printing-presses affords evidence of a serious state of things which is not receiving the attention it requires in this country. While recognising that all proper steps must be taken to deal with incitements to violence and disorder, it seems clear to us that the provisions of the Indian Press Act of 1910 are being used on a scale and in directions which were not contemplated when that Act was passed. The publication of criticism of the action of local authorities, and even the expression of sympathy with the misfortunes of such Moslem States as Turkey, Persia, Tripoli, and Morocco have been made the excuse for the most drastic repression.

It is stated that since the introduction of the Press Act there have been twenty-eight cases dealt with, of which twenty-two represent Moslem organs, and in twenty-one instances newspapers have ceased to exist, either because the presses have been confiscated or because the good conduct security demanded has been too onerous. In the other cases, the recommitment demanded have been paid sometimes by public subscription. More than a dozen forfeitures, either of money or of presses, have occurred during the last few months.

The Press Act authorises action without judicial proceedings, and should an appeal against the orders of the Executive be lodged, we have the authority of the Chief Justice of Bengal for saying that "his powers are of the narrowest," that even if an illegality has been committed he has not the power to rectify it, that his "ability to pronounce on the wisdom of the executive order is withheld," and that any chance of redress is "almost hopeless." These opinions are extracted from his judgment in the case of the confiscation of the pamphlet, "Come Over Into Macedonia and Help Us," and in the same judgment it is definitely stated that the Press Act is being used for purposes for which it was never intended; that its drastic penalties are inflicted upon men of position and repute; the conviction under it implies no stain upon the character of the accused; and that its operation "would certainly extend to writings that may even command approval."

The sting of these judicial comments is intensified by the fact that, when the Press Bill was under the consideration of the Government of India, the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha, who was in charge of the Bill, speaking on behalf of that Government, emphatically declared that an appeal to the Civil Courts had been introduced into the Bill in order to afford an effective safeguard to the independence of the Press.

We wish further to draw attention to the fact that both the Indian National Congress and the All-India Moslem League have passed strong resolutions calling for the repeal of this particular Act, though not, of course, of any measures under which incitements to violence may be dealt with, and that influential public meetings of protest have been held all over India.

We therefore make an earnest appeal to the public of this country, in whose name and by whose authority the Indian Press Act is administered, to demand such an immediate alteration of the law, whether by amendment or repeal, as will put an end to the abuses which have accompanied its operation.

Edward Lincoln (Bishop); Courtney of Penhurst; Percy Aldan (M. P.); W. C. Anderson (late Chairman I. L. P.); E. S. Beely (Professor); E. N. Bennett (ex-M. P.); M. M. Bhownagore (K. C. I. E., ex-M. P.); Willfrid Scawen Blunt; Hypatia Bradlough Banner; Herbert Burrows; W. P. Byles (M. P.); Edward Carpenter; J. Estlin Carpenter (Litt. D., Principal, Manchester College, Oxford); H. G. Chavolla (M. P.); G. B. Clark (ex-M. P.); John Cliffor (V. D.); J. R. Clunes (M. P.); Henry Cotton (K. O. S. I., ex-M. P.); H. E. A. Cotton (L. G. C.); Edward Dalgado; Bhugwandin Dube; Sophia Duleep Singh (Princess); C. J. H. Eratt (Berg.-Gen., C. B.); A. J. Gardiner ("Daily News and Leader"); J. Fredk. Green (Sec., International Arbitration and Peace Society); G. G. Greenwood (M. P.); W. Douglas Hall; H. B. Hanna (Colonel); J. Keir Hardie (M. P.); Fredric Harrison (D. C. L.); L. T. Hobhouse (Professor, University of London); J. A. Hobson; Bernard Houghton (I. C. S., retired); Harry Jones ("Daily Chronicle"); C. E. Maurice; William Markby (K. C. I. E.); H. W. Morrison; J. M. Parikh; Ernest Parke ("Daily News and Leader"); G. H. Perrie; Herbert J. Reynolds (C. S. I., L. C. S., retired); V. H. Rutherford (ex-M. P.); A. MacCallum Scott (M. P.); W. H. Seed; G. Bernard Shaw; N. P. Sinha (Major, I. M. S., retired); Francis H. Shrine (I. C. S., retired); Herbert Snell (Secular Education League); Philip Snowden (M. P.); S. H. Swinny (President, Socialist Society); T. Fisher Unwin; Jane Couden Unwin; A. J. Wilson ("Investors Review"); Sidney Webb; W. Wedderburn (Bart., ex-M. P.); H. G. Wells.

Indians in South Africa.

A mass meeting of Indians, numbering over 3,000, was held, by permission of the Martial Law authorities, on the Indian Football Ground, Durban, on Sunday, under the auspices of the Natal Indian Association, to discuss the details of the provisional arrangement between Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Smuts, and to take action thereon. Mr. Imam Abdul Cadir Dawazeer was elected Chairman, and amongst those present were: The rev. C. F. Andrews, Messrs. W. W. Pearson, H. Kallenbach, H. S. L. Polak, A. H. West and G. Isaacs.

MR. GANDHI SPEAKS.

Mr. Gandhi, before proceeding to explain the terms of the provisional agreement, announced that Mr. Andrews had received a letter from England preparing him for the death of his beloved mother, whom he had expected to meet on his arrival in England. He also added that Mr. Andrews was suffering from fever due to the strain under which he had worked in Pretoria in connection with the agreement. Notwithstanding these facts, Mr. Andrews had insisted on attending the meeting.

Mr. Gandhi addressed the meeting at length, both in English and Hindustani, his remark being subsequently rendered into Tamil. Mr. Gandhi said that those to whom he was addressing his remarks in English would, he hoped, have read what had been published in the papers, but he would give them the purport of the agreement with the Government. At the first interview he had had with General Smuts, he had placed before him three propositions, the acceptance of any one of which would have enabled the community to lead evidence before the Commission without violating the solemn declaration made some time ago on that very ground. These alternatives were that either the Government should appoint another Commission and restrict the scope of the present Commission purely to a judicial inquiry into the allegations that had been made as to ill-treatment and cruelty, while the other should go into the question of grievances, when the community would be able to lead its evidence before both; or that a member should be co-opted to the Commission to represent Indian interests who would sit specially on the Commission hearing the statement of grievances as apart from the allegations of cruelty, so that the functions of this Commission could clearly be divided into judicial and political; or that the scope of the present Commission should be restricted purely to a judicial inquiry, and that before the community's appearance before it, the Government should grant the community's request in terms of Mr. Cachalia's letter, namely, the five points (1) the repeal of the £5 tax; (2) the restoration of the status of Indian wives as it existed before the Searle judgment; (3) the restoration of the right of South African-born Indians to enter the Cape; (4) the removal of the little difficulty that still exists with reference to the racial bar regarding the Orange Free State; and (5) the question of the just administration of existing laws with due regard to vested rights. The last three points could be dealt with administratively; the first two only by amending legislation, and he had ventured to submit to General Smuts the easiest and the quickest way in which the matter could be dealt with. General Smuts had said that he would consider the matter, and after he had considered and conferred with the Cabinet, he said, in the presence of Mr. Andrews, that the Government were willing to grant these things, but wanted the Commission to lift them, and that they could not possibly, though they would gladly have met the Community, meet them at that stage with reference to its propositions regarding the Commission.

Of course, that would create a deadlock, and that meant either passive resistance and all that that meant, or it meant a suspension of passive resistance until the Government had had a chance, until the Commission had had a chance of doing what they proposed to do, and he had had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion, after consultation always with Mr. Andrews, that the community could fairly suspend passive resistance, seeing that the Government had taken up, that he considered, reasonable attitude, and seeing also that the Government were prepared to understand and appreciate that the community was bound by its solemn obligation not to take part in the Commission, and not to resent that attitude on the part of the community, and as against that, he had suggested to General Smuts that if the community suspended passive resistance, it was only fair that the Government should release the passive resistance prisoners then undergoing imprisonment. There then remained the very serious questions of the allegations of cruelty. What was to be done with regard to those if the community was not to lead evidence even with regard to the judicial aspect of the Commission, and yet it seemed clear that in the present circumstances they could not lead evidence. It then meant that they should publish a book containing the whole of the evidence in their possession, and challenge anybody who wished to bring libel proceedings against the community, so that in defending the charge the community could prove its case. As a passive resister, it immediately occurred to him that there should be no difficulty in dropping those proceedings. That would avoid all irritation, and in the estimation of those who might think for themselves and who knew the history of Passive Resistance the community would stand justified. In any case, if the community could stand justified in the estimation of the Government, and if the community could ask the Government to appreciate its motive in not challenging libel proceedings, he felt that the community could ignore what the world might say as to its being afraid now of coming to a court of law because it had really no evidence, and that it had simply taken allegations to India in order to work on feeling there. They must tolerate such criticism from the world, for the world would have something to say against the best actions, but, if the Government appreciated the community's attitude he felt that, as passive resisters, it became them to act in that manner. They were not passive resisters of the purest type. They had for example, taken advantage of law and defended actions in law courts; yet passive resisters would not have done that. But they had not yet reached the purest stage of passive resistance. They must, however, keep such an ideal actively before them and, perhaps, one day, they would have made such an approach to that state that they would be considered perfect passive resisters. Till they had reached that stage, they could not call themselves perfect passive resisters, but they need not therefore remain stationary, and he had felt they might take that step in advance, and he had come to the conclusion that that was a proposition that might be submitted to the Government. The net effect of the letter written to him by the Government and their reply was, in his opinion, that they had accepted the principle of consultation, that they had recognised the motive of the community in dropping the question of the allegations altogether, that they recognised the community's motive in not leading evidence before the Commission, that they had given an assurance that they wished to settle the matter in accordance with the community's submission and they wanted to do this through the Commission; but they felt that the community's demands were so reasonable and had been so sanctified and strengthened by the suffering that it had undergone during the past months, that there should be no difficulty in securing the recommendation from the Commission. They felt, he thought, also confident because of the presence of Sir Benjamin Robertson and because of the prestige that was behind Sir Benjamin Robertson, that he came not in his individual capacity but as the representative of the Viceroy, that as such his testimony before the Commission was bound to carry its due weight. And under those circumstances they need not worry themselves, thinking or fearing what might happen; and why need a passive resister ever fear so long as he had the purest weapon in the world at his disposal? The future lay entirely in their own hands, and holding that future as firmly as ever, he had no hesitation in recommending the adoption of the agreement, and he hoped that the meeting would approve the action they had taken. At the same time he had not bound the community. He had bound the community on occasions when he had gone with a clear mind and when he had known what the community had already asked for, but on this occasion a new situation had arisen, and for that situation he certainly required the ratification of the community. He could not possibly bind the community with reference to this matter which he had not himself contemplated. He had therefore stated to General Smuts that he was prepared to advise his countrymen in accordance with the tenor of his letter, but he had not bound the community, so that they were free agents entirely and might dismiss the agreement from their minds if they wished, but he believed that they might accept it—it was perfectly reasonable, dignified, and would save an amount of misery. What was more, they wanted, if they possibly could to conciliate the Viceroy. He had said that, Viceroy or no Viceroy, Mr. Gokhale or no Mr. Gokhale, no matter what friend or the world said, if their consciences did not approve, if their oath did not approve, they could not accept their views, but when it was possible for them to keep their oath to satisfy their consciences, he thought that then they should go to the utmost length in meeting the wishes of their friends, and such a noble Viceroy, for whom, perhaps, there was no equal except perhaps Lord Ripon and Lord William Bentinck; and he did not know what the Viceroy might still have in store for them. But that was the picture one formed of the Viceroy, and that had been strengthened by what Mr. Andrews had told him of his noble qualities. They ought to take into account the Viceroy's wishes at that stage, seeing that it was possible for them to do so without violating their oath. Their distinguished countrymen, whom India had looked, to whom they offered reverence, who, while lying on a sick bed, had yet worked for their cause and made it world-wide and had made India ring from end to end with that and nothing else—Mr. Gokhale—also desired it. Lord Ampthill also had been saying: 'They had a noble cause, they were bound to win; let them now stay their hand; they had made sufficient demonstration; they had aroused the conscience of the United Kingdom; let them now even give their evidence under protest before the Commission. That view they had been unable to accept, but they could accept the present arrangement. From every point of view, the agreement was good, dignified and worthy of acceptance.'

MR. ANDREWS.

Mr. Andrews said that he wished, first of all, to speak about the great sorrow which had come to him, but the love which he had for the people of India, his own people who were there, was so great that he could not stay away from them and wanted to be with them. In connection with the visit to Pretoria, there were two things he wished to speak about specially and assure them on. The one thing was that in that agreement and in all that had been done and in all the interviews they had had, one thing had been kept throughout, and that was the honour of the Indian community. That had never at any single point been sacrificed to expediency, but all through, from beginning to end, had ever been the first consideration. Otherwise, he would not be able to stand there before them, who had suffered so much, and speak to them. But because he knew that at Pretoria their honour had been kept throughout, he was ready to stand there before them and urge them and ask them to accept the agreement and to carry it out as it had been proposed before General Smuts, and he could assure them that in no point whatsoever in that agreement had there been any sacrifice of honour or self-respect to any Indian in the whole of South Africa. The second point was that, whatever might have happened in times past, on the present occasion there was the greatest consideration shown to their leader by every one who met him there. In spite of the general strike which was on, in spite of the immense difficulties of finding time, General Smuts and others did their very best to give every opportunity for the grievances of the Indian community to be brought before them, and again and again Mr. Gandhi met General Smuts, when he was invited to be present. It was for those two reasons—because their honour had been preserved and because such great earnestness had been shown by the Ministers at Pretoria—that he hoped that now a time had come when a settlement might be reached of the grievances which had so long been distressing the whole Indian community. He trusted that they would accept the proposed Commission freely and heartily, and that through accepting it something else might come, and that was a settlement of all their difficulties, and he trusted that that might come in a very short time.

Mr. Polak said that, as one of the signatories to the letter to General Smuts, a little while since, immediately after their last great meeting at that place, he strongly approved of the terms of the provisional agreement and strongly recommended it for their acceptance.

Mr. Kallenbach said that he had also been asked to give his opinion about the provisional agreement, and he wished to say that he fully agreed with it.

THE RESOLUTION.

Mr. Parsee Rustumjee moved the following resolution, which was seconded by Mr. Lazarus Gabriel, supported by Messrs. Omar H.A. Johari, P.K. Naidoo, C.K. Thumbi Naidoo, and Lalbahadur Singh, and carried unanimously: 'This mass meeting of British Indians, held under the auspices of the Natal Indian Association, after having heard the terms of the provisional agreement arrived at between the Government and Mr. Gandhi, hereby endorses Mr. Gandhi's action, and earnestly and respectfully hopes that the prayer of the Indian community, as set forth in Mr. Gandhi's letter, will be granted.'

Next week we hope to give reports of several functions at Pretoria held in honour of Mr. Andrews, including an important speech at one of them. We also intend to reproduce a portrait of the poet-laureate of India—Babu Rabindranath Tagore.

THE MARTIAL LAW CONDITIONS.

The following were the conditions of Martial Law under which the Mass Meeting was held last Sunday:—

'No inflammatory language is to be used or language calculated to provoke to a breach of the peace.

'No criticism of the Government's past action is permitted.

'The discussion must be confined to the policy to be adopted arising out of the correspondence between Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Smuts.'—Indian Opinion.

Books and Readers.

LORD MORLEY of Blackburn, Chancellor of Manchester University, was presented last week in the Whitworth Hall of the University with his portrait. The portrait is the work of Sir Hubert von Herkomer. After the ceremony Lord Morley declared the addition to the Christie Library open, and discoursed on books and readers.

What Bacon says about our contemplations all being guided to the consideration of the business of the day must not be taken in too narrow a spirit. Literature can be as much of a social force as either science or scholarly learning. I think that critic was not wrong who said—I hope nobody here will be offended if I quote it—that Oliver Goldsmith with his 'Vicar' did more for what is best and kindest in human nature and in human life than a hundred preachers and a thousand sermons.

BOOKS A SOCIAL FORCE.

I do not enter into any quantitative comparisons, and I do not say anything against preachers or sermons. But you know what I mean. I mean that the stimulus to social feeling, to right feeling, that you get out of so delightful a book as 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' and a few like it is as good as direct exhortations, however backed. Christie overflowed with the spirit which we ought to have in this place—the spirit of the true scholar. He thought nothing of taking a journey from Manchester to Toulouse to verify a reference or from Manchester to Lyons to find out some new fact in the history of the subject that greatly interested him—sixteenth century printing.

ALL SORTS OF READERS.

Perhaps you will indulge me for a minute or two whilst I say a word about varieties of readers. There are half-a-dozen—it may be more than half-a-dozen—species of the genus reader. There is, of course, at the top the professional reader who seeks fresh knowledge and the fruits or stimulus of fresh research. There is the professional reader at the lower end of the scale who seeks in old books material for the mechanical manufacture of new. And then—this, at all events, you will recognise—there is the student jarming himself for his duel with the examiner. Then there is the listless idle reader who takes a book as a sort of pleasant sedative, with no more intellectual concern than goes to the satisfactory smoking of tobacco. Then there are those men and women—and I hope that here at least they are most numerous—who read, if you go to the root of them, on the principle that your own mind is theatre enough for anybody. On that principle they read because books stimulate curiosity, feed, multiply, and enlarge the whole range and compass of your interests, and raise a man or woman to the high level—the highest level—in the general cultivation of their age.

WHAT A LIBRARY SHOULD BE.

A great library is a warning, a rebuke, a lesson to those unlucky people whose minds are constantly unable to hold more than one idea at a time. A great library is, or ought to be, a check on that impulse which belongs to the old Adam in us, that frightful impulse to rush to take angry sides at five minutes' notice on the most important and delicate questions that may happen to be raised in the morning or evening newspapers. A library checks that impulse. A library is a place for learning, but let one hope that a library is also a place for unlearning. The sages say that the great difficulty of life is not to learn, but to unlearn.

The very sight—this is my own feeling, and I dare say some of you share it—the very presence of one of these great collections of books, scrolls and manuscripts seems in itself to give a new significance to the books. It was Lord Acton, himself one of the most learned men of our time who said that 'the gifts of historical thinking were better than the gifts of historical learning.'

The Encyclopædic Mind.

Most truths of a general bearing are in danger of dying in the dull sanctity of truisms. It is a chief task of literature to save them from this fate by giving them fresh forms and original expressions. No man has contributed more to this work of salvage in our time than Lord Morley. For in his essays or addresses, whatever be the pressing topic or occasion, his mind always rises to the elevation of those wider principles and maxims which rightly govern conduct and guide thought. To many of these common thoughts he gives new life and distinction from his own rich private stores of expression. But no man's private store can equal in abundance and variety the reservoirs of history, and the scholar's great service to his time consists in his ability to draw freely and fittingly upon this intellectual commonalty. And in this matter, among living writers Lord Morley appears to us incomparable. Take, for example, that little-known passage from Bacon which he quoted in his address last week on opening the new addition to the Christie Library at Manchester University. "To write at one's ease what other people may read at their ease comes to very little. What I want is the wholesome and well-bottomed contemplations that bring a better order into actual life and enter into men's business with all the turmoil of that business." We can well imagine with what keen regard for the present needs of England Lord Morley launched again this requisition for "wholesome and well-bottomed contemplations." The age, indeed, in which we live threatens to banish contemplation from our vocabulary. For the process of contemplation involves a security of soul and a fixity of vision hardly compatible with the outer or the inner world of to-day. Could Bacon himself have "contemplated" in the London of our time, with the postman at his door ten times a day, the telephone bell breaking in upon his thinking with its mechanical insistence, and a dozen new momentous "crises" bearing down upon him in his daily newspaper? No, we feel that contemplation is an excessive, almost a preposterous, demand upon us. If we can attain "reflection," "consideration" that were much for busy folk like ourselves; but contemplation, with only twenty-four hours in the day to do all we have to do! Again, "well-bottomed" seems another inconsiderate requirement. "What," we may ask ourselves, "has bottom to do with an age of quick changes in thought, in manners, in government, where evolution is always likely to take in its 'x' while we are proud upon the whole to have it so?" In the swirling currents of modern politics, science, business, domesticity, religion, sport, and art, which make up the life we live, we have much ado to keep our head above water by swimming with the tide. As for "Bottom," can we hope anywhere to hold it, though occasionally to our surprise and our dismay we may bump against it, as we are borne along?

Such are the familiar plaints of reflective minds to-day. That they contain much truth is undeniable. But none the less, the measure of our self-criticism, expressed through vivid metaphors, is likely to be excessive. If the pace of modern change has been subversive of old principles, while it makes the deposit of new principles slow and difficult, we need not exaggerate the danger. Even in politics, where at the moment not only Whigs, as in Johnson's famous phrase, but all other parties appear "bottomless" or devoid of clear fundamental principles, we have no ground for despair. There is at any rate, no reason to bewail the shedding of faded principles because the new buds that will displace them are not yet fully formed. Here is a shift of metaphor which may claim to temper the pessimism of the other by an appeal to the new faith in organic process, which is most characteristic of our modern thinking. For our admiration for Bacon's distinguished phrasing, "wholesome and well-bottomed contemplations" must not lead us to press too urgently the sensuous supports on which the phrasing rests. If this be not precisely the age for contemplation or for holding bottom, it may have other wholesome qualities and securities. The very rapidity and variety of modern happenings stir and stimulate the mind of men to novel and fruitful efforts in the achievement of understanding and the guidance of conduct. It is untrue that we are living in a time of mere dissipation, frivolity, and opportunism. Seldom in the history of the world has the volume of serious intellectual and moral effort after "a better order" been a tithe as great as it is now. Never has there been so much well directed, concentrated, and widely co-operative thought directed, not merely to the practical, but to the theoretical problems of life. If the fruits of this effort are tardy in appearance, this is due far less to the lack of skill or industry in our thinkers than to the magnitude and complexity of their intellectual tasks, set in the new forms of thought in which the evolutionary concept has enlargeth them. Most scientific thinkers now claim for their "laws" neither "bottom" nor final persistence. They recognize that, in the constant flux of experience, novel phenomena occur, compelling continuous modifications and frequent supersessions even of well grounded theories and interpretations. This is not, of course, because Nature is anything but mutable, but because its unity is always freshly qualified by diversity. It is the richer perception and experience of this astonishing creativeness of Nature that furnishes the valid answer to the charge of instability or unsettlement of principles so often brought against modern thought. The old conservative idea of intellectual order, incorporated in a restricted number of immutable and absolute laws, has to give place to the progressive idea of an ever-transcending multitude of changing laws of restricted application, rooted in still wider generalizations which are themselves subjected to a slower but a constant process of change.

It is, we suspect, the recognition of this change in the spirit of modern intellectualism that makes Lord Morley urge in his 'Rules on Politics and History' that "the temper of our present times is adverse to generalization," and that the encyclopædic quality

Leonardo in 1500, Bacon in 1600, Leibnitz in 1700, Goethe in 1800—has no clear successor in 1900. Partly no doubt this aversion from generalization, or from the encyclopædic view, is a more natural result of the multiplication of knowledge which places its full contents far beyond the direct apprehension of any human brain. Indeed, "encyclopædic" in the older sense of direct close personal concern with the whole range of known facts and the thoughts relating to them, in some sense practicable for so capacious a mind as Goethe's, is now impossible. If, therefore, we were to look for any living person to whom the term "encyclopædic" should apply, we should have to seek him in regions of thought further removed from those of concrete fact in which the earlier encyclopædists moved. No man to-day could be in such intimate touch with so many fields of thought and action as was Leonardo da Vinci. If even in recent times we find a few instances of the general scientist or the general artist, no one combines these to majestic roles, though one or two have striven to do so. There are, of course, to be found here and there in every educated community, a fair sprinkling of scholars who, rejecting the dominant trend to specialization, have insisted in taking all knowledge for their province, and a few who, by dint of industry and capacious memory, have achieved a high measure of success so far as the collection of intellectual information is concerned. But this alone does not constitute what is meant by the encyclopædic mind. For the effort of such abnormal accumulation almost invariably impairs that faculty of digestion and assimilation essential to true knowledge. To envisage in a cyclic unity the immense multiplicity of representative facts in all departments of knowledge and of practice is a rash defiance of the limits of humanity, and can end, at most, in "sciolism." The truly encyclopædic mind of to-day must then content itself with a more distant and a slighter acquaintance with most departments of knowledge, if it is to make good in any sense its claim to survey the whole. The modern encyclopædist cannot properly be a scientist at all. We shall rather seek him in the narrower ranks of the philosophers. But it will be among those philosophers who consciously taking science for their base, though not their goal, so endeavour to get "bottom" for their "contemplations," and thereby "to bring a better order into actual life."—The Nation.

The Limits of Government by Consent.

WHEN are men justified in opposing force to legality? That is a question which is often put at the present time, and may be worth considering from more than a party point of view. For all Liberals we must suppose, at least, if they found their creed upon history, believe in the justification of armed rebellion against legal power in certain circumstances. The Revolution, for example, was an event on which the Whig Party founded itself; most Whig writers lay it down as an article of faith that the armed movement by which James II was replaced by William III was one of the most righteous acts in history. For ourselves, we are troubled with doubts; but we do at least recognise that the attempt to rule a Protestant England by a Catholic Monarch was likely to end in disaster. As far as we can make out, James II was a good King: he was also an Englishman and a Stuart—our legitimate and lawful Monarch. Moreover, we have a great enthusiasm for the Dutch House of Orange—at least for the member of that House who ruled England. We are willing to leave that enthusiasm to the Liberals, who are now bent on persecuting the descendants of the Orange cause in Ulster. Strange, indeed, are the permutations of history! This, at least, however, we may say: that the Revolution was inevitable. The attempt to keep James II King over such an England as we had at the end of the Seventeenth Century was attempting the impossible and courting armed resistance. The moral that we draw from it was not that armed resistance was justified—on the contrary, we should think it impossible to prove justification—but that it was inevitable. And we should put it like this: That there is a point beyond which legality cannot go against the sentiments or interests or prejudices or faith of a people. It is the task of all rulers to recognise that breaking-point and stop short of it—and the ruler is a fool or a fanatic who does not see the line of danger, or, seeing it, steps across. It is the same in Russia as in England: the Emperor, although he might be thought an absolute monarch, rules within strict lines of consent; if he outraged public sentiment sufficiently—if, for example, he turned Mohamedan—nothing could keep him on the Throne of Russia. He would have crossed the line of consent, and there would be no power left in the country to keep him on the Throne. In the same way, if the British Government in India were to force the Hindus to eat beef, there would be an end of the British Raj—in spite of the British Army. In neither case need we go so far as to say that rebellion would be justified, all we need say is that there would be rebellion, and that the Government would be swept away.

There is, then, a limit to the powers of any Government, and this limit is fixed not by legality nor by a written unwritten Constitution but by the consent of the people. The more fanatical and turbulent the people, the narrower and stricter the limits and the heavier the penalty of overstepping them. We have no doubt that James II, if he were to come to the Throne of England to-day, would have some little trouble with the Low Church Party and the Dissenters; but we doubt if Queen Wilhelmina would be called in to take his place. A country which tolerates the appointment of Lord Reading as Chief Justice of England would hardly object to King James the Second. We are nearly all moderate and reasonable people nowadays—and therefore astonishingly easy to govern. Still, it must be recognised that there are still limits to government by consent. The Westminster Gazette, for example, said the other day that if a law were passed to make everyone go to church on Sunday, it would consider rebellion justified. The example is not altogether felicitous: many Englishmen, no doubt, think that the nation would benefit by a course of compulsory church-going. But let us take an example beyond controversy, and say that if the present Government established Ju-Ju worship as the State religion or made Welsh the medium of instruction in English schools, or decreed that the family system should be abolished, or that football should be regarded as an illegal pastime—if any or all these changes were made even by a Government elected by the people, the result would inevitably be revolution. It follows, therefore, that there is a limit beyond which government cannot go. And this limit depends as much on the sentiments and prejudices of the people governed as on the nature of the legislation proposed. And it is also evident that legislation which might be received without a murmur in one part of the country might cause a revolution in another. Compulsory Welsh in Wales might be popular; in Yorkshire it would almost certainly lead to a revolt. So with this Home Rule Bill: England does not like it, but would, no doubt, submit to it rather than take up arms; but Ulster feels so keenly on the subject that she is forced to fight rather than surrender.

The Home Rule Bill, then, is an example of a democratic government overstepping the limits of government by consent. It is arguable that resistance to the Bill is justified; but what is certain is that there will be resistance. Justification, after all, depends on the point of view. An Irish Catholic, for example, might dislike the Bill; but he would hardly justify himself in resisting it. The Ulstermen are driven to resistance because they cannot do otherwise: it is their nature, their tradition, their whole life and history to fight rather than submit to an Irish Catholic domination. Let us remember that we as a nation put them there with that object. We put them into Ireland as a garrison; they had to fight for their lives for centuries against a savage and fanatical majority. Such a history toughens the character of a race, but does not sweeten its temper or lead it to that attitude of complaisance and submission which makes almost any government possible. The Ulster people are, in fact, the toughest, strongest, and sternest community in these islands—the most fanatical if Liberals will have the offensive word. Of course they are fanatics: that is part of the problem. If an English official in India were to set the whole Mohamedan community against him by clearing away an old and useless mosque in order to make an up-to-date slaughter-house for pigs, and if the Mohamedans thereupon rebelled, he would hardly justify his conduct to the Government of India by pleading that the abattoir was a good thing in itself, and that the opposition was fanatical. The reply would be that the fanaticism of the community was one of the forces on which he should have reckoned, and which it was folly to offend. So in Ulster: the Liberals are excusing themselves for the horrible mess into which they have dragged the country by saying the Home Rule Bill is a good Bill, and that they are fanatics who oppose it. But however that may be, the solid fact remains that whereas in 1905 the Unionists left Ireland in a state of profound peace and quiet, in eight years it has been brought to the very edge of civil war. Not only does Ulster men threaten civil war if the Bill goes through; but Mr. Redmond is now hinting at civil war if the Bill does not go through. The government of Ireland is to be made "impossible" if Mr. Redmond does not get his way; it is also to be made impossible if Sir Edward Carson does not get his way. The difference, as far as we can see, is, that whereas Ulster has a hundred thousand men in an organised and armed force to make good its position, Mr. Redmond is not in a position to make good his scarcely veiled threat. No doubt if the situation continues much longer Mr. Redmond and his friends will be able to organise some sort of force to carry out this policy of making Dublin Castle government impossible; but whether the force would be adequate remains to be seen. What is certain, however, is that Ulster has a force quite adequate to the policy it has set before itself, and is also in the temper to make its policy good. That is the terrible situation into which Mr. Asquith and his colleagues have got the country, and they have done it by neglecting the simple rule of statesmanship, which is recognised by wise men in every part of the world—never overstep the limit of government by consent. No matter what the temptation or the pretext, no matter if the policy can be justified upon abstract and ideal considerations—and we certainly do not think that Home Rule can be so justified—they who break this common-sense rule must of necessity find themselves up against such a situation as this unhappy country has now to face.—The Morning Post.

Militancy: the Moral

By G. K. CHESTERTON.

It is a very false and shameful defamation that calls the Suffragettes unsexed. The true and tremendous moral of their tale is that human beings cannot be unsexed. I have called them names in my time; I think I compared them to the Bacchæ and the Witch's Sabbath; I may, for all I know, have called any of them Cleopatra or Olytemnestra. But I never called any of them Claudius. I think Caesar's wife is above suspicion—of being a man. I think of the Suffragist ladies what they think of the Anti-Suffragist ladies; that they are the Foolish Virgins rather than the Wise Virgins; but I never doubted they had their lamps burning to guard the virginity of the secret of sex. I think, or rather I hope, I never called them unwomanly women. To a simple mind like my own, it seems to be a contradiction in terms. And the occasion of the split in the very citadel of the sisterhood, and the separation of two great sisters, seems to offer an opportunity for pointing out what the partial success and partial failure of this movement really does prove. With that splendid scorn of any sentiment about citizenship and equality which is so deep and womanly in her, Miss Christabel Pankhurst plainly tells the W.S.P.U. that its policy is and must be whatever she and her mother shall decide. I like that; seriously, I admire it. Our male politicians do it; but they daren't say it. But my opinion of Mrs. Pankhurst will be lowered if she does not instantly revolt against her daughter and form yet a third party of her own.

But there is one broad truth about the phase that seems to be showing that has not, I think, been noticed. It is not quite fair to say that the extreme forms of Feminist protest have been a failure. The truth is that most of them have been an utter failure; and one of them was very nearly a success. And if we look at the solitary one that was potentially or conceivably a success we shall find a singular fact: that it is the one out of them all that does not belong to the New Woman, but very much indeed to the Old Woman (I don't use the word in any invidious sense, as Mr. Ben Allen said to Mrs. Riddle); it is the one out of them all that was exactly imitated from the "fire-side woman" whom the Suffragettes condemn—and copy.

Most of them, and all the ablest of them, set out with the ideal of what they called "comradeship" between the sexes: men and women were strongly recommended to march "shoulder to shoulder." The notion is remote from reality; from simplicity and the senses. A woman does not deal with a man with her shoulder—except when it is the cold shoulder. But the thing, though a sophistry, was a sincere sophistry: and from it was deduced all the doctrine that publicity, revolt, realism, bodily battle, should be treated by the two sexes alike. Women should do these things because men had found them good; not because women had ever found them good. Therefore we had a sort of female riot, in imitation of the old male riots; and it utterly failed. It failed because of sex: because the fighters had no notion of the real nature of fighting. They thought fighting was a demonstration, like crying—that far more powerful weapon. They did not understand that in war if you cannot smash your enemy, you strengthen him: he is the firmer for being merely annoyed. A man might yield to some claim he thought absurd if threatened with a pistol. But he would only think it more absurd if he were shot at every day with a pea-shooter—especially if it always missed. A real battle must end in a rout, not in a riot. But these militants did not come to capture our cities, but to capture our attention. They did not fight to relieve fortresses, but to relieve feelings. Thus, on the negative side, the whole business has only proved one thing: the strength and immorality of that schism of sex that they attempted to deny. These women are not unwomanly. They are unmanly; as they ought to be.

But the fact that has, I think, been very insufficiently noted is this. That in one case alone, by one method alone, they did put human government in a great difficulty. They did hold things up in some real sense, as things are held up by a bankruptcy or a siege. That case, of course, was the Hunger Strike. It was not at all self-evident what solution the Government should attempt; and certainly the solutions the Government did attempt were wild enough to be called counsels of despair. Now the arresting fact is this: that this weapon was effective because it was a weapon of the old-fashioned woman. It was effective because it was not an appeal to general citizenship; but to the specialism of sex. The refusal of physical pleasure, the endurance of physical pain, the use of coldness as a rebuke to the wrong sort of kindness, the art of being at once unsympathetic and unselfish, the stoicism that walks close to the cliff of suicide—these are things that have been shown by wives and mothers for unthinkable thousands of years; at all the firesides where people have been hauled over the coals. In short, it was powerful in the prison because it is much more powerful in the home. "No, thank you, I don't want any breakfast." "Yes: I am all right." "Oh, don't trouble about me; there'll be dinner for you at eight." "Thank you, I have to see to the washing." Believe me, those were the ancient arrows of the Amazons. And if the traditional woman is indeed vanishing (which does not seem to be the case by any means) the Parthian shaft was the Hunger Strike; and without question came from her quiver.

I will not deny that I think there was a certain element of tyranny in the unreasonableness of the Hunger Strike: but there is that also in the domestic tradition. "Go and see what Tommy is doing and tell him he mustn't" is a very ancient female formula. To the same philosophical school we may well ascribe the conception: "I will not eat. If you make me eat you are a torturer. If you do not make me eat you are a murderer. If you give me what I want you are a turncoat. If you let me go you are a coward." But it is an ancient and stately injustice; not in the least a new and menacing anarchy. And the moral on the whole matter is merely what I have said. The Feminists have proved literally nothing except their femininity. They have been heroic as Dora and Little Nell would have been heroic; hysterical as Dora and Little Nell would have been hysterical. We owe them one very real obligation for having helped us to find a fundamental fallacy.—The New Witness.

The Gifford Lectures.

Mr. Balfour on Probability, Causation and Cognition.

SPEAKING as usual from a few notes on the back of an envelope Mr. Balfour on January 28, performed the feat of making clear to an audience of more than 1,500 people his views on the external world. He made no reference to the disputes of conflicting philosophical systems, and gave only slight indications that he was treading on the perpetual battleground of philosophers. His point of view was that of common sense and of science.

CAUSAL AND COGNITIVE SERIES.

The lecturer applied to the scientific view of the external world his distinction between the causal series involved in belief and the rational, or, as he to-day preferred to call it, the cognitive, series—that is, a series having relation to knowledge. What, he asked, is the commonsense view of the external world? It would be generally admitted that common sense never considers that external objects, pieces of matter, the solid globe, the heavens above, are mental states, and that it thinks of them as independent of the person who perceives them. These objects affect us when we perceive them and we do not affect them by perceiving them. Further, he thought—but of this he was not so certain—that when we look at a material object we do not think that its reality is exhausted by the aspects of it that we perceive. He summed up by saying that, according to common sense, the cognitive series which is our belief in external things is a direct and immediate perception of objects themselves, and he proceeded to make the point on which his whole argument depended.

THE FOUNDATION OF SCIENCE.

This simple and direct perception of external objects is the foundation upon which the whole superstructure of science is built up, because the physicist and the physiologist look on the material of their researches "exactly as you and I look upon chairs and tables." The causal series which combines with the cognitive series to produce the belief in the external world is the business of science, and there is nothing immediate or simple or direct about it. It is a very elaborate process, not yet thoroughly understood. Here Mr. Balfour indicated the various kinds of knowledge required to give a causal explanation of our perception of the external world, such as physics, optics, physiology, and so forth. When all these causal investigations were completed, one arrives at the threshold of the mind, only to be confronted with the chasm between belief and what is a claim not yet bridged over. One must also remember that our perceptions of an object are profoundly modified by our memories and other psychological considerations. He took the analogy of a message sent by letter post from one town to another to illustrate how many processes had to be completed before a message, starting from reality, could reach mind.

Having thus described the contrast between the causal series and the cognitive series in our belief in the external world, Mr. Balfour pointed out that the distinction which modern science draws between matter and the perceiving mind is a distinction not fundamentally different from the old distinction between primary and secondary qualities of matter. That distinction has been carried further by science, which teaches that reality is hid from us behind the screen of its own effects. We cannot perceive an electron, ether, or the retinal image in our own retina. Science can never be content till it gets to the unperceivable, and the real world, as science pictures it, is more and more remote from the real world as we perceive it or are capable of perceiving it. It is science that insists on the separations and perceptions and the outside causes producing them. Science, then, is in a logical tangle.

The lecturer pointed out, again, that what the scientist sees in the common-sense perception of the plain man, but what is actually there is something quite different. The position of science is something like that of Locke, who has been justly criticized for developing a theory of the external world which never gives direct access to that world but only to sensations and feelings produced by it. Here Mr. Balfour again insisted that science is entirely dependent upon the common-sense view of direct perception, and argued that it destroys its own foundation, and that it provides its own premises to be interlarded with illusion. He quoted Hume's statement in the "Dialogues on Natural Theology" that we can only argue from an effect to a cause when we have seen a similar cause producing a similar effect. No body, he said, has ever seen electrons and ether-producing sensations. We have never seen the causes, and on Hume's principle we cannot found theories of the causes upon the effect.

EXTERNAL REALITY.

All this does not diminish the faith which everyone has in the fact of reality. Can we, he asked, imitate Hume's serene acquiescence in having one set of doctrines for the study and another for the market place, doctrines about things of everyday life? It would be arrogant to speak of solving the difficulty, but he thought that it would be mitigated if we gave up the idea that we could get our notion of an independent external reality as a conclusion from immediate perception. We must start with external reality as an inevitable belief. We know that cause is there and that is independent of the perceiver, and if we are not to make nonsense of the whole process of learning by experience we must begin with the assumption of an external material mechanism acting upon us, and try to find out how it acts.

The Mathematical Calculus.

The "January blast" did not seriously diminish the size of the audience which gathered on January 26, to hear Mr. Balfour's seventh Gifford lecture at Glasgow.

He began by classifying beliefs into inevitable and probable, and in the interests of this classification he offered a criticism of the mathematical theory of probability. Traditional logical theory had confined itself to this particular kind of probability, and though the mathematical statement of chances had yielded results of the first importance both for science and for practical life, it did not cover the whole ground. It had not distinguished clearly different kinds of probabilities, and in particular it had failed to give any account of that large range of beliefs which were neither inevitable nor axiomatic, but which were yet continuous with over inevitable beliefs and were part of necessary basis of all our knowledge. These beliefs Mr. Balfour called "probable," and it was in this sense that Butler had used the term in his dictum that probability was the guide of life.

PROBABILITY AND KNOWLEDGE.

Mr. Balfour's first task was to show precisely under what conditions the mathematical calculus was applicable. He began, to the delight of his audience, by expressing the wish that he were a great mathematician, or even a mathematician at all, for the mathematician enjoyed unique advantages in method and in terminology so that no ambiguity could occur in his expression or in his reasoning. But Mr. Balfour thought that mathematicians did not set forth their premises with the same rigour as they deduced their conclusions, and they did not appreciate the abstract character of their reasoning. He indicated the limits of the mathematical treatment of probability by considering an interesting excerpt from M. Poincaré, to whose memory he paid a glowing and graceful tribute. M. Poincaré had argued that chance could not be, as previous logic had taken it to be, merely the measure of our ignorance, for the statement of chances was often the basis of useful knowledge. Mr. Balfour developed this thesis by considering some typical cases in which knowledge was furnished by statement of chances.

There were, first of all, such cases as the tables of mortality or the laws of the explosiveness of radium. There we were dealing with groups of facts in a purely empirical fashion. A second set of cases was that in which the statement of chances was based on a priori considerations. Though experience confirmed the results of such theorizing it was possible to argue a priori that the chances were one in two that the tossing of a penny would result in heads, and it was equally possible to say on purely a priori grounds that the chances were much against a visitor's leaving Monte Carlo with as much money in his pocket as he had had on entering.

PROBABLE BELIEFS.

But Mr. Balfour argued that there was a definite limit to this kind of reasoning. There was the difference in feeling, if not in logic, between the argument from objective knowledge and the argument from subjective ignorance. But these arguments were usually in the same logical form, and logical theory did not distinguish them. The results of the confusion between these two became serious when the attempt was made to carry the argument from probability into more fundamental spheres.

For example, an agnostic might say that he could form no conclusion as to whether or not the world was created by an intelligent being. It might be replied to him that either it must have been so created or it must not, and he might be forced by that argument to agree that the chances of there being an intelligent Creator were even. To assert this, however, was to assert a great deal about the world—indeed, as Mr. Balfour put it, it implied that the chances of the existence of an intelligent Creator were rather more favourable than the chances of winning on the black or red at Monte Carlo.

But this argument Mr. Balfour believed to be manifestly unfair. It was a case which the calculation of probability could not cover, and it plainly rested on an imperfect analysis of the conditions under which mathematical calculation was valid. Mathematical probability, he considered, had meaning only within a system already determined, and the knowledge of that system must have been arrived at by other methods. For problems such as these he believed that another kind of probability was required different from that resting on the highly abstract mathematical calculation. So he was confirmed in his view that in addition to inevitable beliefs, there were probable beliefs to which we were inclined but not driven. They varied in degree coercive power, but were capable of being detected throughout the whole of scientific knowledge. These beliefs has not received sufficient treatment from philosophers, either of the critical school or of the empirical. Kant and Mill alike had thought more of the grounds of beliefs than of the actual content of belief, and Mr. Balfour pleaded for as impartial an investigation into what men of science had actually believed as had been given to outworn philosophical creeds. He proposed to undertake, in his next two lectures, a survey of some of these beliefs. They would go to support his general Theistic argument, but, apart from that, they were of the utmost significance for a sound philosophy of science.

On Mill.

Mr. Balfour delighted his huge audience on January 28th by a brilliant discussion on the law of universal causation and an entertaining criticism of the position held by John Stuart Mill. He shows our belief in the regularity of the universe as an illustration of probable belief in the sense in which he defined the word probable in his last lecture. He would not define the word regularity to-day because it is a characteristic of all fundamental probabilities that they have taken many various forms in the history of human thought, and that they vary to-day in accordance with varying degrees of knowledge.

THE IDEA OF REGULARITY.

The belief in the regularity of succession among events can go far behind human consciousness and human reason; for, though the lower animals cannot be said to believe anything, they form habits which produce expectations in mankind. The expectation born of habit, or the power of habit to produce expectation, is the result of natural selection and has survival value; but mankind does more than believe that Nature is sufficiently regular to justify expectations born of habit. We carry further this notion of regularity until it embraces the whole universe. Philosophers and scientific men have embodied this idea of regularity in the law of universal causation—that every event has a cause or antecedent, and that the same antecfact always produces the same effect. The lecture was devoted two-thirds of this diotum, and especially to Mill's use of it. Mr. Balfour said that in his published writings he had already exposed Mill's delusion that each man by a process of logical inference can infer these wide generalities from his own individual experience. Is it, he asked, so very obvious that nature is regular? He found himself tormented by its irregularities, by the occurrence of something unexpected. We often speak of the caprice of Nature. It is true that, when we recover our temper, we do not speak of Nature's capricious behaviour, but of our own faulty observation, or the intervention of events of which we have no knowledge; we at once put nature in the right and ourselves in the wrong. A cheer of approval gave the lecturer his opportunity of driving home his point. "Quite right," he said, "but observe that it means our belief in the regularity of Nature does not come from experience." Experience could only show that Nature is sometimes regular and sometimes irregular. He quoted the saying that if Kepler had possessed more perfect instruments he would never have made a great generalization about the elliptical character of the orbits round the sun which was at the root of Newton's immortal discovery; that if he could have observed the deviations from the elliptical form without having our modern knowledge of the cause of the deviations he would have discarded his theory. Mr. Balfour himself thought that, so ingrained in the mind of man is the idea that there must be something like a plan, Kepler's robust faith would have triumphed over his observations. It was at all events true that nothing we can discover ever upsets our faith in the regularity of Nature; but there are unexplained aberrations and it is an act of faith.

A CATEGORY OF NEGLIGENCE.

The second criticism is that the law of universal causation is not sufficient for scientific purposes. Scientific experiment depend upon the admission that a great deal of Nature is for immediate and special purposes, practically negligible, and he proposed to invent a new category—the category of negligibility. He pointed out that negligibility is a probable belief, is unprovable, and cannot be established by experience, and yet it is of vital importance for any crucial experiment. The category of negligibility is apparently inconsistent with the view that the world is an inter-related tissue of causes and effects; that if anything is different, everything is altered, perhaps invisibly, but yet really. This is the view expressed in Tennyson's poem about the flower in the crannied wall. He did not quarrel with it as an intellectual ideal, but it is because it is merely an ideal that science is possible. A world in which events of one instant could not be paired off with events of the preceding instant would be a world in which history was possible, but not sciences, for unless we can break up the world into practically separate strands and threads, no inductive logic could draw any conclusion from any experiments.

A SCIENCE OF SOCIETY IMPOSSIBLE.

He went on to say that this category of negligibility has different degrees of applicability to different areas of knowledge. Philosophers have assumed that we can use it in mentality, in history, and in biography and have attempted to construct a science of sociology in the same sense as a science of matter. As a believer in free will, he could not accept this, but, apart from free will, a science of society is impossible because you cannot neglect things outside your particular experiences as you can in a physical or chemical laboratory. Science depends on repetitions, but history never repeats itself, nor does the life of an individual. In mental experiences there never can be complete identity beyond the simplest and crudest stages of mental life. Bergson had expressed this idea more eloquently, and it was one of his great contributions to contemporary thought. Mill's idea that you can transfer the methods of physical science to the complicated phenomena of society and mental life, and that the only difference lies in the larger number of complications is an illusion. You can get analogies, suggestive lessons, and interesting parallels, but you can never get an inevitable sequence in which a cause is attached to an effect and in which, by repeating the cause you can produce the effect. Human life cannot be resolved into such sequences. The moral is that the hope of progress lies in abandoning methods which require the law of universal causation, and in trying to see how our great body of knowledge has in fact been arrived at and what inevitable or probable beliefs lie at the root of all that we think and do in the whole of our cognitive lives.

Outlying Beliefs.

Mr. Balfour devoted his ninth Oxford lecture on February 4, in Glasgow, to showing that, in addition to such fundamental and inevitable positions as the belief in an external world and the belief in the regularity of the universe, there are also tendencies, inclinations to believe, probabilities in his special sense of the word, which guide the course of human speculation. He said that the full importance of these inclinations and probabilities can be discovered only when we look back upon the history of thought; but he insisted that these are such tendencies, and that they have had, and are having, a most important effect upon the structure of our beliefs. The fact was generally admitted with regard to primitive beliefs and superstitions, but it was apt to be denied with regard to modern thought. It was one of his quarrels with Positivism that the Positivists argue that the fabric of scientific knowledge has been arrived at by different methods from all that was done in the earlier intellectual history of mankind.

Mr. Balfour then proceeded to show that the idea that mankind has accumulated its scientific knowledge as a child picks up shells by the sea-shore, moved only by the whim of the moment and without guiding influences or inclinations, is inconsistent with the history of scientific investigation. He selected two examples of scientific doctrine to illustrate the fallacy of the notion that there is no favouritism; in science, no inclination towards one kind of thing rather than another.

ATOMISM.

The first of these illustrations was atomism—the theory which ascribes all the variety and splendour and interest of the material world to the movements and the relative positions of the very small particles of which the world consists. That theory may be found in early Oriental speculations; it was the theory of Democritus; it ran through the whole of antiquity; and though it was thrown into the shade in the Middle ages, it burst out again at the revival of learning and was the theory of Bacon and Gassendi and Hobbes and Boyle and Newton and Leibnitz, all of whom were in their respective fashions the heirs of Democritus. Modern physical science is atomic through and through, and modern theories of matter, of electricity, and of heat are based upon atomism.

When Tyndall, at the Belfast meeting of the British Association, gave his presidential address on the history of atomism, neither the lecturer nor his critics seemed to have thought of asking how it came about that through all these centuries this theory, which had originally no experimental or mathematical or scientific basis, came to prevail and never lost its hold, and how it turns out now to be true with a degree of accuracy truly astonishing. Mr. Balfour found the answer to this question in the fact that the belief had run before the evidence, and that the evidence has justified the belief.

THEORIES OF CONSERVATION.

The second illustration was the group of theories concerned with conservation, which, he said, showed a fixed resolve on the part of scientific inquirers to find conservation wherever they can. He pointed out that matter, mass, weight, motion, force, heat and energy have all been regarded as unchangeable in quantity, conserved among all vicissitudes, unalterable in amount. He dealt with each of these in turn, and pointed out how the idea of conservation had been wrongly applied or had been applied in the wrong form, and yet scientific investigators, after the discovery of each error, pursued their search for conservation until they were rightly happy when the desire for conservation had found its legitimate exemplar.

The discussion of the changes in the idea of the conservation of energy led Mr. Balfour to an interesting speculation. He had, he said, often amused himself by wondering what would have happened if, in the early forties of the 19th century, the idea of the conservation of energy had been a theological dogma. He said that it might easily have been so, for James Prescott Joule, who discovered the conservation of energy in its modern form, distinctly asserted that he believed in it because he thought in it the method by which God had made the world. In an amusing passage Mr. Balfour described an imaginary Positivist criticism upon this medieval theological theory; and he represented the critic as insisting upon the fact that Joule's results attained by modern methods did not bear out his a priori view that the grand agencies of nature are by the Creator's fiat indestructible. Joule's results in point of fact did vary enormously, and his critic would accuse him of the fallacy of assuming his conclusions and saying that the variations in his results were erroneous observations. Subsequent experiments have shown that the variations were not errors of observation, but Joule started with the idea that the law was so, and his rule, and this belief kept him right about the errors in his observations.

Mr. Balfour, having illustrated these scientific tendencies to believe certain things, went on to argue that such tendencies cannot be regarded as happy accidents. He said we should guard against by the word look; he thought the word inspiration more to the purpose. They were, he said in conclusion, very much what M. Bergson has called vital impulse in the organic world. These tendencies of scientific belief press on definitely in one direction. They are defeated in one line of advance and victorious in another, but they always move onwards, and with them develops all that is valuable in our thought, alike about the material world and, as he himself believed, about religious themes. They have been and they are rich in fruit for human progress and for human knowledge. Experiment and observation are guided by these tendencies and inclinations.

Leg Muffs.

(By JAMES DOUGLAS.)

I SOMETIMES feel disposed to agree with the Shakespearean gentleman who hinted that this is a mad world. This mood comes over me whenever I take up a paper, especially a picture paper, for the picture papers do not trouble to tell lies. They are satisfied with photographs taken somewhat hastily, and nearly all the people in these photographs are stark, staring mad. For instance, at this moment I am gazing at a picture of athletes running loose at Rheims. They are running loose in a snowscape, and they are as naked as savages. They have nothing on but a scanty loin cloth.

I TURN from that insane picture to a telegram "From Our Own Correspondent" in Paris. It is headed: "Deeper Decolletage.—'Leg-muffs' in Use in Paris." Rubbing my astonished eyes I read that "the tendency is for morning dresses to be cut with increased decolletage. I have seen some remarkable models to-day. The effect at a casual glance is that of a dress which has accidentally slipped down to just above the waist, and is retained by a single thin slip of material negligently thrown over one shoulder." "These dresses," it seems, are "particularly popular just now with the smartest set of English society. The Englishwoman, being as a rule of a slighter figure than the Frenchwoman, is able to wear the dress lower cut."

HAVING pulled myself together I read on: "Muffs for the legs are a novel fashion accompanying the unusually long spell of bitterly cold weather still prevailing in Paris. The mode of the slit skirt and the fairy-like shoe led to many smart Parisian women taking severe colds even while only crossing the pavement from their heated motorcars to the doors of a restaurant or theatre. The leg muff, which has been designed to remedy this, is a silk legging lined with fur which can be drawn on over the light shoe and comes above the knee. It is taken off at the same time as the opera-cloak and left in the cloak-room." Lost you should suspect me of having invented this astounding story I swear that I read it in the Daily Mail.

You may not think that the madness of the "leg muffs" is quite as mad as the madness of martial law in Johannesburg, or the madness of the rebel army in Belfast. But these three kinds of madness raging together confirm my suspicion that this is a peculiarly mad world. There may be no connection between these three insanities, but, on the other hand, there may. And there is one thing that is madder than these three insanities. It is the insanity of a world which regards them all with indifference. I am, I hope, a fairly heartless person, but I declare that my heart bleeds for the poor dear ladies who are driven to wear leg muffs. I desire to protest against the callous attitude of mankind towards these suffering martyrs who are ruthlessly sacrificed on the altar of a pitiless tyrant called Fashion.

There are brutal cynics who refuse to shed a tear over the privations of the rich, and who restrict their compassion to the privations of the poor. They grieve over the sad plight of the ragged poor, but they cannot heave a sigh over the sad plight of the ragged rich. It is a monstrous and intolerable injustice. The rich have their feelings just as the poor have their feelings. The plutocracy shivers in the icy blast as violently as the proletariat. The rich woman catches cold as readily as the poor woman. The wife of the millionaire sneezes as convulsively as the wife of the pauper. The only difference is that the rags of the poor woman cost a great deal less than the rags of the rich woman.

I MAINTAIN that the shivering rich deserve more sympathy than the shivering poor. The poor are accustomed to the discomfort of being cold. The rich are not. A wealthy woman clothed in silken rags runs a far greater risk than a poor woman clad in shoddy rags. She is not so hardy. She lives in centrally-heated houses. She is like an orchid in a cosy hothouse. The poor woman, on the contrary, is trained to endure cold from her birth. Moreover, no poor woman is forced the horrors of the higher skirt and the deeper decolletage. Her station in life exempts her from the compulsory dangers of correct exposure. But the rich woman must go through the winter shuddering in expensively draughty garments and extravagantly thin shoes and stockings. There was a time when wealth was warmth, but now no rich woman dares to be warm. As the smart woman shivers on the threshold of the Carlton or the Ritz she casts an envious glance upon the rosy flower-seller muffled to the nose in her shawl.

IF KING CAPHETUA were to come back to life he would not throw his clock over the shivering shoulders of a beggar girl. He would probably warp it round the blue ankles of a frozen duchess. He would not stop to ask whether the duchess has only herself to thank for her cold feet. He would recognise that wealth as well as poverty is helpless under the weight of an iron law. It does not matter whether the iron law is economic or uneconomic. Misery is misery whether it is rich or poor. A cough in a Rolls-Royce is as painful as a cough on a kerbstone. Chilblains in Belgravia are as sore as chilblains in Battersia. Pneumonia in Mayfair is as disagreeable as pneumonia in Mile End.

I AM sick of the misdirected sentimentalism which we find in the Christmas tales of Charles Dickens. I am positive that if Dickens were alive he would write pathetic novels about the poor Marchioness who lives upstairs, and not about the healthy "Marchioness" of the area. He would rage against the anguish and agony endured with heroic fortitude by the poor rich unfortunates who go about in looped and windowed raggedness, and who tie their flimsy footwear to their tortured feet with ribbons that are a parody of the epidemic of varicose veins in high places. He would denounce the cruelty of the descent of tight lacing from the waist to the ankle. He would deliver the smart set from its masked tormentors.

THERE ought to be a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to the Rich. We pay much attention to the woes of the poor. We need a band of devoted philanthropists who will rescue the wealthy from the hardships of wealth. They might agitate for a Royal Commission to inquire into the nefarious conspiracy that exists to make the life of the upper classes not worth living. Who are these scoundrels who tear the clothes off the backs of the aristocracy, and chill the bluest blood in Burke and Debreton? Are they Socialists or Syndicalists? Are the rich being stripped naked in order to make wealth a burden too grievous to be borne? If so I call upon the downtrodden rich to revolt against their oppressors and to organise a general strike against the ruthless wretches who are trying to drag the last rag off their beautiful backs.—London Opinion.

EVER SINCE INVITED.

"LEUCODERMA" Specific is the only cure for WHITE LEPROSY". Numerous testimonials from all parts of India. For particulars apply—

B. N. DIXIT, 69, Shanwar, Poona.

Personal Experience derived by the learned proprietor of the daily paper of our Moslem brothers.

The Proprietor of the "Akhbar-i-Islam," the leading daily of Bombay, in the issue of the 30th January 1913, writes: "The well-known native physician, Dr. Kalidas Motiram of Rajkot, has obtained numerous certificates for his medicines that have stood a successful test to diseases pertaining both to males and females on account of his long-standing experience in the line and has got them registered in Government amongst which, the Royal Yakuti Ananga Vilas, the best tonic, has been very attractive in as much as it makes fresh and youthful blood run in all parts of the body, gives stability to genuine manhood removing all diseases of the body. We had an occasion of giving a trial to a tin of the said pills from which we have been convinced of the fact that the praises regarding the pills made in the advertisement appearing in this paper under the signature of the said doctor are quite free from exaggeration and it is therefore that we specially recommend the use of the pills for persons having a lean body and suffering from debility."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI ANANGA VILAS.

This YAKUTI or life-giving nectar has been prepared from the best choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has a wonderful property of increasing the strength and rectifies all urinary disorders. In fact, it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities among Rajas, Maharajas and many of our esteemed customers. But we have ventured to give it publication simply with a view to place it before the general public owing to the demand of several friends. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We would not like to blow the French horn as is the fashion of the day, but suffice it to say that the use of the medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the efficacy of Ayurvedic and Unani medicines. We recommend it also to those persons who desire to tone up the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost strength and rejuvenates the emaciated, and it is enough to say that muscle is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only (13s. 4d.). Postage extra. No Parhes necessary.

Dr. KALIDAS MOTIRAM, Rajkot, Kathiawar, India.

25 Years Ago

was founded the business of Uberoi, Ltd., Sialkot, which to-day is the largest Athletic Manufactory in the East. The accumulated experience of these years plus the knowledge of English Experts is embodied in all our products and is at the disposal of all interested in games of any description. A copy of our catalogue—free for the asking—will show that quality for price we offer the best value obtainable.

WANTED

Immediately a Demonstrator in Biology, for the Intermediate classes. Starting salary Rs. 40—70 per month according to the qualifications. Preference given to proficiency in the Practical work. Apply immediately with copies of testimonials to—

THE PRINCIPAL,

M. A.-O. College, Aligarh.

H. M. Ahmad Beg,

Indian Rubber Stamp Maker, Die Sinker, Copper, Zink Plate and Stone Engraver, Monogramist, Manufacturer of Brass Badges and Seals, etc. Dealer of all Stamping Requisites and Rubber Hand Presses.

31-10-14.

Chandni Chowk, DELHI.

NOTICE.BENGAL VETERINARY COLLEGE.

Candidates for admission into the Bengal Veterinary College should be present at the College at Belgachia, Calcutta, with necessary certificates in original, as required in the rules at 11 A.M. on 15th April 1914. Rules will be supplied free on application.

A. SMITH, Major,

Principal, Bengal Veterinary College.

Don't shoot but ring.
The Standard Electric
Bell Set, mounted on wall, standard, 20 yds.
wire and 6 months
battery ... Rs. 7-8
1 yds. 1 year Rs. 11 0
Larion Bell Set Rs. 5-0

EAST-WEST CO.

Chandni Chowk,
DELHI

I beg to inform my patrons and public in general that owing to increase of my Business I have removed to larger Premises No. 17, Chowringhee, Grand Hotel Arcade. The Sight-Testing Room is now fitted up with Dark Room and all the latest Instruments. And Dr. F.I.O., F.S.M.C., D.B.O.A., (London) and late Assistant Central Ophthalmic Hospital, London and Freeman of the City of London attends daily.

N. LAZARUS,
Ophthalmic Optician, Grand Hotel Arcade,
CALCUTTA.

For Stationery write to—

The Comrade and
the Hamdard Press

THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF AL-BAYANFIULUM-UL-QURAN

HELD AS AN
INTRODUCTION TO THE COMMENTARY
OF THE

HOLY QURAN CALLED TAFSIR-I-HAQQANI.

The original book was written by M. Abu Muhammad Abdul Haqq Haqqani of Delhi in the Indo-Arabic language. The learned author has left nothing untouched concerning what is required for a valuable book of this nature. The unfair objections raised against Islam by its enemies, through their ignorance or injustice, have been treated and refuted at full length. The existence of God through reasonable arguments, the refutation of suspicions and doubts raised by Agnostics and Atheists, the discussions on the nature and attributes of God, filled with deep learning and logical reasoning, together with refutations of the false and absurd assertions of the opponents are subjects worthy of appreciation by lovers of truth. The nature of angels, their existence as independent beings, their transformation into any shape they like: the thorough investigation of the statements of the rationalists and philosophers on the subject: the debates on the mission of the true Prophets; the different aspects of inspiration; and revelation, the proof of the miracles performed by the Prophets and Saints; the just answers to the plausible statements of the disbelievers in the Prophets and their miracles; the soul and the next world; the transference of man to it; the reward and punishment of good and evil deed; the refutations of spurious religions and of Atheists by their insufficient and false teachings; together with reasonable answers to the suspicions cast by the malignant spirit of the enemies of Islam and the false imputations charged by them against the holy person of the Prophet, together with the testimonies borne in favor of him by the critics of Europe, have been fully described in this translation.

An abstract of review by the Comrade:—The translation in English is quite good. The printing and get-up is excellent; Messrs. Thacker, Spink & Co., being responsible for it. The book has about 750 pages, but from beginning to end besides being learned and instructive is very interesting reading for a Moslem, and more so for a non-Moslem in search for truth about Islam. The book for the sake of convenience is divided into three chapters, and has an Introduction which deals with knowledge gained by External Senses, Internal Senses, by Revelations and by means of Signs and Emblems. The first chapter deals with the last and the greatest of all the Prophets of God, Mohamed, the attributes of God—the creator of the universe, Sanctification, Angels, Genii, Soul Resurrection, and the next world, with objections raised by opponents of Islam and answers to them. The second chapter is the most important as it deals with the early history of Islam, gives a brief sketch of the life of the Prophet, and discusses fully all about crusades, polygamy and inspiration of the Holy Quran, Judaism, Christianity, Vedas, Buddhism, Jainism, etc. It explains the Divine Sciences in the Quran, explaining the prayers, Zakat, Fasting, Haj and Jihad. In the last chapter, a great deal is explained about the Old and the New Testaments and the portions thereof which have been lost. Very useful information is given about the Christian and the Hindu sects, and closes with an account of Zoroastrians. It is a book which will be most useful for the English educated Moslems, as it would give them a very clear insight into their faith, and prepare them to defend it easily against the attacks of the Christian and other Missionaries. Books like this dealing with the modern الكلام were badly needed and we strongly recommend all to purchase and study it carefully."

FATEHPURI, Delhi, 22nd September, 1913.

The English translation of "Al-Bayan," the famous book written by Maulana Abdul Haq, has been given to me for reading and reviewing by Hajee Muhammad Ishaq.

The book is so well translated that the beauties of the author's style and diction have been amply preserved. This treatise would be a most valuable addition to the Islamic literature in the English language. It expounds in a most lucid and logical manner the teaching of the Great Prophet, and gives a rational and logical refutation of all the attacks on Islam.

This book would be useful both to the Mohamedan readers and those Europeans who want to learn the truth about Islam.

(Sd.) M. A. ANSARI, B.A., M.B., M.D., M.R.O.S., I.R.O.P.

This book will be a best companion to the Moslems and non-Moslems in India and Foreign Countries and the members of the New All-India Mohamedan Religious Association. Price has been reduced from Rs. 15 to Rs. 10/8 so that learners of truth about Islam may easily purchase it.

Asst. to—THE MANAGER,

The General Newspaper Agency
and Islamic Book Dept., Delhi.

Or Hajee Mohamed Ishaq, Merchant, Sadar Bazar, Delhi.

LO! HERE IT IS WHAT YOU WANT & WHAT YOU NEED!

THE TEACHER.

A high class educational monthly, devoted to advance the cause of education, to create taste for healthy literature, to supply good reading matter to the educated public, to help STUDENTS in their studies. It is the only magazine for students in Upper India. Best medium for advertisement. The best and the cheapest.

Annual Subscription Rs. 2 only.

For Bona Fide Students Re. 1-8-0 only.

The Manager, Teacher,
DINGA, GUJRAT, (Punjab).

FABRIQUE IMPERIALE HEREKE, CONSTANTINOPLE.

Turkish Fezes made in Turkey

Just unpacked fresh soft Turkish Fezes, Military Calpaks, as worn by Turk high officials, straw-lined hard Egyptian Tarbouches of different qualities, sizes, and colours. Prices varying from Rs. 2 to Rs. 5.

S. F. CHISHTI & CO.,

Benarsi Mansions, Delhi.

11-5-14

Sole-Agents for India

for Fabrique Imperiale Hereke, Constantinople

WANTED.

An English-knowing Mohamedan experienced Head Clerk for the Office of the All-India Muslim League from 1st April. Only those who know accounts, type-writing and short-hand need apply with testimonials to the undersigned. Salary Rs. 50—70 per mensem.

An experienced Mohamedan typist for the said Office from 1st April. One acquainted with short-hand is preferred. Salary Rs. 25—30.

Mohammad Yusuf Khan,

Assistant Secretary,

All-India Muslim League, Lucknow.

IN THE "COMRADE"

PRESS, DELHI.

Make Hosiery at Home & Earn More Money.

As much as Rs. 60
per mensem can be earned regularly by making hosiery for us.

No experience is necessary. Men, Women,
Boys and Girls, all can make themselves earning units in their family. No lengthy tuition—No Premiums—
No monthly Fees to pay—Just the small price of a DURBAR
AUTO-KNITTER and you become a worker and wage earner at once.

Another Million Workers WANTED

We have at present millions of workers, all over the world, all busy—very busy, supplying us with socks, stockings, etc., but they are not sufficient. We cannot meet the great demand for hosiery made on our DURBAR AUTO-KNITTERS—We want a MILLION MORE—We WANT YOU. Write for full particulars TO-DAY.

Read what a worker says:—

DEAR SIR,—I beg to inform you that I have sent you two paid parcels, one on the 14th instant and the other to-day, containing half a dozen pair of Gent's Socks each and request that you will be kind enough to return me the quantity of wool consumed in them and pay my usual wages at an early date. Thanks very much for the nice little machine you sent me, and it runs so smoothly that I can be able to knit daily half-a-dozen pairs of Gent's Socks and when speeds comes a few more pairs can easily be knitted. Wishing you every success.

I am, Dear Sirs,

Yours faithfully,
(Sd.) MRS. N. PEDDING.

Puri, 16th August 1915.

Genz. Wheeler & Co.,

HOSIERY MANUFACTURERS, 11-2 Lindsay Street,
Department No. 36, CALCUTTA.

RULING BY MACHINE

LEDGERS AND CASH BOOKS SUPPLIED

BINDING UNDERTAKEN

DIE STAMPING NEATLY DONE

MONOGRAMS ENGRAVED

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED

TRIAL ORDER SOLICITED.

THE COMRADE PRESS, DELHI.

THE

"JEUNE TURC"

An Ottoman Daily Journal.

Address:—CONSTANTINOPLE, PLACE DU TAXIM No. 8.

The Jeune Turc is the organ of the modern life of New Turkey.

The Jeune Turc gives the most exact and early information about the Political, Economical and Social life of the Ottoman Empire and of the Balkan States.

The Jeune Turc publishes Political, Literary and Economical articles on all questions connected with the New East and teems with humorous literature palpitating with Political life.

Whoever wants to keep himself well informed about whatever passes in Turkey and the Balkan States ought to subscribe

FOR THE

"JEUNE TURC"

A paper, having the greatest circulation in the East.

Subscription for Foreign Countries:

For a year Rs. 24- For 6 months Rs. 13- & for 3 months Rs. 7-

The Comrade.

A Weekly Journal.

Edited by - Mohamed Ali.

Stand upright, speak thy thought, declare
The truth thou hast, that all may share;
Be bold, proclaim it everywhere;
They only live who dare!

—Morris.

Vol. 7. Single Copy Delhi: Saturday, March 14, 1914. Annual Subscription
No. 11. Annas 4. Indian Rs. 12. Foreign £1

CONTENTS.

	Page.		Page
WEEK	... 209	THE INDIA OFFICE AND MR. MONTAGUE ...	217
OUR LONDON LETTER	... 210	The New Under Secretary ...	218
TUES A TETR—		PRESS LAWS IN INDIA AND EGYPT ...	218
Our Supporters ...	212	THE SIN OF INDIFFERENCE ...	219
Jewels of Women ...	212	THE PASSING OF EMPIRE IN INDIA ...	219
Khawaja Kamal-ud-din and his work in England ...	213	THE PUBLIC SERVICES COMMISSION ...	220
"Aligarh Ideals" ...	213	THE EAST AND THE EMPIRE ...	221
"Their Own War." ...	213	ENGLAND AND EGYPT ...	222
Aligarh and Politics ...	214	THE MAN OF THE HOUR IN EGYPT ...	223
LEADING ARTICLE—		THE FUTURE OF TURKEY ...	224
Rewards and their Results ...	214	THE FUTURE OF TURKEY IN ASIA ...	224
The Price of Peace ...	215	MR. BALFOUR ON THEISM ...	225
Verso ...	216	ADVERTISEMENTS ...	226—228
THE KING'S REAL SPEECH ...	217

The Week.

The New King of Albania.

London, Mar. 5.

Prince William of Wied and his consort embark at Trieste to-day for Durazzo. They will be escorted by the international fleet. The difficulties awaiting the new sovereign are evidenced by the spread of the Epitote revolt and the outbreak of inter-tribal fighting among the Albanians.

A Cetinje telegram also reports that the Mohamedans of Skutari have decided not to send a deputation to meet the Prince.

Trieste, Mar. 5.

The Prince and Princess of Wied have embarked for Albania. Salutes were fired by the batteries of forts and warships, and the band played the Albanian National Anthem. The crowds, which gathered to see their Highnesses off, loudly cheered them. The Prince visited the Austrian squadron and British and French cruisers.

Durazzo, Mar. 7.

The Prince and Princess of Wied arrived to-day. After the salute, they landed when they received an ovation.

Home Rule.

London, Mar. 9.

There was a rush from eight o'clock this morning onwards on the part of members of the Commons to appropriate seats in the House in order to hear Mr. Asquith's statement regarding Ulster.

The House of Commons was even more crowded to-day than when the Home Rule Bill itself was introduced. There was not vacant space anywhere. The Archbishop of Canterbury and other prominent Peers including Lord Stamfordham, the King's Private Secretary, were in the Peers' Gallery. On entering the House Mr. Asquith received an ovation from Ministerialists, as did Mr. Bonar Law and Sir Edward Carson from the Opposition.

PREMIER'S SPEECH.

Mr. Asquith, at the outset, emphasised that by making suggestions they were not departing from the original Bill, but were merely endeavouring to allow it to start with the greatest measure of success. There was a prospect of civil-strife in Ulster, yet if the Bill were shipwrecked, the outlook throughout Ireland was equally formidable. He was as convinced as ever of the soundness of the machinery and principles of the Bill. He said that conversations in the autumn had not led to even an approach to an agreement. They made all realise their difficulties more than before. They had tried Home Rule within Home Rule, but it satisfied nobody. The second suggestion was that the whole of Ireland should be included in the present Bill, and after a lapse of time, the Ulster counties should have the power to exclude themselves. That had also proved unacceptable. He continued that the Government then proceeded to explore the road of exclusion. He pointed out the formidable difficulties, for, he said, exclusion would keep the controversy alive and involve serious administrative and financial difficulties. He believed that some form of provisional exclusion would be a via media between the surrender of their principles and the application of force. The best plan was to allow the Ulster counties to determine whether, in the first instance, they desired to be excluded. A poll was to be taken of the Parliamentary electors of each Ulster county before the Bill became operative whether there should be exclusion. The electors would be asked: "Are you in favour of the exclusion of the county for a period?" If the majority was in favour, the county would be automatically excluded. The Government thought that the term should be six years from the first meeting of the new Parliament.

Mr. Asquith concluded by saying that six years would ensure an ample test of the actual working of the new Parliament. Also before the end of the period of exclusion, the electors of the United Kingdom would have the opportunity to pronounce whether the exclusion should continue. The excluded counties would continue their representation in Imperial Parliament and the Irish Executive would have no control over them. An Imperial Minister would be answerable for the reserved services and every detail of the administration of Ulster. He declared that as to the rest of Ireland, adjustments would be necessary. The proposals were the price of peace, and he did not expect them to be received with enthusiasm in any quarter.

MR. BONAR LAW'S VIEWS.

Mr. Bonar Law said that he fully appreciated the spirit in which the proposals were made. If, however, the proposals represented the last word, the position was most grave. He emphasised that Unionists were opposed to Home Rule with or without exclusion. The Government had no right to make a change of this kind before the electors had been consulted. The Government could avert the danger by satisfying Ulster which, he thought, they could do without the sacrifice of principle. He emphasised that if the Government adhered to their conditions, they would only do so because they had made an offer which they knew could not be accepted.

MR. REDMOND'S DEMAND.

Mr. Redmond said that his view was that the Premier had gone to the most extreme limits of concession. He was convinced that long before six years had passed, they would be able to make an exhibition of a moderate, tolerant government, which would completely disarm all fears and suspicions. If Ulster refused the proposals and Nationalists could not accept them, then it was the plain duty of the House to place the Bill as it stood on the Statute Book.

MR. O'BRIEN'S OPINION.

Mr. O'Brien characterised the Premier's suggestion as hateful and intolerable.

SIR EDWARD CARSON'S SUGGESTION.

Sir Edward Carson frankly admitted that some advance had been made. He asserted that if the Government would remove the time limit, he would call the Ulster Convention to consider the proposals but not otherwise.

"Indian Peril."

The Times, in an editorial, deprecates the minimising of anarchism in India: "Anglo-Indian journals derided the recent articles in the Times on the 'Indian Peril,' saying that the country was smooth enough on the surface, but we should have thought that the attempt to kill the Viceroy does not confirm the suggestion of placidity."

Advice to Young Britons.

London, Mar. 9.

Referring to an article in the Bombay Gazette on the subject of lack of interest in Indian affairs shown by European young men who come out to this country, Lord Sydenham writes to that paper:—"I agree with you that never in the history of modern India was it more desirable that men of British birth who make their homes in this country should set themselves to acquire an acquaintance with its affairs. I fear it is true as you complain that among non-officials, and especially younger men, there is a lack of interest in public and even civic questions. Speaking at a gathering of the Royal Asiatic Society last year, I endeavoured to lay stress upon the need of bringing up our boys, whether their future lies in the East or not, to realise the responsibilities for the welfare of the Indian Empire in which as grown up men they must share. I believe that only by amending some palpable defects in our system of public school and college education at home can we awaken a spirit of intelligent and sympathetic interest in Indian affairs, which is necessary for all who are called upon to embark upon commercial and industrial careers. Happily there are some signs of realisation of this need. Political evolution which will inevitably react with increasing effect upon the economic development of India ought to be studied and frankly discussed by non-official British residents. Educated men of all races and countries have common intellectual ground on which they can meet and mutual understanding would be encouraged if this ground were recognised and explored. Indians and Britons alike would benefit by a free interchange of ideas and the working lives of latter would acquire fresh interests and a deeper significance if they sought to play a part in the greater life of India."

End of an Anglo-Indian Paper.

Bombay, Mar. 9.

At a meeting of the Directors of the Bombay Gazette yesterday it was decided immediately to wind up the concern, including both the newspaper and the job press and there will be no further issue, yesterday's being thus the last issue of this historic paper. The staff were informed of the decision of the Directors this morning.

A strong effort was made to resuscitate the paper a few weeks ago when Mr. J. E. Woolcott came from Calcutta to assume charge. It is understood that Mr. Woolcott, Mr. Exley, Mr. Miles, and Mr. Partington, of the editorial staff will proceed home immediately. Mr. Armon, the Manager, will remain to wind up the business, having been appointed liquidator by the Directors.

Bombay, Mar. 10.

A bulletin of telegrams issued by the Bombay Gazette press this morning is prefaced with the following notice:—"The Directors of the Bombay Gazette having decided to stop publishing the paper in its old form have arranged to issue this sheet daily, pending other arrangements."

Our London Letter.

London, 20. Feb. 1914.

INDIA AND PARLIAMENT.

The House of Commons has discussed every earthly subject with the exception of the "South African Indian problem." As I mentioned in my letter of last week, Mr. MacCallum Scott had definitely put down an amendment to the Address dealing with this important question, but for some reason or other, the matter has not been proceeded with. It is almost certain that this is due to the Colonial Secretary's gentle hint, in the course of his speech, the other day on the Labour Party's Amendment to the Address with reference to the recent industrial crisis in South Africa, and the deportation of the Labour leaders, when Mr. Harcourt expressed a hope that the Indian question would not be introduced in the House, since the matter was being investigated by a Commission of inquiry in South Africa.

So this matter, which is admittedly of vital importance to the Empire, has been judiciously passed over and poor India, never popular in the House, has not on this occasion even received that casual hearing which she was accustomed to in previous years, during the general discussion, which usually follows the Speech from the Throne. Such is the hard fate of the "brightest jewel in the British Crown" and such is the treatment meted out to Great Britain's "only empire" in the Imperial Parliament!

TURKEY AND THE POWERS.

Reuter, no doubt, has already informed you that, as expected, some definite demands have at last been formulated by the Great Powers with regard to the Ægean Islands. The Austro-Hungarian Ambassador at Constantinople, as doyen of the Diplomatic Corps, has presented a Collective Note to the Porte from the Powers, in which certain proposals are laid down. According to the will of Europe, Turkey is to surrender Chios and Mitylene to Greece, retaining for herself the small islands, Imbros, Tenedos and Castellorizo, which lie at the mouth of the Dardanelles. Naturally enough, the Powers end by expressing confidence that their decisions will be respected and loyally executed by the Ottoman Government. It would seem from the Porte's reply—the only possible reply under the circumstances—that in some respects this confidence is misplaced.

The matter, it must be admitted, is by no means as simple as it looks. The Daily Telegraph in a leading article deals with the subject with that impartiality and fairness of mind which have characterised its attitude on the question throughout the recent troubles in the Balkan Peninsula. "Plausible arguments on the Turkish side," the journal proceeds, "are readily forthcoming, and are at least as logical as those which have weighed with the Powers. The principle on which the Powers have acted is clearly that Greece should retain the territory which her arms have won, subject to the defensive necessities of the Turkish Empire. But if small islands like Imbros and Tenedos and Castellorizo are to be left in Ottoman hands because they are necessary for the protection of the Dardanelles, might it not be as easily argued that Chios and Mitylene are equally necessary for the protection of the coasts of Asia Minor? Such, at least, is the affirmation of the Turks themselves, and there is a good deal to be said for it. If Turkey is recommended to leave her European dominions alone, and to concentrate herself on the task of developing her Asiatic Empire, then it is a reasonable proposition that the western defences of that Empire—in other words, the coast line of Asia Minor—should be made absolutely secure. But will Turkey submit? From the tenor of her reply, apparently not. Lately there has been a great recrudescence of military spirit in Constantinople. The Young Turk Party have put themselves at the head of a national movement, which, as a matter of course, seeks to recover as much of the lost territory as is possible under the present conditions. Every one is aware that Turkey has recently purchased a ship of war, destined for Brazil, and there are many other signs suggesting not only restlessness in Constantinople, but a determination to take some offensive action. The influence of an energetic commander like Enver Pasha must necessarily be in the same direction, and, as we saw the other day, only too obvious opportunities exist for fomenting disturbances in Albania. If Athens has the support of Belgrade, and also of Bucharest, it is, unfortunately, by no means certain that Constantinople has not the support of Sofia. Bulgaria only dreams of revenge, and she may find a weapon ready to her hand in the machinations of the Young Turk Party, who, according to the text of their latest Note, view with regret the failure of Europe to consider the vital needs of the Ottoman Empire. Thus, the situation, though in some senses it has become clearer, can hardly be described as free from menacing clouds."

The Telegraph has possibly attributed an excessive degree of aggressive zeal to the Young Turks, who have made it abundantly clear that in order to enjoy the full benefits of peace they must prepare themselves for war. Then and only then will Turkey be able to attend to her work of internal reform and put her "house in order" without any possibility of external interference. It is, however, plain that in this instance the Turks are fully determined not to allow their Empire to be used again as the playing-field of crafty European diplomacy. The Telegraph, however, shows a very close and intimate knowledge of Turkish affairs, and is undoubtedly written on authoritative information upon the situation in Turkey.

